always an hour late for an appointment, but loses his temper if you are so much as five minutes late. He is, in turn, surly, charming, witty—but constantly insulting.

True, the items that won him a movie contract were his brilliant quips on the radio program, "Information, Please!" and his book, a hodgepodge of brickbats, which sold 75,000 copies in four months and was called, "A Smattering of Ignorance."

On the radio, Levant is a sensation. First appearing in 1938 as a guest quiz artist, he could play 10,000 musical compositions from memory. He knows answers to questions about everything—the White House, French novels, the Brooklyn Dodgers.

On the printed page, his book devotes 267 pages to insulting the great and near-great. In his slender volume, Levant labels Leopold Stokowski, "a musical Lucius Beebe wearing his scores like so many changes of attire." Viciously, Levant, whose Hollywood musical experience was limited to writing scores for early talkies and Western horse-operas, tells of a renowned movie producer who, desiring to create a French musical atmosphere in a film, suddenly shouted: "I've got it! Put in a few more French horns!" He is now penning another book. Rumor has it that this will be entirely about Hollywood foibles.

He isn't a conversationalist; he's a human monologue. But good! Recently, S. W. Behrman had Oscar Levant to dinner, but the guest of honor was Alexander Woollcott. However, Oscar grabbed the spotlight. With the cocktail he began talking, talked through the consommé, and talked, talked, talked through the rest of the meal. Woollcott was amazed. Finally, nodding toward Oscar, he asked the hostess, "Is he reading?"

A short time after that, when Levant was broke, he was spending the summer loafing and writing music at playwright George Kaufman's country place in Pennsylvania. After several weeks, Mrs. Kaufman took him aside and said:

"I thought you'd be embarrassed about

Hollywood Highlights

TWO UNKNOWNS GET FEATURE BILLING IN THAT WESTERN THRILLER — "THE OUTLAW"

To Jane Russell, 19, and Jack Buetel, 21—neither of whom had ever laid eyes on a klieg light—went contracts from Howard Hughes for the coveted top roles in his million dollar production, "The Outlaw."

It took six months of constant searching before Hughes found the talent he wanted. Countless name actors were turned down; hundreds of unknowns tested and flunked. And when at last he did decide, he chose two absolute unknowns who never had an ounce of publicity written about them in their lives. Why didn't he pick top stars? Why small-timers like Jane and Jack? Hughes gave us the answer. In order to make a perfect picture, he believes the players should be accepted by the public as their screen-life characters. He's a realist and thinks that if he'd chosen established stars, the people who put their money down at the box-office would remember them for their dinner-jacketed background and know they were just playing a part. They've never seen Jack, but the first time they do, he'll be Billy the Kid. The same thing applies to Jane as Rio, Billy's girl friend.

Hughes' reputation for picking 'em dates way back to 1930 when he cast an unknown, Jean Harlow, in "Hell's Angels" and a couple of years later discovered Paul Muni and George Raft for "Scarface." Now, he's once more turning to the amateur ranks for his talent—and Hollywoodites are watching those two lucky newcomers, Jane and Jack, as the possible big film news of the coming year!

the servants, so I tipped them each three dollars and told them it was from you."

Oscar blew up. "Damn you, Beatrice!" he shouted. "They'll think I'm stingy! Why didn't you give 'em five dollars!"

Levant has been married twice. The first one was eight years ago, an ex-chorus girl named Barbara Smith. This lasted seven months. They fought constantly. The worst fight resulted in a philosophic, and then physical, disgression on how long it takes to boil an egg. After the break-up, a reporter said to Oscar:

"Well, your marriage didn't last long, did it?"

"The hell it didn't!" Oscar barked. "You should just live an hour with me!"

But the classic crack came when he was asked exactly why Barbara divorced him. He replied soberly, "Incompatibility," and then with a whisper, "and, besides, I think she hated me!"

In 1939 he married attractive June Gale, who had appeared in "Hotel for Women." At the wedding ceremony, Oscar, in old form, leaned over and inquired of the judge, "Confidentially, sir, do you think I'm making a mistake?"

Eventually, they decided to have a child. Before it was born, Oscar claimed his wife was prejudicing the baby against him. "She writes nasty little notes about me," he said, "and then swallows them!"

The youngster, a girl, finally emerged unprejudiced and is now five months old.

Thus, Oscar Levant, Hollywood oddity. His epitaph will not mention his fame as an interpreter of George Gershwin's serious piano music, nor that his bosom pal and worshipper, Alfred Vanderbilt, once named a horse after him, nor that he composed a smash hit called "Lady Play Your Mandolin." However, in his epitaph will be the item with which he ended his book, a remark Brahms is said to have made upon leaving a party, to wit: "If there is anybody here that I have forgotten to insult, I apologize."

But one last note, please. He is not infallible. Once, in a duel of words, he met his Miss Waterloo.

At an intimate Hollywood get-together, Greta Garbo said to a friend, "I should like to meet this legend Levant."

The friend arranged the meeting in a few minutes. He introduced them.

"Pardon me," said Oscar, "I didn't catch the name."

Garbo frowned and turned to her friend. "It is better," she concluded, "that he should remain a legend!"

lucky all my life. My luck started when I was born."

That called for an explanation. And the explanation led to the whole story of how she arrived where she is.

She was born November 14, 1919, in Lake Placid, New York—and christened Constance Frances Marie Keane. Her father, H. A. Keane, was then a commercial artist who worked long-distance for the New York Herald Tribune. Her mother was "just a plain housewife—one of those wonderful women who are perfectly happy to concentrate on having a home life."

If you think Veronica is small, you should see her mother. At first glance, she looks as if she might be her daughter's younger sister.

"She nearly died when I was born. Neither of us would have lived if it hadn't been for a Caesarean operation."

Veronica started school in Lake Placid, then later was sent to the Villa Maria convent in Montreal, where she was well educated. "Nuns are the best women teachers in the world—because they teach for the love of it."

She didn't rebel against convent discipline. "I thrived on it. I was a serious youngster. I didn't ask anything more from life than to be permitted to bury my nose in books. The nuns had to get after me to go outdoors and play games."

She didn't know what she wanted to be when she grew up. One summer she was drafted for a child's part in an Adirondack Players' production—but the acting bug didn't bite her. And despite her father's talent, she had no urge to draw.

The winter of 1936-37, her father and mother went to Miami and took her along. That was where she finished school. That was also where she started wearing her hair as she wears it now. (Which takes care of the rumor that she invented the hairdress to attract Hollywood's attention.) "I just resented spending hours in beauty parlors and in front of a dressing-table, all because of my hair. I rebelled against that. I made up my mind that I was going to fix my hair so that I could take care of it myself—and easily."

About the time that she made that individualistic decision, she also decided that she was going to study medicine. "I was that serious. I was going to repay the debt I owed to surgery—for being alive!" That fall she enrolled in the pre-medical course at McGill University, Montreal.

The first year of a pre-medical course is designed to weed out all those who aren't intent on becoming doctors. Veronica sailed past that first year and was well into the second, when her father developed heart trouble.

His doctor prescribed California. Veronica quit college temporarily to be with him and her mother.

The Keanes took a small, quiet apartment in Beverly Hills. Where, as the weeks passed and her father steadily improved, Veronica became desperate for something to do. And desperate to know someone—anyone—her own age. "Desperate enough, finally, to go around the corner to the Bliss-Hayden Theatre and ask to be admitted to their dramatics class. "Not that I had acting ambitions—I just wanted to meet people. I worked hard after I got in and played four parts before I was actually hit by the acting urge. The fifth play had a part in it that I thought would be fun to play—the part of a dizzy little siren. I asked for it, and they gave it to someone else. That was the turning point. So they thought I couldn't play it? I felt challenged. I had to show them. I argued and I pleaded and I fought for that part. Until they finally let me play it, the last week of the run, when they knew the show was going to close anyway. Funny, isn't it, that I had to fight to play that unimportant hussy part—and the part of the hussy in 'I Wanted Wings' was handed to me on a platter only a few months later?"

After what seemed an endless absence (one year), Ilona Massey returns to the screen to star opposite her fiancé Alan Curtis in "New Wine."

No talent scout discovered her in that role, because all the talent scouts had seen the play before she was put in. However, an agent saw her. He persuaded her to let him try to get her in the movies.

"He didn't tell me at the time that his idea of the way to get an unknown in the movies was to have her line up with 200 other girls at a studio audition for bit players and hope she'd be picked. He told me that he could get me auditions, and that auditions were 'easy.' I didn't find it easy or even possible to show any acting talent under those conditions, so I gave up the whole idea.

"Then when I didn't care any more, an ironic thing happened. A girl I knew at Bliss-Hayden was going to have an interview at RKO. She asked me to go along with her at the last minute. I did—just to keep her company. I was so cured of my own movie ambitions by then that I didn't care how I looked. I went just as I was, in slacks and an angora sweater, without make-up and with my hair tied up in a bandana because I had just washed it and it was still wet. And just to show you what can happen when you don't care, the casting director said to me, 'You're the type for this picture.' And I found myself in the movies, playing a bit in 'Sorority House'. . . . That's what I mean by pure, unadulterated luck."

That bit led to a role with Leon Errol in a two-reel RKO comedy, which was also lucky for her, because Errol saw to it that she got a close-up. That close-up caught the eye of Murray Fiel of the William Morris agency, who has repre-

New Powder For Brunettes

Gives You That Alluring Look

Dine, Dance Ride — Yes Kiss IT STAYS ON

Florence Rice
Featured in Republic Pictures' "Mr. District Attorney," Uses Tayton's

A new ravishing shade of face powder for brunettes, called EGYPTIAN has just been produced by the famous Hollywood House of TAYTON'S, which gives brunettes the most alluring, kiss tempting make-up you have ever seen. Hollywood calls it glamour—Sex appeal. This new shade is a knockout for brunettes! Gives your skin a soft, smooth, inviting warmth with a heart quickening under-tone glow that daringly excites romance. Movie queens use it! Thousands praise it! TAYTON'S special silk-sifting process makes it so exquisitely fine it goes on like the down on a flower petal, without that powdery, flaky look. And a wonderful new improvement makes it cling many hours. Dine, Dance, Ride—yes Kiss, and it stays on. Formerly in dollar sizes only, now in 10c and 25c guest sizes at your dime store. Get this glamorous new TAYTON'S EGYPTIAN shade for brunettes (or ROSE RACHEL for blondes) today. Also 5 other new shades. If your store is out ask the manager to order, or send 25c to TAYTON'S, Hollywood, California, stating whether Brunette or Blonde.

answers every one of his fan letters personally. He has a typewriter in his room where he spends most of his idle time pecking away at letters! His address is Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

Arthur Halloran, Mass. Linda Darnell's favorite actor, Don Ameche, is going to play with Alice Faye and Carmen Miranda in "That Night in Rio," to be released around April 11th. . . . The last of June you'll see him in "Miami" with Betty Grable, Carole Landis and Jack Haley. Neither he nor Alice Faye played in "Thanks a Million." Maybe you're thinking of "Alexander's Ragtime Band."

An ardent fan, East Orange, N. J. Cuban Desi Arnaz was born in Santiago on March 2, 1917. He has black hair and dark brown eyes, is five feet ten inches tall, weighs 160 pounds. During the Cuban Revolution, his family lost their money and position (his dad was mayor) and Desi was forced to flee to Miami, Fla., where he earned his living singing with a dance band. Xavier Cugat spotted him and the rest is history. It was he who introduced the Conga to Miami and New York. Lucille Ball's his missus.

Janet Owen, Newark, N. J. Ocean City, N. J., was the birthplace of Preston Foster, October 24, 1902. A part in opera and a Broadway play gave him his start, and for the last eight years he's been in Hollywood making motion picture news. He's married to Gertrude Warren and has an adopted girl, Stephanie. You can write to him at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal., where he's working with Patricia Morison and Richard Dix in "The Roundup."

Ruth Fox, Scranton, Pa. You aren't the first to ask us who played Willie in "Strike Up the Band." Everybody's curious about Larry Nunn, 13-year-old Marshfield, Ore., boy, who was chosen for the part after Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer executives heard his voice on an Irene Rich weekly radio program. He's 5 feet one inch tall, weighs 99 pounds, has light brown hair and blue-green eyes, has a yen for sports, especially soccer, football, boxing, fencing and bowling! While making "Strike Up the Band," he made a name for himself around the studio with his clever cartoons of Mickey and Judy and others on the set. In Hollywood, he lives with his mother in a small bungalow. You'll see him next in "Men of Boys Town," in which he again plays with Mickey Rooney. If you want to write him, address your letter to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

Virginia Sherry, Lynn, Mass. Eddie Bracken got his start playing bit parts in "Life's Too Short," "So Proudly We Hail" and "Iron Men." Like Desi Arnaz, he played in both the stage and screen versions of "Too Many Girls," and now Paramount's featuring him in "Reaching for the Sun," coming out on May 9th. Eddie is 21 years old, married, five feet ten and one-half inches tall, weighs 165 pounds, has blue eyes and brown hair. . . . Lucille Ball's that lady's real name. . . . Hal LeRoy did play in "Harold Teen," in 1933. . . . Your "Spanish" Ann Miller was born a solid United States citizen in Chireno, Texas, in 1919.

Alison Wells, Escanaba, Mich. Although Bob Preston was born a New Englander in Newton Highlands, Mass., in 1918, he moved to California with his family at the age of two and was dropped plumb into the heart of the movie business. During high school, he lost his heart to the stage and devoted all his efforts to crashing into films. Six feet one inch tall, weighing 175 pounds, dark-brown haired and grey-eyed, he's married to Kay Feltus, and is making a name for himself in his work. You can reach him at Paramount, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal., where he's making "New York Town" with Mary Martin, Lynne Overman and Fred MacMurray.

Sally Wilson, South Norwalk, Va. Jackie Cooper is 18 years old and has grown up to a height of five feet ten and one-half inches and weighs 165 pounds. When he's not with Bonita, he's adding guns to his collection or working around boats in the harbor. His next movie's "Ziegfeld Girl." Bonita's latest was "Wild Man From Borneo."

A. Patterson, Fargo, N. D. Allan Lane was last heard of at Republic Studios, where he made "Grand Old Opry" in 1940. You can write to him there at 4024 Radford Ave., N. Hollywood, Cal. . . . Sheldon Leonard played the part of Phil Church in "Another Thin Man."

An Errol Flynn fan, Latonia, Ky. Lili Damita is Errol Flynn's first wife, and likewise Errol is Lili's only mate. They met on a boat when Errol first came to America and were wed on June 19, 1935. They haven't any children to date, but are expecting. Errol was born in Ireland, June 20, 1909, and Lili was born in Paris, Sept. 10, 1904.

Lucy Torris, New Bedford, Mass. Don Beddoe was born in Pittsburgh on July 1st, but spent most of his boyhood in New York at St. John's School and Trinity College. Although he majored in journalism at the University of Cincinnati, he immediately turned to the stage upon graduation and did several Broadway and radio shows. He ultimately wound up in Hollywood where you can reach him at Columbia Studios, 1438 N. Gower St. He's five feet eleven inches tall, weighs 160 pounds, has blue eyes and auburn hair.

J. S., Memphis, Tenn. RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Hollywood, Cal., will send you an autographed photo of Jimmy Lydon for 25c in coin or stamps.

Kathleen, Piney Fork, O. Betty Grable's and Paulette Goddard's figures are considered the most perfect in Hollywood.

WONDER IF YOU KNOW...

FACTS WE NEVER KNEW TILL NOW:

That America's 17,000 movie houses can seat 10,462,208 at one time—during an average week actually do accommodate from 55 to 85 million flicker fans.

That Jimmy Cagney majored in art at Columbia U; Alan Curtis was once a Chicago hackie; Richard Denning once tipped the beam at a ponderous 230; Walter Brennan's first screen bit was to bray like a donkey; Joan Blondell trouped at the age of 3 as "Rosebud"; Marlene Dietrich's pappy was a German grenadier; Pat Morison has the longest hair in Hollywood—39 inches; Louise Beavers had to learn Negro dialect for screen work; Henry Armetta pressed pants before hitting the footlights.

That the average high-salaried star in Hollywood supports ten other persons—relatives, "old friends," et cetera.

That Garbo conscientiously dieted off 25 pounds during the filming of "Camille," to make her screen decline seem more authentic.

That Hollywood's top stars, asked to judge themselves, voted Gary Cooper and Olivia de Havilland most popular, Paul Muni most intellectual, Hedy Lamarr most kissable, Mae West most generous, and Myrna Loy the ideal wife.

These are just a few fascinating nuggets tracked down in the first issue of HOLLYWOOD WHO'S WHO. This exciting new publication thumbnails the lives of 500 actors and actresses—with pictures. It tells a step-by-step story of how films are made—stories by such Hollywood biggies as Will Hays (Censorship); Sam Goldwyn (The Star System); Howard Dietz (Publicity); Frank Capra (Direction); Walt Disney (Animated Cartoons), etc. And that's not all. Many of your favorites—John Garfield, Bill Boyd, Gene Tierney and others—give you straight talk about themselves and their jobs.

If you want to know more about Hollywood than you ever dreamed you'd know, hurry right now to your nearest newsstand.

HOLLYWOOD WHO'S WHO is a thrill from the opening page to the last glowing word. Remember—it's now on sale. And it's only 15c!

HAPPY RELIEF FROM PAINFUL BACKACHE

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys — and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

sented her ever since. And it helped him get her a bit in a Jones Family picture, and then a bit in "Forty Little Mothers"—which was destiny in disguise.

But before we go into that, let's pause for a brief revelation of something else that had happened to her in the meantime; something that gives a sidelight on both Veronica and men. She encountered a man who tried to broach some cozy ideas for the good of her career. She told him off as he had never been told off before. But a few months later when a young girl relative of his arrived from abroad, he telephoned Veronica to try to arrange for the girl to meet her. "I want her to meet a clean American girl," he said.

Of that little incident, she said, "I suppose you can't blame a man for trying. But any man will respect a girl who doesn't say 'Yes.' And, more important, the girl can respect herself. Certainly you can be twice as happy married, if you have a clear conscience."

Something else happened before "Forty Little Mothers" that's worth noting. Her agent took her to Paramount, and the man who was then head talent scout said, "She'll never amount to anything. She's just another cute kid." Just ten months later he found himself assistant director on "I Wanted Wings"—which was destined to make her a sensation!

Veronica's role in "Forty Little Mothers" wasn't important in itself. But it was important in that it introduced her to Freddie Wilcox, then M-G-M test director, now a full-fledged director. He walked on the set one day to look over the outside talent that M-G-M had signed for the picture. He wanted to know who the exotic-looking little blonde was. She was different. And he had been looking five years for a different type of blonde.

"He was the first person who thought I had dramatic possibilities. He told M-G-M what he thought. They couldn't see me except as an ingénue. I was too young and inexperienced, they said, to be anything else. Freddie said to me, 'They won't believe that you can do what I say you can, until they see the proof on actual film. Are you willing to work your head off for five or six months—to show them? I want to make a dramatic test of you. But the test will take intensive preparation on your part. Lillian Burns, the dramatic coach, will work with you, and so will I, if you're willing to work!'

"It was an unexpected challenge, and I set out to fight for that break.

"I worked for five solid months without pay—and Lillian and Freddie worked with me. I read every script in the M-G-M files. Aloud, with gestures. I learned how to deliver lines, how to register emotions, how to handle myself in scenes. I learned by daily trial-and-error. I went over scenes until I was ready to drop with exhaustion. Then I went over them again. But at the end of five months Freddie said I was ready for my test: a dramatic scene from the play, 'Spring Tide.' He took a solid day to make it and the result was really something. We all had that feeling. We all felt that our work was repaid by that test.

"Then came the crowning irony. (I can't help it; it's the only word that fits.) What happened to Linda Darnell in the picture, 'Star Dust,' happened to me in real life. Somebody kept the head of the studio from seeing my test."

She looked plenty sultry as she made that revelation.

"That would probably have been the dismal end of my movie career—if I hadn't had incredible luck. If my agent hadn't happened to come over to Paramount a few days later to try to sell some actor to producer Arthur Hornblow for 'I Wanted Wings.'"

HORNBLOW had every other role cast, but he was looking for a girl to play Sally; still hoping to find a startling unknown. He was that positive that the role was a star-maker. He said so to Veronica's agent—who went into an immediate song and dance about this girl, Constance Keane, and the test she had made at M-G-M. Hornblow, making allowances for the enthusiasm of agents and wondering why M-G-M hadn't signed her, if she was so startling, reluctantly agreed to look at her test.

"So the test arrived at Paramount, and once he saw it Mr. Hornblow thought maybe I could handle the role. He told my agent to get me over to Paramount right away for an interview.

"To everyone's consternation, I showed practically no interest in the role. (I wasn't letting myself in for another terrific letdown.) Mr. Hornblow, baffled, finally said, 'Here's the script. Read it over the week-end—in case we decide to test you next week.' That was Saturday morning. That night Paramount phoned me and told me to be at the studio at 7:30 Monday morning for a test. After that I was more interested.

"I probably owe an everlasting debt to Wally Westmore because, when he made me up for that test, he taped the eyelashes so tightly that I couldn't open my eyes wide. The test was terrible, but everybody who saw it said, 'Boy, does she have slinky eyes!' And"—she smiled—"I got the role. And a new name. They said 'Constance Keane' was too stagey. They said that 'Veronica' would be more exotic (they didn't know that they were naming me after my mother), and that 'Lake' would express the cool appearance of my hair. I'm not used to it yet—though I'm getting used to being called 'Ronnie' instead of 'Connie.'

"And then," she continued, "I got the works. For days I had one wardrobe test after another, dozens of make-up tests and endless portrait sittings—all for glamour's sake. I collapsed at the end of the week, which gave them an awful scare, because I was supposed to leave for location in Texas Sunday night. I never expect to get so much medical attention again, all at once, in my life. But I was on that train Sunday night!

"It's impossible to give you any conception of how hard I had to work—a rank beginner playing an important dramatic role in a big picture. When I wasn't actually in front of the camera, I was in my dressing-room rehearsing my lines with Phyllis Laughton, the dialogue coach. That went on six days a week, including the few days I had off. And Sundays, Phyllis and Troy Saunders worked from 9 to 5, drilling me in putting over a song number, 'Born to Love.' (I had never sung in public in my life!) And now people are taking it for granted that I'm like that girl I portray—that I didn't have to work very hard to portray her!"

She jabbed with mock viciousness at the chicken croquette on her plate and ate a mouthful before she answered the next question: How did she find time to elope—with John Detlie, young M-G-M art director—half-way through the film?

"You would have found time to elope, too, if you had gone with one boy steadily for eight or nine months, and you were in love with him, and you suddenly started reading in gossip columns that you were romantic about two dozen other fellows. I wanted to stop those phony rumors—but in a hurry.

"How did the romance start? Like something out of fiction. When I was making 'Forty Little Mothers' at M-G-M, John would see me in the commissary every noon. He noticed that I didn't fall in my soup from excitement when Gable walked in—which made him decide that I was 'different.' But he could never catch my eye. I began getting daily bouquets from somebody named 'John.' I had no idea who 'John' was. Then, somehow, he got my telephone number and started calling. I made Mother answer. He finally said to Mother, 'Can't you persuade your daughter to go out with me just once? Really, I'm perfectly harmless.' And she finally made a date for me to go to lunch with him. He asked her along, too—which made a deep impression on both of us. Most men can't be bothered with a girl's mother. And I was pretty impressed when I met him.

"The night we had decided to elope, I was in Riverside on location. Mother was with me, and I had the hardest time, getting away from her, getting her off to a dinner party. On top of that I had sprained my ankle that day and it was all taped up. I had my foot in a moccasin, and I was supposed to drive to Santa Ana to meet John. But I got there!"

She wasn't afraid for her marriage because of her career. "There's no danger of professional jealousy, because John and I are in different phases of the movies, and any publicity I get won't bother him, because he doesn't pay any attention to those things—and neither will any income I get, because we're going to live on his. And there's no other danger. I'm not career-mad. I want to settle down young and have a home and a family. Also, don't overlook the fact that I understand artists, being the daughter of one! We're living in an apartment right now, but we're looking at lots. When we do build, it will probably be a fantastic house, because we'll build it to suit ourselves, and not care what anyone else thinks. That's the way it's going to be with our marriage. They can think 'it won't last,' but we'll show 'em!"

Yes, indeed, Veronica Lake is different. And—very much of a blonde bombshell!

AS A TRAINED
PRACTICAL NURSE!

Practical nurses are always needed! Learn at home in your spare time as thousands of men and women—18 to 60 years of age—have done through CHICAGO SCHOOL OF NURSING. Easy-to-understand lessons, endorsed by physicians. One graduate has charge of 10-bed hospital. Nurse Cromer, of Iowa, now runs her own nursing home. Others prefer to earn $2.50 to $5.00 a day in private practice.

YOU CAN EARN WHILE YOU LEARN!

Mrs. B. C., of Texas, earned $474.25 while taking course. Mrs. S. E. P. started on her first case after her 7th lesson; in 14 months she earned $1900! You, too, can earn good money, make new friends. High school not necessary. Equipment included. Easy payments. 42nd year. Send coupon now!

CHARLES BUTTERWORTH
Born Charles Butterworth; South Bend, Ind.; July 26, 1899. Law school grad . . . former newspaper reporter (obituary dep't.) . . . maybe that's where he picked up his pious air of a mortician's assistant . . . hollow-voiced . . . master of understatement and vague, irrelevant humour . . . peppermint, pencil, cigar and hotel bible kelptomaniac.

BRUCE CABOT
Born Jacque de Bujac; April 20, 1904; Carlsbad, New Mexico. Attended University of Tours, France. Has a perpetual tan and sex-appeal plus—a masculine Betty Grable. Liz Whitney has a crush on him. He adores calves liver and bacon. Lost a job as sparring partner when he knocked his boss out. Used to be a cowboy, and still jumps into the saddle whenever he can.

Born James Cagney; New York, N. Y.; July 17, 1904. Soft hard guy. Doesn't drink or smoke, but packs a terrific punch. Collects guns, never uses 'em. Spends spare time raising horses. Takes music lessons, wants to play a pipe organ. Loves to read and eat cookies. Sneaks into colored shirt—when wife isn't looking.

RICHARD CARLSON
Born Richard Carlson; April 29, 1913; Albert Lea, Minn. Swears he's going to write the Great American Play. Was Phi Beta Kappa, and taught English in the University of Minnesota. He is a triple-threat man, has an acting, directing, writing contract. Likes moustaches, two clean shirts a day and Strauss waltzes. He'll be a father by Easter. Adores ham and eggs and cream cheese and chives.

JOHN CARRADINE
Born Richmond Carradine; Feb. 5, 1906; in New York City. Cadaverous! 6 feet 1½ inches tall and weighs 145 pounds. A villain on-screen, he's a saint after five o'clock. Brings his wife daily gifts. He is still a Big Apple fiend. Knows practically every work Shakespeare ever wrote. Wanted to be a judge, but wound up on the wrong side of the law—cinematically.

LEO CARRILLO
Born Leo Carrillo; August 6, 1899; Los Angeles, Cal. Has a regular armory of guns, but confines most of his trigger-stuff to shooting galleries. Has a huge menagerie, including two baby baboons. Knows more rope tricks than Gene Autry, and once saved a man's life by a skillful throw of the lariat. Owns five houses and a yacht, but certainly hates to part with four bits for a haircut.

MADELEINE CARROLL
Born Madeleine Carroll; W. Bromwich, Eng.; Feb. 26, 1908. Keeps her dresses for five years . . . and wears 'em . . . sends name of favorite restaurant to friends as a compliment . . . wants to form women's league of nations . . . loves broadcasting . . . terribly afraid of cops and spiders . . . carries saccharine in cigaret case . . . drinks coffee constantly . . . hankers to be a diplomat.

Born Julian La Faye; Mandeville, La.; July 17, 1912. Hit Hollywood because he was tired of "it all." Became a gun-runner at the age of ten. Saw best friend stabbed to death; stopped adventuring for a spell. Studied opera; too tame. Treasure-hunted along Atlantic; found a few dead oysters. Is a crack athlete. Has had no time for complexes.

LYNNE CARVER
Born Virginia Samson; Sept. 13, 1909; in Lexington, Ky. Breakfasts on steak and potatoes while listening to a Brahms symphony. Has a voice trained for the opera, but won't sing for the movies. Swims every morning before breakfast. She writes loads of letters, but invariably forgets to mail them. Has a passion for champagne cocktails.

CHARLES CHAPLIN
Born Charles Chaplin; April 16, 1889; in London. Both his parents were stage people, and his own acting career began when he was six. He came to the United States in 1910, and immediately started his phenomenally successful work for Keystone. Couldn't be more versatile; writes, plays, composes music and arranges musical scores, besides being the laughing-with-tears-in-your-eyes type of comedian.

CLAUDETTE COLBERT
Born Lily Chauchion; Paris, France; Sept. 13, 1905. Easy come, easy go. Keeps "Oscar" in her closet, uses him as a hat rack. Slips garlic in the soup when hubby's back is turned. Always loses handkerchiefs and gloves. Has all kinds of imaginary ills, marrying a doctor didn't cure her. Loves to be babied.

RONALD COLMAN
Born Ronald Colman; Surrey, Eng.; Feb. 9, 1891. A camera fiend . . . friends live in constant fear of untimely exposures . . . loves to play jokes . . . once caught 228 pound marlin swordfish, and never lets anyone forget it . . . thinks he can play poker . . . loves the circus . . . gets slushy over "Danny Boy" . . . wears the most outlandish neckties.

GARY COOPER
Born Frank James Cooper; May 7, 1901; Helena, Mont. Lackadaisical walker, talker, whittler, sketcher, harmonica blower . . . likes best of all his cowboy friend, Slim, planning ahead, cowboy clothes, loud ties, Russian prints, his foreign-made car . . . goes to sleep anywhere no matter what . . . never forgets . . . practices roping on hired calves.

Born John Cooper; Sept. 15, 1922; Los Angeles, Cal. Mad about swing music, guns and swords, photography, acting, pipes, loud socks and sports clothes . . . dotes on dolling up once a month, buying a gallon of gas at a time, his butler, Sunday afternoon jam sessions, boxing, bachelorhood, rising and shining at 6 A. M. . . . Never takes a date to a "dive."

Born James Meador; Feb 4, 1912; Nashville, Tenn. Personal aspirations toward piracy; parental aspirations toward the ministry; compromise in a combination Cary Grant-Jimmy Stewart actor . . . unmarried careerist . . . well-traveled . . . former truck driver, ditch digger, oil field mucker, baseball and football star, boxer and wrestler . . . Kitty Foyle's dream guy.

BRODERICK CRAWFORD
Born Broderick Crawford; Phila., Penn., 1905. Harvard man for one day; deck hand for three years. Had nose broken in a waterfront fight—that's why he looks like a yokel. Hurled from family bosom in disgrace. Mother, Helen Broderick, didn't want another trouper in family. Sonny made good! Owns brace of dogs which are scourge of his studio.

JOAN CRAWFORD
Born Lucille Le Suer Cassin; March 23, 1908; in San Antonio, Texas. Got her movie name through a magazine contest. Is a terrific Garbo fan, and takes her two dachshunds to see all her pictures. Cries at least once a day. Sleeps in a huge bed with a canopy and eats shredded wheat every day for lunch. She runs with her trainer every morning before breakfast, and could probably win the six-day bike races if she chose.

BING CROSBY
Born Harry L. Crosby; May 2, 1904; Tacoma, Wash. Forever turning the tables; changed from playboy into solid family man after marriage . . . made fortune in music although he's unable to read a note . . . went on diet and stuck to Irish stew, fried chicken, biscuits and honey and mince pie . . . proverbial track loser, yet stables forty nags!

ROBERT CUMMINGS
Born Charles Cummings; June 9, 1910; Joplin, Mo. Sticks up his slightly off-center nose at night clubs and meat . . . displays flair on the flute and woodwork as well as for English and Texas accents, getting phone calls meal-time, photography, his Hudson right-hand drive car . . . beams on his terrycloth bathrobe, his pet monkey, Chinese checkers and books.

Born Harry Ueberroth; July 24; in Chicago. Has the widest shoulders in Hollywood. Used to be a model, but don't remind him of it! Would rather be a sailor than an actor. Has a huge appetite, and consumes a five-course meal before going to bed. Chews on ice continually, and smokes an ancient pipe whenever he can get away with it.

LINDA DARNELL
Born Linda Monette Eloyse Darnell; Oct. 16, 1923; Dallas, Tex. Exception to all rules; doesn't smoke or drink, want to marry an actor, believe in kissing a man before she's engaged, like murder mysteries, employ a maid . . . does answer the telephone in person, retain modesty as her watchword, shoot and develop her own movies, want to tame lions.

Born Frank Johnson; Dec. 22, 1916; Chicago, Ill. Has appeared in over 300 films . . . nickname is "Stooge" . . . smokes in bed . . . is an ardent baseball fan . . . can't stand the smell of bathsalts . . . favorite occupation is sleeping . . . has a pet bull named "Pal" . . . detests fish . . . avoids night clubs like the plague.

Born Ruth Elizabeth Davis; April 5, 1908; Lowell, Mass. Has an enormous appetite, especially for mashed potatoes, but never gains an ounce. She is an expert swimmer and when in school used to swim in snowdrifts! Is a chain smoker, loves steak and mushrooms, but won't look at Italian or Spanish food. Despite her newly-acquired, air-minded husband, Arthur Farnsworth, she is petrified of planes.

Born Loraine Johnson; Roosevelt, Utah; Oct. 13, 1920. Joined the Los Angeles Player's Guild under the wing of Elias Day, whose name she later adopted. Born of a family of Mormons, there isn't a single actor in her family tree. Favorite pastime of her childhood was organizing skits and circuses in her backyard. Is one of 7 children, including a twin brother. She loves to read Ogden Nash, and dabbles in writing herself.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

Baby Sandy, appearing in Universal Pictures

Wally Beery was born on April 1, but he's nobody's April Fool! Neither, for that matter, are Walter Winchell, J. Pierpont Morgan—or any of you April-ites. Not that you don't have your giddy moments—the star-gazers tell us you crave Mickey Mouse and Flash Gordon!

You love glamour—in your job, your mate, everywhere—and that high-voltage personality makes you more than a little on the glamorous side yourself! You're an incurable teller of tall tales, but people think you're cute, not obnoxious. You won't play if you're not boss, but you're such fun to work for, nobody minds. You're extravagant, jealous, conceited and fickle; you're generous, versatile, dynamic and affectionate. You're a wonderful, incredible hodge-podge—and many slap-happy returns!

Did anyone ever tell you ...

YOU HAVE THE LOVELIEST EYES !

"Why let other girls get all the thrilling compliments," said a smart young woman we know. "I've proved for myself that Maybelline does make a difference. Now, men often say nice things about my eyes".

Maybelline Eye Make-up is truly glorifying, because it's natural-looking. Your lashes are perfectly lovely with Maybelline Mascara, created for realistic effect — never stiff or gummy. You know, Nature fades out all eyelashes at the ends. Darkened to the very tips, they appear much longer and more luxuriant! Then see how expressive your brows are, when clearly defined and tapered gracefully with the Maybelline smooth-marking Eyebrow Pencil. And there's a soft sheen for eyelids... a flattering background for eyes, in a touch of subtle Eye Shadow. Make your eyes irresistibly enchanting—today—with genuine Maybelline Eye Beauty Aids. Handy purse sizes at all 10c counters.

guard your after-bath freshness with Mum!

Avoid underarm odor! Mum every day helps protect your charm, your job, your popularity!

YOUR morning freshness—are you sure it isn't left in the car or bus on your hurried way to the office? Your evening charm—are you certain it hasn't wilted and faded even before the music swings? Remember, perspiration can start just after you leave your freshening tub—underarm odor can give the lie to your charm before you are even hours older.

Smart girls never trust in their bath alone. A bath, no matter how glorious, only takes care of past perspiration, but Mum prevents the risk of underarm odor to come. Trust your charm every day to smooth, creamy dependable Mum. Keep sure of daintiness!

MUM SAVES TIME! Takes only 30 seconds! Just a pat under each arm . . . and you're through! Can be used right after underarm shaving, for Mum won't irritate the skin.

MUM SAVES CLOTHES! Mum has the American Institute of Laundering Seal as being harmless to fabrics.

MUM SAVES CHARM! Without attempting to stop perspiration, Mum prevents underarm odor. With Mum, after-bath freshness lasts all evening. Women everywhere use Mum . . . yes, and men, too. Get Mum today.

FOR SANITARY NAPKINS. Mum is so safe, so gentle, so dependable that thousands of women prefer it for this important purpose, too.

The greatest star of the screen!

In with the Mayflowers comes a truly original and distinguished motion picture. M-G-M presents the year's outstanding dramatic offering—"A Woman's Face".

★ ★ ★ ★

Joan Crawford and Melvyn Douglas and Conrad Veidt will long be remembered for their performances in this screen play by Donald Ogden Stewart and Elliot Paul.

Produced by Victor Saville, it has been directed by none other than George (Philadelphia Story) Cukor.

★ ★ ★ ★

"A Woman's Face" is your good fortune.

★ ★ ★ ★

The role of Anna Holm fits Joan like a cellophane glove.

★ ★ ★ ★

Following "A Woman's Face" will come in Maytime succession three more outstanding roars from the lion's den.

★ ★ ★ ★

They are—in this order—

★ ★ ★ ★

"Blossoms In The Dust" (Greer Garson-Walter Pidgeon).

"Love Crazy" (William Powell-Myrna Loy).

"Billy The Kid" in Technicolor (Robert Taylor).

★ ★ ★ ★

If you wish to run the gamut of emotions, this is your month. May Goes Metro.

★ ★ ★ ★

But then so will all the other months go that way. Have you seen "Men of Boys Town"? Have you seen "The Ziegfeld Girl"?

★ ★ ★ ★

Those of you who like mementoes and pretty wall decorations might wish to take advantage of a special offer.

★ ★ ★ ★

We will be glad to send you a complete set of four beautiful full color reproductions of oil paintings by famous American Illustrators of their conception of "The Ziegfeld Girl of 1941."

Individual paintings by McClelland Barclay, John La Gatta, Neysa McMein, Gilbert Bundy. Size 9" by 12", full color prints on heavy mat paper. Write Leo, 1540 Broadway, New York, Box 120, and enclose ten cents to cover mailing costs.

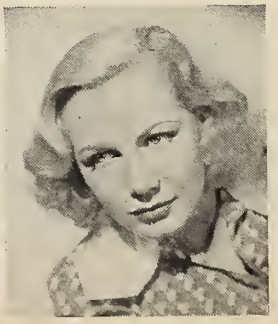
Frances Dee

Born Frances Dee, Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 26, 1907. Back seat driver . . . sits in car with two small sons and reckless hubby . . . terrible temper, throws furniture . . . tries to control herself, no luck . . . eats four apples a day . . . spent a year furnishing home . . . bought broken-down car with first C-note she earned in films.

Olivia de Havilland

Born Olivia de Havilland, Tokyo, Japan, July 1, 1916. Claims she's a Victorian; likes to play "Old Maid." Tries to write romantic poetry. Paints water colors between scenes. Can't cook, doesn't care to learn. Locks bureau so sister won't poach undies. Can bark like a dog, and will. Hates parsnips and early breakfasts.



Richard Denning

Born Richard Denninger, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., March 27, 1916. Joined dramatic club to overcome timidity caused by 230 pounds and nickname "Fatty." Outcome was fiery ambition to become actor. Plays accordion. Likes bowling, swimming, badminton, tennis and horseback riding. Hates airplanes and trains and always travels in his car. Unmarried but plenty in demand. Enjoys card games (but never never gambles).

Andy Devine

Born Andrew Devine, Flagstaff, Ariz., Oct. 7, 1905. Got that wonderful "gravel" voice quite by accident: He tripped while holding a stick in his mouth and jammed it against his vocal chords—thus preventing his voice from changing. Discovered walking down street in his football jersey by talent scout on lookout for "Spirit of Notre Dame" talent. Has Hollywood's best disposition and is as funny off-screen as he is on.

Gloria Dickson

Born Thais Dickerson, August 13, 1917, Pocatello, Idaho. Can't resist any kind of a gooey sundae . . . has a huge collection of costume jewelry which she never wears . . . occasionally indulges in wood carving and clay modeling . . . reads all the best-sellers . . . hates bridge . . . won't go near a prize fight . . . favorite color is blue . . . always has bunches of violets in her room.

Marlene Dietrich

Born Marie Van Losch, Berlin, Germany, Dec. 27, 1904. Strong as an ox, but faints on set because she diets violently. Wears one thread stockings, orders 'em by the dozen. Bakes cakes, and sends white flowers to friends when she leaves town. Studies American history. Gives expensive presents to co-workers, fancies herself Lady Bountiful.

Robert Donat

Born Robert Donat, Manchester, England, Apr. 18, 1905. Conquered a million bogies . . . had asthma, stuttered violently, was scared of the dark . . . owns scores of phonograph records . . . loves to hear wife play piano . . . has bottomless thirst for tea and apple cider . . . rides horseback like mad . . . bets wildly on racehorses.

Brian Donlevy

Born Brian Donlevy, Portadown, Eire, Feb. 9, 1905. From hero of flying corps to collar ad model . . . once posed for photo of Cleopatra when model failed to appear . . . writes poetry, says it's lousy . . . loves gold mining and owns some fat diggings . . . raises dachshunds . . . collects pipes . . . hates his middle name, don't tell, but it's Waldo!

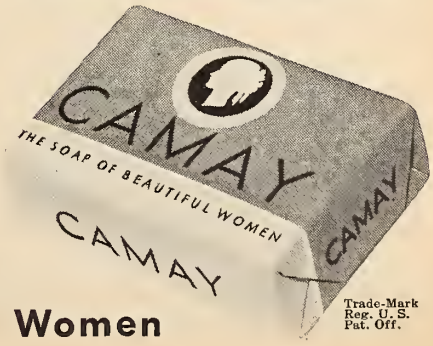
Mr. and Mrs. Leggatt receiving congratulations after the wedding. Mrs. Leggatt says of Camay, "I prefer Camay because of its outstanding mildness. It really is wonderful for delicate skins like mine."

Mr. and Mrs. Leggatt have fun cutting the wedding cake. The reception was held in the Embassy Suite of the Ambassador, famous New York hotel. Then the happy couple left for a honeymoon in the South.

"On my wedding day, my skin looked lovely —and the mildness of Camay helped!"

—Says Mrs. George H. Leggatt, Jr.

Photographs by David Berns



Lovely women welcome Camay's greater mildness—even many with dry and delicate skin.

MRS. GEORGE H. LEGGATT, JR., has a dark, vivacious beauty that makes her the center of interest wherever she goes. Her loveliness is emphasized by a lively, lovely skin.

Of course Mrs. Leggatt takes the very utmost care of her skin. And for her beauty soap she has chosen Camay. Women everywhere echo this lovely bride's enthusiasm for Camay—even many women who feel they have a delicate or dry skin.

For a great new improvement has made Camay milder than other famous beauty soaps tested. We proved this by tests against dozens and dozens of them. Time after time Camay was proved milder . . . milder than these dozens of famous beauty soaps of other makers!

Get 3 cakes of Camay from your dealer today! Put this milder beauty soap to work for your complexion right away!

Movie Reviews

BY WOLFE KAUFMAN

Gary Cooper, the meek, self-deprecotory habo who evolves into the hero of "Meet John Dae," holds more fascination thon just good story moteriol for newspoper reporter Borbora Stanwyck.

MEET JOHN DOE . . . . . ★★★★

Marshalling tremendous dramatic forces behind his theme of potency and pathos of the common man, Capra has turned out a documentary film that succeeds in making good picturegoing. A compelling movie revolt against injustice and oppression, it has a good deal of the same flavor which made "Mr. Smith" and "Mr. Deeds" so strong. It's one of those magnificent marriages of screen creation in which the writing, acting and directing are perfectly blended.

Gary Cooper is a meek, unaffected ex-baseball player who is having a tough time getting enough to eat when chance throws him into the position of a standard bearer for a country-wide "good neighbor" movement. Because of a newspaper yarn, and as a stunt, he becomes the personification of John Doe, is astounded to find himself overnight a world figure, a hero. What happens when he realizes that the moneyed lads who maneuvered him into a position of leadership want to further maneuver him into betraying his fellow John Does is the story of the movie. And because it's played throughout with the human equation uppermost, with speeches that seem to come straight from the heart, it necessarily touches and moves you. The only negative note in the entire story is a conclusion that's weak and none too honest.

It's difficult to discuss the acting, since all of it is topnotch. Aside from the best from Cooper and Stanwyck, there's an inspired job by James Gleason as the tough city editor which should move him back to the very top acting ranks again. Edward Arnold adds to his string of believable character portrayals with a thought-provoking impersonation of a newspaper tycoon. Walter Brennan plays one of his typical vagabond philosopher parts. Spring Byington, Gene Lockhart and Harry Holman are other topnotchers. And don't forget the writer's name, Robert Riskin; he's tops. Directed by Frank Capra.—Warner Brothers.

When carnivol players Bob Hope ond Bing Crosby got together with Dotty Lomour on the mid-Africon set of "Raad to Zonzibor," od-libbing flew so fast Paramount hired an extra script girl.

ROAD TO ZANZIBAR . . . . . ★★★★

It's not very often that a zany comedy belongs at the very top of the column, but this is surely such a case. "Road to Zanzibar" is without reason and has mighty little rhyme; but it's full of fun—rip-roaring, eloquent, constant fun.

Clicking even more pleasantly than in "Road to Singapore," Bob Hope and Bing Crosby are teamed as a couple of American carnival performers stranded in the heart of Africa. While working a series of showmen's rackets to earn enough coin to get back to the good old U. S. A., they bump into Dorothy Lamour and Una Merkel, an American vaudeville team likewise stranded among the natives. The boys go on the make for the girls and the girls go on the take for the boys.

They start on a wild and woolly safari through the jungles; there are slave auctions at which Lamour is one of the articles offered for sale; there are battles with wild animals; there is a war with wild natives (Crosby and Hope double-handedly winning over thousands of armed Africans) and there are a number of songs and dances. And, by the way, there's a healthy strain of sharp satire on critics to make the visiting intellectuals happy.

There's no sense telling you who is better than who in the cast. Everyone seems to have chucked his tongue well into his cheek and gone to town. Dotty Lamour, in an interview, told us that she was scared to death to go on the set half the time, when Crosby and Hope were in fine fettle. But they aren't the only ones deserving praise. Taking an important share in the rumpus-raising are Una Merkel, Eric Blore, Joan Marsh and Luis Alberni. And the picture shows results. Everyone was having a swell time making it, and the audience will have a better time seeing it. There are six songs, and all of them are very okay. A special hand for the magnificent direction by Victor Schertzinger.—Paramount.

★★★½ The Sea Wolf

This version is a bit different in story content from any of the other five screenings of Jack London's sea tale, but not enough so to annoy anyone. It is a big spectacle full of thrilling movie footage in the best tradition, and with a very exciting cast of star talent. Some of you tender-hearted girls are liable to feel the film is too rough and tumble—but if you like your action raw and your spine a-tingle, then this is your meat.

Eddie Robinson adds a strong character portrayal to his list in the role of Wolf Larsen, captain of the Ghost. He is as interesting a psychopathic meanie as the movies have bothered with, treating his men and all life with constant, unrelenting cruelty. He reads books, the classics, he knows the better things of life —and hates them, just as he hates everything and everybody and is despised in turn.

John Garfield and Ida Lupino are two bits of human flotsam who drift aboard his boat. They're both escaped jail-birds, which makes them perfect prey for Robinson's twisted mind. Alexander Knox, practically a movie newcomer, is the fourth member of the top player quartet, giving neat emphasis to his role as a writer who is shanghaied by Robinson and turned into a sailor. He is pleasant to look upon and has a good deal of talent, giving the three stars tough competition throughout.

There are quite a few notable bit players, best among them being Barry Fitzgerald as Cooky, one of Robinson's chief scoundrels.

While the acting is of A-1 caliber and the story exciting, it is the physical production that counts. Director Curtiz has managed to imbue all the sets and action with a surprising amount of verity. The Ghost itself is a boat that you are sure is sailing the seven seas. Throughout you get the feeling that this is not mere movie hocus-pocus but the real McCoy. The technical director, art director and photographer deserve to share the bow with Curtiz and the actors.—Warner Bros.

★★★½ That Hamilton Woman

This is a lavish and colorful production with Vivien Leigh and Laurence Olivier in the leading roles; that should ensure it a lot of attention. It can be recommended warmly, but with reservations. Unless you're fairly keen on historical costume movies, you won't go for this one.

Alexander Korda has given the picture a good deal of loving devotion, and it shows it. It is in extremely good taste and carried out in infinite detail. That is one of the things that is wrong with it; it is so full of detail that it is slow and seems never to get going. Yet in the end one feels the story told is incomplete.

One wishes that there were a bit more explanation of Lady Hamilton's early life and a good deal more explanation of what happened to her after Nelson died.

Vivien is unbelievably good as Lady Hamilton, Lord Nelson's inamorata; she makes the character live and breathe. Olivier is stern and cold as Nelson, a very brutal rendering, but one which will merit a lot of attention. It is a rather easy interpretation of history that Korda has chosen, and the two famous lovers stage a highly interesting battle for the privilege of loving each other in a world which insists on condemning both of them.

Alan Mowbray has the third most important role, as Sir Hamilton, and it is a performance which should send his stock soaring. After going along for years thinking of him as a clown, now he turns out to be a fully versed and subtle dramatic actor. Henry Wilcoxon, Gladys Cooper and Sara Allgood are very fine in support roles.

The physical production is lavish and worth mentioning. Directed by the producer, Alexander Korda.—United Artists.

★★★½ A Girl, a Guy and a Gob

This is the first Harold Lloyd production in which he does not appear, and it's a grand comedy. Lloyd proves emphatically that, aside from being a great comedian himself, he has the rare understanding and ability to pull the wires from the sidelines. The picture is a rollicking bit of merriment with many flashes reminiscent of the clean-cut slapstick which brought Harold fame.

It's a light-hearted comedy, hard to explain. It has a lot of the qualities of "You Can't Take It With You," but also a lot of something else which can only be labeled as high-speed fun. Both George Murphy and Lucille Ball are better than they have ever been.

Lucille is the daughter of a screwball family whom you automatically laugh at and love. Her boy friend is George Murphy, a gob who is labeled "Coffee Cup." Her boss is Edmond O'Brien, rather a stuffed shirt who becomes so human under the ministrations of George and Lucille that he winds up winning Lucille away from George. Not that George cares too much. He's a sailor. There's a girl in every port. But don't get the idea that George is a heel; he is,

DROP IN FOR DESSERT with HELEN PARRISH

BY MARJORIE DEEN

Here's Helen herself—quite the cutest cook who ever fussed with a frosting. She coils the one she's making "Ideal"—and no wonder!

With her mother superintending the job Helen gives the final touches to a cake that's sure to be a stor attraction wherever it's served.

And here it is! A divine Angel Food which she proudly holds aloft for all to admire—and also gives you, here, her recipe to try.

HERE'S A GRAND IDEA FOR A NEW KIND OF PARTY!

Among her friends Helen Parrish is famous for the gay and original parties which—with her family's enthusiastic cooperation—she "throws" on the slightest pretext. An evening of bowling, a morning's canter, a holiday, birthday or engagement, all such events provide the only excuse she needs for staging a gay get-together of her crowd. This includes such bright young luminaries as Mickey Rooney, Ann Rutherford, Bob Stack, Charley Lang, Judy Garland, Bonita Granville and Jackie Cooper.

The very latest thing in Parrish Parties is the "Drop in for Dessert" variety—which means just that in the way of food, plus a lot more in the line of fun and frolic afterwards. Because Helen and her friends often work late at the studios, she devised this new scheme to give everyone more time to dress, grab a quick bite and turn up in time for the sweet course. Imagine what a boon it is to the hostess not to have to worry about late arrivals, not to have to plan on a dinner of several courses, nor on serving refreshments later on in the evening just when everything is in full swing!

Naturally, for such a party a choice of beverages as well as several sweets should be provided. At the Parrishes (in a dining room done in shades of yellow and orange, with yellow daisies and candles on the table) you would find both regular and decaffeinated coffee and, on warm evenings, a cold fruit punch as well. Everything, including the homemade ice cream and several cakes, is served buffet style. We feel particularly fortunate to have secured Mrs. Parrish's very own cake recipes for you. You'll find them pictured here and, in recipe form, on the opposite page. Since Mrs. Parrish is an electric mixer enthusiast the directions she gave us are keyed to the use of one of these fine cooking aids. Of course the same proportions can be followed when you make your cakes "by hand," making due allowance for the fact that you cannot beat as fast or as steadily. We'll be glad to give you her Devil's Food Cake recipe, too, if you just send in a stamped self-addressed envelope. It's as good as all those that appear here, and we know when you've tried these you'll agree that's saying a lot. With such inspiration you'll surely want to give one of these novel parties, too, for your friends, who will then declare you to be "a star hostess" in your own right!

With the toble all set for the porty, Helen Porrish smiles hoppily—knowing the young friends who occepted her invitotion to "Drop in for Dessert" will all simply adore the refreshments she helped to prepore.

PARRISH ANGEL FOOD

1 cup sifted flour
1½ cups granulated sugar
1⅓ cups egg whites
1¼ teaspoons cream of tartar
¼ teaspoon salt
1½ teaspoons vanilla

Sift flour, measure. Add ½ cup of the sugar to flour, sift together 3 times. Beat whites with flat wire whisk until frothy. Add cream of tartar and salt and continue beating until they stand up in stiff peaks—glossy and fine-grained, but not dry. Sift remaining cup of sugar and gradually beat into egg whites. Add flavoring. Fold in sifted flour-sugar mixture gradually. Bake in deep 9 or 10-inch tube pan (ungreased) in slow oven (325°F.) 60-65 minutes. Invert in pan until cold. Cover with Chocolate or Ideal Icing.

GOLD CAKE

½ cup egg yolks
½ cup softened shortening
1 cup sugar
2 cups sifted cake flour
½ teaspoon salt
3 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon vanilla

Beat yolks in small bowl 4 minutes at high speed. Cream shortening in large bowl 2 minutes at high speed. Add sugar gradually, blend thoroughly. Add beaten yolks, continue beating 2 minutes longer at high speed. Stop machine, scrape bowl. Sift together flour, baking powder and salt; add to butter mixture alternately with combined milk and vanilla, at high speed. Scrape bowl, beat a few seconds by hand, working quickly. Pour into two greased 9-inch layer cake pans. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 35-40 minutes.

CHOCOLATE LOG WITH BROWN BARK FROSTING

5 eggs, separated
½ cup powdered sugar
3 tablespoons cocoa
1 tablespoon flour
½ teaspoon vanilla

Beat together yolks and sugar until very light—about 10 minutes. Add cocoa, flour and vanilla, beat until blended. Fold into stiffly beaten whites. Spread thinly in shallow oblong pan (approximately 10″ x 15″) lined on the bottom only with waxed paper and well greased with unsalted shortening. Bake 6-8 minutes in hot oven (425°F.) Turn out on lightly floured cloth and, while still hot, roll up as for jelly roll. When cool unroll, spread with ½ pint sweetened whipped cream or with Ideal Icing. Roll up. Cover with:

Brown Bark Frosting: Cream 3 tablespoons butter with 1 cup confectioners' sugar. Stir in 2 squares melted chocolate and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Add more confectioners' sugar alternately with a little hot milk, until right consistency to spread. Cover log with frosting and scratch through frosting with fork to simulate bark. Helen Parrish also makes "knot holes" in "bark" with the back of a spoon.

HELEN'S IDEAL ICING

1 cup sugar
3 tablespoons water
¼ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon cream of tartar
2 egg whites, unbeaten
½ teaspoon flavoring

Place first 5 ingredients in top of double boiler. Beat until blended, then place over rapidly boiling water. Cook—beating constantly—until frosting will stand in peaks (approximately 5 minutes with electric beater at high speed, 7 minutes using hand beater). Remove from heat, add flavoring. Beat until right consistency to spread.

Does it get you down . . . when you have to get up on washday? . . . It's no fun to face a big family wash with only a 'half-way' laundry soap to help. When you think of the endless rubbing you'll have to do—to get all the dirt out—no wonder you're weary before you start . . .

Those back-breaking chores won't worry you when you wake up to a Fels-Naptha washday. Fels-Naptha Soap gives you two tireless helpers—active naptha and richer, golden soap. Together, they pitch in and do the job in jig time—dislodge the stubbornest grime—whisk it away quickly, gently, thoroughly. Your clothes come out of the wash tub whiter, brighter, sweeter. You finish washday just the way you started—with a smile!

rather, a light-hearted, sweet, young gent who doesn't worry too much about life and stuff. A good guy. You'll probably be sorry that he doesn't get the girl for the fadeout.

All the performances are extra special, with Murphy probably the standout. Edmond O'Brien has a very tough assignment, and the gradual transformation he has to undergo is done beautifully. Lloyd Corrigan garners a lot of laughs as Lucille's brother. Directed by Richard Wallace.—RKO-Radio.

★★★½ The Devil and Miss Jones

Charles Coburn is the front part of the title and Jean Arthur is the Jones part, and that is the way they rate, too—which is the big surprise news. After all these years of expert trouping, Coburn is really on top. This picture ought to establish him as a socko star—well, it will, so why worry?

Aside from the talk that will be caused by Coburn's performance, the story will cause a lot of chatter because of its theme. It is based on the problems of labor in a big city—and it treats these problems rather intelligently although in high comedy fashion.

It seems that Coburn is the richest man in the world and has no idea how the plain people in the world live until he wakes up one morning to find out that he is a stinker. He makes this discovery via agitation on the part of the employees in a department store he didn't even know he owned. They want a living wage and better working conditions. Because he thinks all working people are dolts, he doesn't even trust his detectives to do a decent job, so he goes to the store as a private investigator intending to rout out the "trouble-makers." He becomes so won over by the just cause of the workers that he winds up leading the pickets in a strike on his own store.

Silly? Sure, but you can't imagine how funny it all is, and there's a bitter nub of solid truth under the chocolate-coated comedy antics. The ending is thoroughly pleasant and unconvincing, but it should leave you thinking about what the ending to such a problem should or could be.

Besides the remarkable Coburn job, the cast is replete with good actors. Jean Arthur is as fine as always in the femme lead, a shoe clerk in the big store. Robert Cummings is not as strong as he should be in the role of her boy friend, largely because it is a difficult part, written honestly and with integrity. He is the leader of the workers, the so-called trouble-maker.

Spring Byington, as a sweet clerk in the store who romances Coburn (not realizing who he is), is also exceptionally good and will win a great many new admirers. Edmund Gwenn is best among the many others who keep the picture moving merrily and excitingly throughout all but the last few minutes. Director Sam Wood has added a great many human interest touches which make the picture sound authentic throughout and keep the pace at a high pitch.—RKO-Radio.

★★★ Topper Returns

The newest in the Topper series is a bit of a fooler, because it doesn't concentrate as much on photographic high jinks as the previous Topper pictures, but goes in for more story content via a mystery routine. It's good, spine-tingling fun. Joan Blondell has the invisible femme role created by Connie Bennett, but you won't mind the substitution. Roland Young and Billie Burke are back in their old niches, with all the other characters newcomers.

Introduction of a couple of murders, plus the full assortment of trick panels, sliding doors, secret passages, subterranean tunnels and what have you, add considerably to the fun, while the camera is still doing nutty things by making Young, H. B. Warner and Joan Blondell appear and disappear at will.

The idea is that Carole Landis is Joan's pal and an heiress. Somebody tries to knock off Carole but stabs Joan by mistake. Joan now joins up with Topper (Roland Young) to solve the mystery.

Superb performances are turned in by Young, Warner, Miss Blondell and Miss Burke, with Rochester (Jack Benny's man Friday) not far behind. Donald MacBride and Patsy Kelly get a lot of laughs in similar roles, while Miss Landis and Dennis O'Keefe are satisfactory as the romantic element. Directed by Roy Del Ruth.—Roach—United Artists.

★★★ The Round-Up

Richard Dix, Pat Morison and Preston Foster are starred in this virile western which moves out a bit ahead of the cow-drama brand. Considerable rewriting has been done on this old stage play mostly by way of modern dialogue and situation, but basically it is still a yarn of the old Western days with two men battling for the love of the same gal. A better title would have helped; the picture deserves it.

Foster shows up just as Patricia is about to marry Richard. He used to be her boy friend before he went roaming, and he does his best to break up the romance, even after she goes through with the marriage. All this is highlighted by a background of danger—renegade Indians, rapscallion whites, etc. Nothing especially new in the set-up, but nicely handled and made human by intelligent characterization.

The three stars are topnotch, each fitting a well-defined role neatly, but the acting surprise is a fat boy named Don Wilson. You may remember him as the radio announcer on Jack Benny's program. Well, here he is as an actor, in the role of Sheriff Slim Hoover, and terrific. The boy's going places in movies in a big way, or we are no prophet.

Little Betty Brewer, who has been noted previously, is moving up, too. She's a clever sprite and should be about ready for her break. Ruth Donnelly and Jerome Cowan are best among the other players. Directed by Leslie Selander.—Paramount.

★★★ The Penalty

This picture is what we experts call a sleeper. Behind the hackneyed title lies a tender and moving little yarn sure to please most movie customers. To be sure, the basic story is pretty routine (it's really a modern-day variation of the David Copperfield theme) but there is heart-tug and genuine emotion.

Edward Arnold is a cold and arrogant murderer, and it is pleasant to see him, for a change, as a real toughie, rather than as a polished meanie. His son, Gene Reynolds, worships him, and the old man deliberately trains the kid to grow up into a life of crime. The cops catch Gene, send him to reform school and eventually parole him to Lionel Barrymore, a kindly farmer. When Arnold, in hiding, shows up to take the kid away (the cops having figured on just such a move; using the boy, really, as bait to catch the father) there has been a regeneration. The kid refuses to leave Barrymore, and Arnold, making his getaway, is killed by the police.

Young Reynolds is easily the cast standout in a very tough assignment; this boy has the makings of a very important emotional star. Arnold and Barrymore are both topnotch in contrasting roles. Marsha Hunt and Veda Ann Borg are fine in very short bits, but women don't get much to do in the picture. The writing is exceptionally good, making the characters all sound like real human beings. Directed by Harold S. Bucquet.—Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

★★★ The Man Betrayed

This is a fooler, a picture much better than may appear on the surface yet not as good as it might be. It is a thrilling yarn of crime and corruption, handled in expert fashion with absolutely A-1 acting and directing. It is the writing that is off, telling in a lackadaisical manner of a number of rather hackneyed themes. But John Wayne and Frances Dee in the top roles are really superb.

Wayne is a backwoods lawyer who investigates the death of a friend killed in a big city fight. The death is called suicide, and Wayne, while unwinding the mystery, discovers a whole heap of municipal corruption. Edward Ellis is fine as the big city boss, and Miss Dee makes an excellent romantic foil, which means a triumvirate of excellent performances that can't help but interest you. Both Ellis and Miss Dee ought to be having more movie work of importance than they have been getting. Ward Bond and Alexander Granach help the supporting cast considerably.

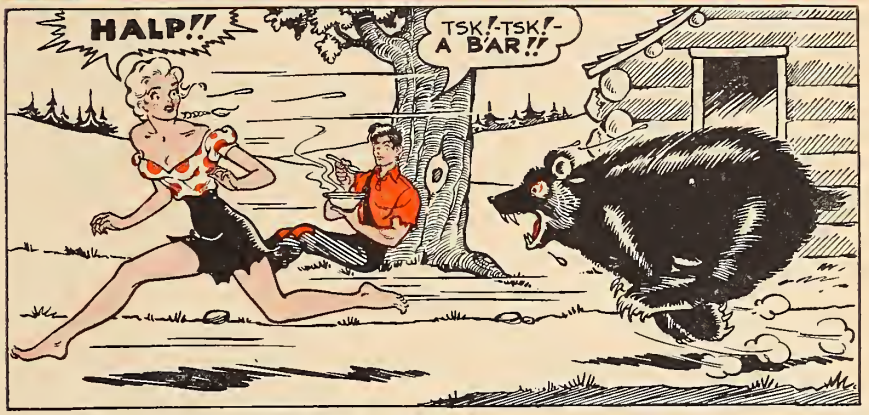
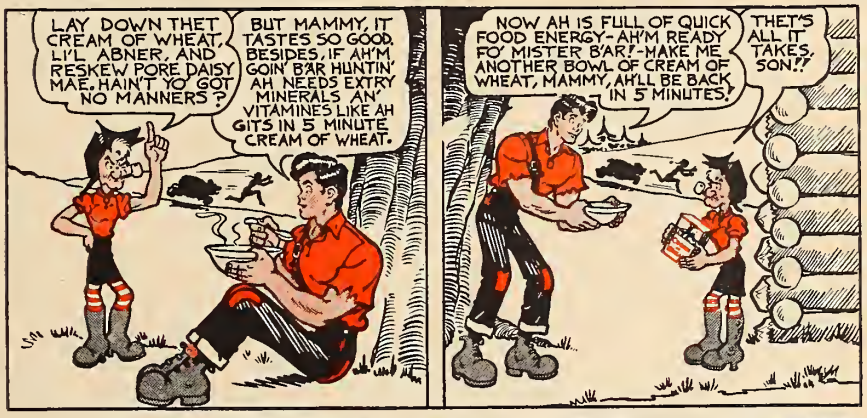
One of the saddest things imaginable is for an actor to get stuck on himself in a certain type of characterization. Robert Montgomery is a good movie actor, with a lot to offer, but he has become so enamored of his work as a psychopath that he insists on repeating it. Okay, a lot of people liked him in "Night Must Fall," and some people liked him in "Earl of Chicago." But enough is enough. In "Rage of Heaven" he appears again as a pleasant-seeming young man who is obsessed by a yen to commit murder.



Let us hasten to admit that a good deal of it is worthwhile. The story isn't quite as phony as the title. It tells of a young man (Montgomery) who is pleasant and sweet enough, but who has a twisted mind which drives him and everyone around him nuts. Married to Ingrid Bergman, he is constantly jealous and attaches his demoniac designs mostly on George Sanders, although professing to be his friend and admirer. It all winds up in tragedy, of course. While it is well done throughout, two of the great faults are that it is slow and there is practically no suspense. Everybody in the audience knows pretty much from the first second what the finish must be.



Besides Montgomery, who is good despite being typed, the cast is in the extra special class. Miss Bergman adds another piquant portrayal to her collection and moves a step closer to recognition as being really important. Sanders is cast against type; that is to say, he is a nice guy for once. It's smart casting, and he comes through with flying colors. Oscar Homolka turns in his best American performance to date as a cranky doctor. Directed by W. S. Van Dyke, II. —Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

MYRNA LOY

Freckle-faced, carrot-topped, genuinely shy and strictly adhering to her father's simple slogan: "Work hard, mind your own business, stick up for your rights and everything will come out all right," Myrna Williams Loy comes natural by her housewifely roles. In private life, she found she couldn't get along without husband Arthur Hornblow and is happiest in the domestic niche buying groceries, puttering around the garden, playing the piano off-key, cooking up new Mexican dishes. He calls her Minnie and showers her with hankies and perfume (she won't have jewelry). Dubbed the girl with the perfect disposition, she rarely talks, but is the world's best listener. Even though she often stays abed all day and gorges ice cream, she preserves her 5' 5", 125-pound figure with exercise and work, i.e., she's a talented sculptress and dancer and is currently emoting for M-G-M's "Love Crazy."

DON AMECHE

Little did Kenosha, Wis., think Don Ameche would turn out to be the local boy who made good. Son of a righteous saloon-keeper (he never let anyone get drunk), Don licked and was licked by more local boys than any other single inhabitant, stuffed mattresses in a factory, rounded the hitherto square street corners with a construction gang, drove his family wild by nonchalantly enjoying the campus life of four different universities and finally gave up education to join a stock company. You probably heard him on the radio in "Betty and Bob" or "First Nighter" a couple of years ago before Hollywood nabbed him. Married to his childhood sweetheart, Honore, he has four boys, Ron, Don, Tom and Lon, vies with them for the biggest piece of apple pie at dinner and is fast giving them a first-hand appreciation of amusement parks! You'll be seeing him soon in 20th Century-Fox's "Miami."

CLIFTON MAUPIN

MARTHA SCOTT

It all happened in a Kansas City classroom when Martha Scott discovered she was sitting at a desk once occupied (consequently sanctified) by Bill Powell, and thereupon vowed by all the gods that some day she would go to Hollywood to see him. In the meantime, a favorite teacher had financed her education and she had taught long enough to realize that she wasn't cut out for the classroom. Running off to Chicago for a lick at the drama, she lent her talents to selling in a candy store and playing Shakespearean roles every hour on the hour at the World's Fair. Several stock parts and "Our Town" on Broadway and she was on her way to meet Mr. Powell! Wed to Carleton Alsop, she lives on a ranch, originally bought to house a horse she won in a bet. Her one and only hobby's the theatre, and her sole sport's batting a shuttlecock around. Watch for her in Columbia's "They Dare Not Love."

BOB STACK

Some guys have all the luck. On top of inheriting a cool two million on his 21st birthday and giving Deanna Durbin her first screen kiss, Bobby Stack was pronounced the "film find of the year" just a few months after he was graduated from dramatic school. Just like that! Born in Los Angeles, Cal., in 1919, he lived abroad from the age of 5 to 11 and forgot the English language to such an extent that his family had to hire an interpreter so everybody could understand one another. In college he played the saxophone and clarinet and sang with the dance band. Lists his first real job as laborer in a Lake Tahoe logging camp. He's champion skeet shooter (has over 50 guns) and no laggard in his racing auto. He adores polo, but has broken his wrist so many times his studio says nay to the game. These past few months he's been romancing with Deanna again in Universal's "Nice Girl?"

ANN SOTHERN

Ann's the most adaptable creature alive! She likes being a motion picture star, enjoys being interviewed and photographed, remains loyal to her friends who knew her when, doesn't mind dieting (no bread, potatoes or pastries), is the life of every party, has something in common with most everyone she meets—speaks both French and Scandinavian, collects old China, enjoys backgammon, adores dogs, and is an ardent reader of Russian history. And it's no wonder! Born in North Dakota between stops on her mother's concert tour, she was shoved around from pillar to post all during her childhood. Inheriting her mother's musical bent, she took up piano, violin and voice and was such an apt composer she copped all the prizes in high school. She first nibbled a musical career torch singing in Ziegfeld's "Smiles" on Broadway. Right now she's warbling in M-G-M's "Lady Be Good."

FRANK POWOLNY

GENE TIERNEY

Everybody at Gene Tierney's select Connecticut début knew something was brewing when she made her bow in an exact copy of one of Bette Davis' "Jezebel" gowns. To socially minded Mr. and Mrs. Tierney it was just one more bad omen that their daughter was hell-bent for a theatrical career. Her dad bargained with her. If she'd give the social whirl a three months' trial and still wanted to act after that, he'd help her make the rounds of theatrical producers. Well, Gene stuck to her guns and not only landed a bit part, but soon was playing a lead in "The Male Animal" and accepting an invitation to Hollywood. Though this 20th Century-Fox star is only 20, she possesses the aplomb of a sophisticated 28 and has such notables as Rudy Vallee, Bob Sterling and Mickey Rooney at her feet. She sniffs all the fresh paint and gasoline she can find, loves to ride and would rather dance than eat.

HEART-APPEAL P

BY IDA ZEITLIN

Watch for him in "The Great American Broadcast."

To get an accurate picture of Cesar Romero, you've first got to toss the caricature overboard. Tall, dark and Cuban, he looks like the popular conception of a lady killer, a smooth operator, a professional bender-from-the-waist—a conception nailed by the sheiks and gigolos he's played. He can't help his looks or his parts, but they belie him. He's well-bred, but doesn't work at it. "What's he got that other men haven't?" someone asked Ann Sheridan when she used to go out with him in the pre-Brent days.

"Manners," she said dryly. "He doesn't make passes."

Legend paints him as a glittering man-about-town, stepping out nightly with a fresh cutie on his arm. Actually for every evening at Ciro's, he spends two dozen at home with his family or friends. He's been publicized as a fabulous spender. There's nothing fabulous about him but his good humor, and the one thing likeliest to explode it is the above-mentioned brand of publicity. He says stories tagged "This Girl Can Have Me" or "Cesar Romero Hunts for a Wife" burn him up because they're untrue, unfair to him and the people he's seen with, and make him out a dope. He thinks reader reaction to such stories is, "Who does that ham think he is!" and if it's not, it should be. He accepts his share of responsibility for the false buildup. During his first three years in Hollywood, having been told that contacts were important, he accepted all the invitations he could handle. That's long been a phase of the past. Almost all the girls he used to date are now wives. "It was practically marriage insurance," he says, "to go out with me." He had too many responsibilities at the time to afford taking on more.

At 34, Cesar's getting distinguishedly grey at the temples. Adores showing visitors all the local hot spots. This is Mrs. Julian Chaqueneau, a fellow New Yorker.

His sense of responsibility has been sharpened by two factors—devotion to his family and sudden changes in fortune. He knows what it is to have fancied security and lost it. When he was fourteen, his father's prosperous exporting business failed. His mother, accustomed to luxury, cheerfully turned chief cook and bottle washer. They insisted that Maria, a year older than Cesar, should finish her course at Barnard, after which she taught French and Spanish in an Asbury Park high school. Between them, she and Cesar kept the family pot simmering, with Maria doing the lion's share, since her brother's income from show business was often non-existent. Which is why he revels in looking after them now.

They live in an attractive apartment. Cesar's father, a semi-invalid, leads a quiet life. His mother is cheerful and active as ever, though no longer with housework. Her wide circle of friends includes the mothers of Ty Power and Virginia Bruce. Cesar hates to write letters, so Maria takes that job off his hands. Young Edward will be graduated from USC this year and plans to join the navy. Grace, the second sister, went back east to be married and six months ago presented Cesar with a nephew, named Bob Hope after his father—no connection with the Paramount or Pepsodent Hope.

After years of apartment living, Cesar moved into his own home eight months ago. He'd long wanted to build but kept putting it off till next year, because how did he know how long he'd last? Time passed, he continued to work and he found a site in Brentwood, practically surrounded by friends. He liked the idea of moving in among them and decided to do it then instead of waiting forever till next year.

So the two-storied Pennsylvania Dutch farmhouse of white-painted fieldstone and wood went up, with its shingled roof and nine rooms, mostly pine-paneled. He loves the bright informality of early American furnishings, and the place is gay with rag rugs, copper round the fireplace, burnished cherry and maple. Kay Salkow, wife of the writer, who helped him decorate, discovered an old lady who all her life had been collecting the kind of stuff Cesar craved. Her kitchen table, scraped and refinished, now graces his living room. Her clock keeps time in his hall, and he all but dragged her beautiful old four-poster from under her. Lengthened seven inches to accommodate his length, it's his treasure of treasures.

Cesar (with Alice Faye) radiates sophistication in his tux and Cisco Kid coiffure—but paradoxically he prefers milk to highballs and cover-up dresses to snaky ones.

The gigantic and jolly Romero, who, incredibly, can knit, sew and cook, approves of director Lewis Milestone's wife, Kendall, because she can rumba. It's his favorite dance.

BLONDES PREFERRED . . .

BY JOHN FRANCHEY

It is a pretty safe bet (three to two, according to Hollywood bookmakers) that Cary Grant and Barbara Hutton will take the plunge this year. There are those dyed-in-the-wool sentimentalists who mention a June wedding. But the more conservative name a later month, if only out of respect for Cary's contempt for the trite and the traditional. You can bet your hope chest that the wedding will not be reeled off in any Little Church Around the Corner. It will be secretly performed and sudden-like.

What makes all this Mendelssohn music seem so probable are the following facts: For one thing, our Cary is devoting virtually all of his conscious hours not claimed by RKO-Radio's exciting new drama, "Before the Fact," to dancing attendance on the ravishing Miss Hutton. To put it plainly, they're going steady, as the saying goes.

Secondly, Miss Hutton, contrary to her original plans, has decided to linger in Hollywood instead of fleeing these parts directly her lease expires—April 1st. At this writing, ensconced in the magnificent Buster Keaton villa, she is shopping around for another house. Miss Hutton is not one to be vegetating in Hollywood when a more exotic world beckons immediately beyond the prow of her gleaming white yacht that's anchored in the bay, if you get what we mean.

Thirdly, the whole shebang of Cary's friends have suddenly become allergic to the mere mention of her name. You no sooner do when they burst into windy discussions of the Academy Awards and wind up by asking you whether you'd like to change places with Jimmy Stewart, who was tagged by Uncle Sam not so long ago.

Anybody but Cary and you'd get a little mad at all the labor involved in keeping posted. You see, with Cary it's like this: He loves privacy and he loves publicity—but he never mixes the two. He'll let himself be interviewed by the right people ("right" meaning anyone who doesn't pry into his romantic life); he'll do fancy mugging on the set for the studio cameraman; and he'll pump the hands of the few visiting firemen that are lucky enough to crash a Grant set. But let a studio photographer try to snap him on the Santa Monica surf hard by his modest little fourteen-room house, and he'll pitch man and camera into the salty brine without a single qualm. That's how it is with Cary.

Miss Hutton makes Cary look like Errol Flynn on one of those Warner junkets in which Flynn gets photographed at least five hundred times. Mortally afraid of a camera, she has been snapped only on those occasions when she couldn't help herself. She has never been photographed (Continued on page 95)

Babs Hutton (with Woolworth Donahue) is said to have paid $2,000,000 for her divorce from Count Reventlow. It's rumored he'll gain custody of their son if she remarries before '42.

EXCLUSIVE! A PEEK AT THE MOST GLAMOROUS

Cary and Virginia Cherrill were married in London in 1934 and took a 14,000-mile wedding trip. They honeymooned in a Hollywood cottage for a year; decided to divorce in 1935. Insiders say Virginia's interference in Cary's money matters caused the rift.

Cary, who'll soon be seen in Columbia's "Penny Serenade," and Phyllis Brooks were engaged for two years. Called it off amicably but definitely in January 1940, for reasons never made public. Dated Fay Wray and Roz Russell occasionally before devoting himself exclusively to Babs.

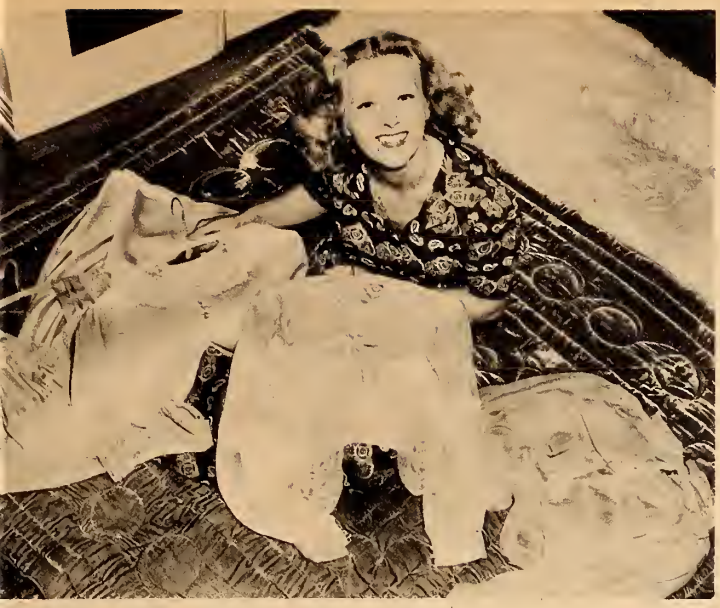
PRELUDE TO A HONEYMOON

DREAM MAN, DREAM HOUSE—AND A BREATH-TAKER OF A TROUSSEAU! LOOKS LIKE ILONA MASSEY'S MARRIAGE WAS MADE IN HEAVEN

This is her white satin bridal nightgown. The day before the ceremony, she dropped over to the beauty parlor and had her nails and hair done—nothing more. She's never had a facial and doesn't pluck her eyebrows.



Closets of towels came with the house, but Ilona invested in a dozen shaggy ones, which Alan adores!

There were no spinster or bachelor dinners, and no showers preceding the Curtis-Massey merger. . . . Few people attended the ceremony. Alan's brother and sister-in-law came out from the Middle West to be best man and matron of honor. . . . They're deferring their honeymoon until July; will then proceed by boat to Rio de Janeiro, where Ilona has a four-week engagement at a night club. The boat trip will take 12 days. . . . Since she'll need a different gown for every evening of her night club appearance, she'll take only 10 or 15 of her own gowns with her, and rent the rest from a costuming Ilona's additions to the house were all her books, 2 heads of herself sculpted by Nelson Eddy and Junior, the dog.

She collects bed-jackets—has dozens of them; hates slips and never wears them. Wears built-up shoes to make her tall, as Mr. C. prefers "statuesque" women to half-pints.

The house, which they bought completely furnished even to the silverware, has 3 bedrooms. Alan's contributions were a picture of himself, aged two, and his record collection.

company in Los Angeles. Some will be the costumes Binnie Barnes wore in "New Wine," and others from "That Hamilton Woman."

In the meantime, they're setting up housekeeping with Junior (a fat dachshund) and Ilona's Aunt Teresa, who has always lived with her. . . . Curtis plans to install a Roman Bath in the garden. (A Roman Bath is just a good-sized bathtub built into the ground and reached by stepping down two steps.) He calls it a "poor man's swimming pool." It will have only cold water running into it. For the city's records it will be listed as a fish pond, and Curtis says he'll have to have a few fish in it with him. If there aren't fish in it, it would be called a swimming pool and he would have to install a costly filtering system. The bath will cost $200.

The gorgeous groom, whom Ilona's known for 2½ years, used to be a collar ad. His trousseau includes 3 new suits, 12 shirts and 6 neckties. (Turn to page 85 for a list of hers.)

Alan, who wears a gold wedding band, helped pack for their brief wedding trip. He'll have to get a draft board O.K. when they go on their real honeymoon to South America.

They always use table mats—own no formal dinner cloths, as they rarely entertain. Cesar Romero's their most frequent guest. Alan and Ilona loved co-starring in "New Wine."

VILLAIN BY accident

BY BETTY HARRIS

Strictly off the record—that black sheep, Conrad Veidt, has a Bob Hope-ish sense of humor and a heart of gold!

When you saw "The Thief of Bagdad," you were supposed to hate the suave, sinister Hindu fakir who coveted the girl loved by the handsome Prince. You weren't supposed to write in and say that if you had been the girl, you would have chosen the fakir.

And when you saw "Escape," you were supposed to hate the cultured, cold-blooded German general, who didn't intend to let either the Countess or her friends get away. You weren't supposed to write in and say that you were sorry to see him die.

The boys who handle the incoming mail at the Culver City Post Office haven't seen so many letters addressed to any one actor in years. "Who is this Conrad Veidt?" they want to know. "And why is he getting so much mail?"

That's something that the boys at M-G-M would also like to know. They have all the curiosity of scientists who wonder what produces lightning—because sometime they might want to launch a thunderbolt intentionally.

They may tell you that they knew all along what a sensation Conrad Veidt (pronounced Vite) would be. But the fact remains that he arrived in Hollywood, less than a year ago, without any ballyhoo. No one predicted his popularity. No one thought of advertising his appeal. No one dreamed that this man who played villains would soon get as much fan mail as the Gables and the Taylors, and for the same reason—his hypnotic effect on women.

He is an unforeseen phenomenon. And an unexplained one. He has something that no other screen villain has ever had. But what, people don't exactly know.

He isn't a young man. He isn't a dashing romantic type. People talk vaguely about his striking appearance, his extraordinary height and his lean, angular, ascetic face. They discuss his piercing eyes, his intense mind, his poise, his "continental charm," his foreign accent. But they can't explain his fascination. They are beginning to have the suspicion that he is an extraordinary actor.

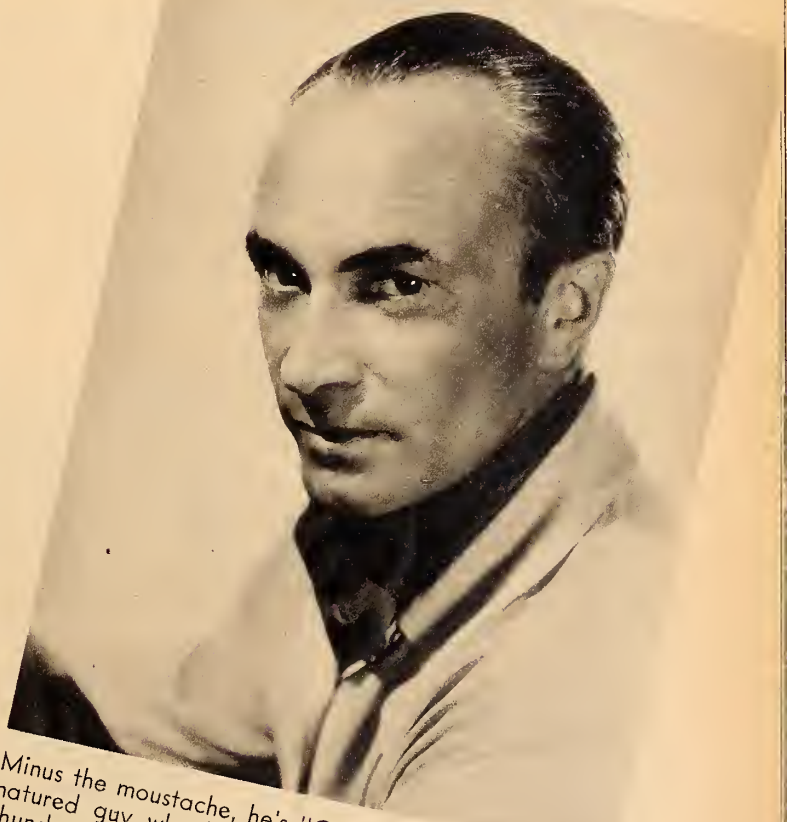
How did he become such an actor? What is his story? How does he explain Conrad Veidt?

He says, deprecatingly, that he is more baffled than anyone by the fan mail he is getting. He says, smiling, "I thought I was past such things. I am 48, and not afraid to admit it. Also, I was in Hollywood once before, and such things did not happen. When I came this second time, I expected people to say, 'Oh, yes, Conrad Veidt. I remember seeing him when I was little. A long time ago.' That is, if they said anything. Because, this time, I came without even being invited. I had just finished a picture in England called 'Contraband.' I came over here to edit and release it. I had no plans beyond that."

What did happen when he was in Hollywood before?

His smile widens. "Let me tell you about it."

John Barrymore brought him to Hollywood in 1926. John had seen him as Ivan the Terrible in the German picture, "Three Wax Works." And John had immediately cabled him: "HAVE GREAT ROLE FOR GREAT ACTOR. WILL YOU ACCEPT IT?"



Conrad Veidt says he never feels really wicked unless he's wearing a moustache. Is terrifically sinister and diabolically charming in "A Woman's Face," with Crawford.

"I said to myself, 'Why not? You don't know if Barrymore is flattering you or not, but you do know Hollywood is the center of things.' I cabled back: 'LEAVING IMMEDIATELY.' I had never been in America before. I was filled with boundless illusions. I imagined what New York would be like, and it was more wonderful than I had anticipated. Everything in this marvelous country exceeded my expectation—the height of the buildings, the luxury of the hotels, the size of the station where I boarded the train for Hollywood. The train, itself, was a super-train. I stopped wondering what Hollywood would be like. I was positive that, when I stepped off the train in California, I would find myself in a paradise of palms and flowers. Instead, I found myself in the most frightful, dismal railroad station in the world. (Now vanished.) Without a palm or a flower anywhere in sight.

"On the platform stood a man in the costume of the old French court, with make-up on his face. It was John Barrymore. The first thing he said was"—and Veidt mimics Barrymore's facial expression and vocal inflection— "'My God, are you tall!'" (Veidt is six feet three.)

"He led me to a big limousine, and the next thing I knew we were going 80 miles an hour through the streets of Los Angeles, with two motorcycle policemen leading the way. I was no longer disappointed. This was the Hollywood I had pictured. And I became even more cheerful when we reached the Ambassador Hotel, and I saw some palms (Continued on page 79)

Minus the moustache, he's "Connie"—a lovable, good-natured guy who hates to wear a tie, loves picnics, thunderstorms, sailing and long, aimless motor trips.

Case No. #2180—The Nick Harris Detective Agency

Report of Operatives #174 and #110

In Re. Investigation: Ann Sheridan

Pursuant to instructions from the General Manager, Operatives No. 174 and No. 110 secured an automobile and a miniature camera equipped with telescopic high-powered close-up lens, and drove to North Hollywood where Operatives were detailed to keep the home of Ann Sheridan, the Subject in this investigation, under surveillance.

Upon arrival at 9:25 A.M., Operatives noticed that the house was a low spacious Spanish type of home containing about seven rooms.

Operatives first observed the Subject at 9:31 A.M., dressed in dark brown slacks and tan silk shirtwaist, apparently doing exercises to martial music. Operatives approached the house and noticed about 200 records stacked on the floor beside a combination radio-victrola. Operatives also noticed that someone had chalk-marked the window screen with the word "Oomph."

The Subject, hereinafter also to be referred to as "Miss Sheridan," continued doing exercises until 9:40 A.M., and then entered what seemed a breakfast room and had her breakfast, which lasted until 10:20 A.M., reading a book throughout the meal. She then came out of the house with a dog, a toy French poodle which she addressed as "Amos." Miss Sheridan, upon reaching the house-gate, encountered a dark-haired woman dressed in a black and white checked coat and white hat and stopped to chat for a few minutes. The dark-haired woman walked down the street, and Operatives noti she entered the house next door to the Subject's. Miss S then walked to the mail box situated at the curb and too parcel. She removed the wrapping, revealing a copy of E. magazine.

At 10:36 A.M., Miss Sheridan returned to the house, and Opera saw her go into the kitchen and get what seemed to be some dog f for "Amos." While in the kitchen Miss Sheridan talked briefly to heavy-set Negro woman dressed as a maid. She then returned to the living room and Operatives saw her getting into a chair to read a book entitled "Out of the Night." Miss Sheridan left her chair twice to answer the telephone, once at 11:15 and again at 12:15 P.M.

The Subject kept reading until 12:30 P.M., when she arose and placed the book on a shelf. Operatives noticed her again at 1:03 P.M., when she came out of her house wearing a long dark mink coat over a black dress, and went to the garage and got into a black Packard coupé. At this time Operatives also want to mention that they noted another girl around the house whom Operatives later learned was known as "Gwennie," a companion of Miss Sheridan's.

The Subject left her home alone and drove to a drugstore at the northwest corner of Ventura Blvd. and Mariotta Street, entering same at 1:10 P.M. Sitting at the counter, she ordered a pimiento cheese sandwich on white bread and a Pepsi-Cola. After finishing her lunch at 1:40 P.M., she made one telephone call, which lasted five minutes. She looked around the store for a while and then left. Walking leisurely she returned to her car and drove to the Studio City Theatre on Ventura Blvd., where the picture being shown was Warner Brothers' stirring "Santa Fe Trail." (Continued on page 75)

Called one of her cronies at Warners. Had to use a phony name, as no one there was supposed to speak to her.

Swapped her slacks for mink and was off in her dusty last year's Packard coupé for a drugstore lunch in town.

Dieted to keep that oomph. Every studio was bidding for her, but her Warner contract has 4½ yrs. to go.

Went to "Santa Fe Trail" for the third time. Most afternoons she gardened, took a drive or studied Spanish.

Edward Arnold and Ken Carpenter, representing sponsors Screen Actors Guild and American Federation of Radio Artists, auctioned off Roosevelt's campaign hat for $3200!

Everyone and his brother were there, from the most insignificant bit player to top-notchers like Motion Picture Academy head Walter Wanger and Joan Bennett, annual Gambol's best-dressed patroness.

Red Skelton gave old-timers Laurel and Hardy their stiffest competition for comedy honors. Red's imitations were hit of impromptu floor show in which stars entertained one another.

The Welles-Del Rio Romance

If Dolores becomes Mrs. Welles, it'll be her third marriage. Married first at 15, was widowed a few years later. Orson married at 19. Has a daughter, 3, named Christopher.

First bond between Orson and Dolores was love of music. She has Hollywood's most phenomenal classical record collection (over 3,000).

Orson, whose real name is George, wrote a text book on Shakespearean drama at fifteen. Revenue from his books is now in six figures.

THE AMAZING STORY OF TWO PEOPLE, DISILLUSIONED ABOUT LOVE, WHO'VE FOUND COMPLETE HAPPINESS TOGETHER!

BY JAMES REID

Orson Welles has never been one to shy away from doing the unorthodox, unapproved thing, or one to hesitate about going after whatever he wanted. Naturally a great many people strongly suspect that when he decided he wanted Dolores Del Rio, he didn't hesitate about going after her, even though it meant breaking up her nine-year marriage to Cedric Gibbons.

They're thinking of how, in his late teens, Orson went after a Broadway reputation, and got it—with his prodigious experiments as an actor, director and producer. And of how, in his early twenties, he set out to be radio's biggest sensation and was—with his dramatization of an invasion of the United States by monsters from Mars. They're remembering how he went after, and obtained, a movie contract such as no one had ever had before—a four-way contract to act, write, direct and produce—at the age of 24. They're thinking of how he determined to set Hollywood on its ear with his first picture, and of how, at the age of 25 he has carried out his intention. "Citizen Kane" is a sensation, not only because a certain publisher is trying to have it suppressed, but because in every department, it revolutionizes the business of movie-making.

It's easy to believe that anyone capable of doing all those things would also be capable of taking a Glamour Girl away from her husband.

But, strange as it may seem, that isn't the explanation of the fact that Dolores Del Rio is no longer Mrs. Cedric Gibbons. Orson may have broken all kinds of taboos to win the world's attention. But he didn't flaunt convention to win Dolores. In fact, he came to Hollywood with the definite idea that she was the one movie actress he didn't want to meet. It was a fixation with him. He had had that idea since the first time he had seen her on the screen. He was 14 at the time. (Dolores was 21, though she looked older.) He had decided then that she was the most beautiful woman in the world, and he was afraid meeting her might spoil his illusion. He might find out that "the most beautiful woman in the world" was as stupid as she was beautiful. And he brought that phobia to Hollywood with him.

He arrived in early August, 1939, and among the first invitations he received was one from Jack Warner. Though he was brand-new to Hollywood, he knew that when the Jack Warners invite you to a party, you gratefully accept. However, there's a strong chance that he would have shattered tradition and stayed away, had he known that the festivities were to celebrate not only Jack Warner's birthday, but Dolores Del Rio's. He didn't find that out until he was actually at the party.

He saw her the moment he stepped into the room. She was at the other end talking with someone. He hoped that he could just look at her and not have to meet her. Then he discovered that she was one of the hostesses and he realized with dismay that it would be impossible to avoid an introduction. But he put off the meeting as long as possible.

As a much-ballyhooed and unpredictable new arrival in Hollywood, he found himself the object of intense curiosity. He was kept busy answering questions. And he gladly talked his head off, trying to stay away from the end of the room where his eyes kept wandering.

Finally Ann Warner took him firmly by the arm and said, "You've been here an hour and you haven't met Dolores yet." What could he say but: "I've been wondering when someone would introduce us"—and behave as if his words couldn't be taken two ways?

A moment later, he was (Continued on page 87)

Any New York actor stepping through the doors of M-G-M's sound stage No. 27 would swear he was back on Broadway. There are laughs and lights, and all of the backstage hubbub that prevails two minutes before the curtain goes up. It's only when the actor gets close to the scene and sees the cameras grinding that the illusion is broken. And then he knows he is on the gaudy, glorious set of M-G-M's new musical, "Lady Be Good."

Though Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer paid a fabulous figure for the rights to "Lady Be Good," they're using only the title and two songs. Scripters wrote an entirely new story to fit Eleanor Powell, Ann Sothern, Robert Young and John Carroll. They made Bob and Ann a song-writing team whose marital troubles cause Ann to leave home and move in with pal Eleanor Powell. Former suitor John Carroll, a radio crooner, helps mix things up, and matters come to a climax in the court of Judge Lionel Barrymore, who plays Cupid in the modern manner. Laughs are laced all through the plot by Red Skelton, Reginald Owen, Virginia O'Brien and Phil Silvers.

The night club set, where so much of the important action takes place, is one of the swankiest ever constructed for a movie. Skelton describes it perfectly: "It's the sort of place in which you either spend $500 —or you wash your own plates!"

Eleanor Powell's "tap concerto" aged members of the technical department at least five years. They had to build special equipment to catch the image of her fast-tapping tootsies. Five pianos were lined up, and she whisked from one to the other with increasing speed, matching each note with a tap.

Eleanor does one dance with "Buttons," a canine wonder and the sensation of "Lady Be Good." The studio hunted for a cute pup for weeks and finally signed a bright-faced French poodle. At the last minute the poodle got stage-fright and had to be withdrawn. It was then that prop boy Jackie Ackerman ankled in with "Buttons," a little half beagle, half fox terrier whom he had personally trained.

Besides having rhythm, "Buttons" has a terrific temper. But only where his stand-in, a woolly toy dog, is concerned. "Buttons" rips the make-believe pup to pieces every few days.

Between scenes, Ann and Eleanor vie for his affection by feeding him all his favorite foods. "Buttons" is no fool, however. He bounds from Ann's candy to Eleanor's special dog biscuits without revealing the least bit of favoritism. Until the strain gets too great, the smart little four-footer will probably continue playing both ends against his own fuzzy middle!

THE M-G-M LOT ROCKED WITH LAUGHTER WHEN THE "LADY BE GOOD" CAST TOOK OVER!

Powell and Skelton rehearse, while composer Silvers and Sothern (who wears 35 Adrian gowns) heckle. Ann breaks her no-more-singing-roles vow—sings Jerome Kern's "The Last Time I Saw Paris" which cost Metro $10,000.

When the cast discovered "Buttons" had no chair he could call his own, they petitioned for one! Eleanor sports a clip that's an exact replica of him.

This is Eleanor's first picture since her operation a year ago. She's already plotting a Pan-American good will trip to teach South Americans our latest dance steps.

Next to Harpo's visit, biggest calamity to befall Eleanor was getting locked in a dressing room. She used Jeanette MacDonald's 'till her own was completed.

Pandemonium breaks loose when Skelton and Carroll start tossing gags back and forth. An ex-vaudevillian, this Skelton's second picture (first was "Flight Command").

George claims he has the "disposition of an angel." However, he's irked by people who mispronounce his last name. It's "Saunders." He's back on his home lot, 20th Century-Fox, for "Man Hunt."

HOLLYWOOD'S MOST BAFFLING BACHELOR

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

INVADING THE MUCH-TOO-PRIVATE LIFE OF HOLLYWOOD'S HEAVENLY HERMIT—GEORGE SANDERS

This George Sanders is a strictly unreliable guy, take it from me.

On the screen he's been playing mainly Nazis and no-goods for five years—and look what happens! All of a sudden women everywhere go mad about him. They write him mash notes and tell him he has more charm than a cobra and won't he please reform (with their affectionate aid)? And he says uh-uh.

Off the screen it's even worse. Unless he's pinned down on the set he's as hard to grab as a taxi on a rainy night. Nobody knows for sure what George is up to or why. They can't find him at Hollywood hangouts or track him down to his dwelling, because he's always shifting it around like a turtle. He's lazy, lackadaisical and as independent as a tomcat.

The only time on record George reacted violently to anything in Hollywood was when Maureen O'Hara, who lived next door to his temporary hideout, let a firecracker get out of hand last Fourth of July. It lit under George's window and went "blooey!" He bounded out in his pajamas and gave her both barrels on the subject of obnoxious neighbors. Maureen's Irish spit back sparks and for some minutes it was a grand and glorious Fourth. Then George went back to bed, since it was only 3:00 P.M. and practically the crack of dawn for him.

George is a big moose of a man with shoulders like the Golden Gate Bridge and a jaw slightly on the lantern side. The statistics are six feet three and 215 pounds which would look nifty in a prize ring. Matter of fact, in college George boxed a bit, and swam too—enough to drag a few people out of the Thames, a creek near London. But now, at thirty-four, the word "exercise" makes George wince. "Nothing more strenuous than chess," he protested. "I keep my weight down by smoking cigarettes." Then he yawned and stretched out on his spine. "This," observed George, "is the only reasonable position for a man of intelligence."

Around town, I'd better explain, George Sanders is already a legend. He'll admit he can sleep twenty-four hours at a stretch without the slightest toss or turn. Even on sets, with assistant directors barking on all sides of him, George periodically pounds his ear when there's as little as five minutes between takes, rousing at the cry of "Action!" and spouting dialogue a mile a minute.

He's not the kind of Britisher who dresses for dinner deep in an African jungle. He'll spruce up sometimes to the extent of a tweed coat, soft collar and tie. But the number twelves he parked against the wall the day I saw George were sheathed in cozy carpet slippers. "You should see me when I'm relaxed," grinned George, "I go barefoot."

Now all these defections trace, perhaps, to the fact that George Sanders is one-quarter Russian. He was born in St. Petersburg—before it was Petrograd and then Leningrad—and even went to Russian grammar schools, because his mother was half Muscovite and his pop was an Englishman in business there. Then came the Revolution and, being capitalists, the Sanders assumed the position of the fox in a foxhunt.

For a time there it looked as if George would never survive to give girls the flutters in Hollywood. George can recall, in particular, hot-footing it with his maw and paw across a frozen Russian river, pursued by a very (Continued on page 97)

George Sanders, whom John Barrymore calls "one of the greatest actors in the world," was once in love with Margaret Lindsay. Says the woman he'd most like to meet is the Duchess of Windsor.

Between scenes on the "Tom, Dick and Harry" set, director Garson Kanin talks baseball with Rogers and Murphy. Ginger, who's a Joe di Maggio fan, was the star pitcher on her high school team.

Dress designer Walter Plunkett says Ginger's the type for sophisticated clothes. Was voted the typical American girl by fashion experts.

Ginger's favorite orchestra leader is Johnny Green (above), husband of her pal, Betty Furness. Favorite movie people are Spencer Tracy and Peg Sullavan.

Two months ago they crowned a redhead queen of the movies. It was a popular choice, the general feeling being that Ginger had earned her honors the hard way. Hollywood likes and respects what it knows of her, but doesn't know much.

She's looked upon as a semi-recluse. In the movie dictionary a recluse is one who stays away from the night spots. Ginger's a "semi" because she steps out now and then. In the pre-Hutton days, she and Cary Grant made an occasional twosome. But her name has been seriously linked with no man's since the Howard Hughes whirl. As three consecutive dates add up to romance in the gossip columns, the inference is plain. They may note that she danced at Rhum-Boogie with Raymond Hakim, producer of French pictures, or that "she's seeing the town through the eyes of Phil Silvers" (musical director) —but their hearts aren't in it. When Mrs. Rogers comes to town—she divides her time between New York and Hollywood—Ginger goes out more often.

But the deftest illusionist couldn't pull a convincing moonlight-and-roses throb out of an evening spent with your mother and two escorts.

She believes in keeping your private life private. She has few intimates and those few, taking their cue from her, remain uncommunicative. At least once a week she has dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Leland Hayward (nee Margaret Sullavan) or they with her. She dotes on the Hayward children, and the only photograph on her dressing table at home is of Brooke, the eldest.

Other close friends are Florence Lake, who used to be in the movies, and Deems Taylor, musician and critic. Three pictures hang above the couch in her studio dressing room—two charcoal drawings by herself of Katharine Cornell and Ginger Rogers and a photo of Taylor. When she rests on said couch, she sticks under her head a down pillow in a slip of skyblue Irish linen on which her monogram is embroidered in white. It was made for her by the girl who used to handle her studio publicity. We all know the sensation of loving some inanimate object among our belongings as though it were alive. That's how Ginger loves her pillow.

It was her passion for music that formed the original bond between her and Deems Taylor. Passion isn't too strong a word. She has a Capehart in her workroom at home, another in her permanent studio dressing room and a smaller machine in her portable dressing room. During short waits between scenes she'll knit. But with the prospect of more than ten minutes ahead, she goes to her dressing room and listens to as much of a symphony as time allows. She owns a magnificent library of symphony records, and it's part of her secretary's job to keep it up to date.

On the set of "Lucky Partners" a package arrived for her one day. She's a child about packages and surprises. So long as it's something to open, she gets excited. In her eagerness to (Continued on page 77)

SMOOTHIE !

OOMPH BOY TONE DIDN'T GET WEALTH

"I buy clothes about every three years," says Franchot, "which accounts for the fact that I'm frequently shabby-looking."

Franchot, currently starring in "She Knew All the Answers," is 14 years older than twice-divorced 22-year-old Carole Landis.

Franchot Tone has rediscovered Hollywood and he thinks it's nifty!

When he pulled up stakes almost two and a half years ago, he left behind him a bewildered little hamlet. Was he through with pictures? Would he ever return? When? Why was he leaving in the first place, a man with a future like his?

Well, the refugee is back, as you know, and Hollywood is glad no end, especially the bachelor ladies, who were among the town's loudest mourners. Mr. Tone is, himself, pretty gleeful about it.

He gave us the whole story the other day, relaxed on a divan in the lush living room of the house he shares with Burgess Meredith. It used to be the Wayne Morrises' love nest, and it's as lavish as a Cecil B. de Mille set.

Mr. Tone was in excellent voice indeed, dressed in an odd brown tweed jacket, slacks and brown moccasins, his Scottie lying in magnificent boredom at his feet.

"I left Hollywood for a post-graduate course in acting, first with the Group Theatre, then with Lee Strasberg. For the former I did 'The Gentle People' with Sylvia Sidney. Under Strasberg's direction I did 'The Fifth Column.'

"I'm happy to be doing pictures again. I do not, as has often been charged up against me, prefer the stage to the screen. I have, however, always considered the stage capable of forms of its own. Today Broadway merely represents plays competing with pictures, using as its main attraction the in-the-flesh appeal. These plays will, if successful, be bought for the moving pictures, which will make them into better entertainment than they were on the stage."

The visiting reporter gasped. This didn't sound like the Tone of the Group Theatre days, the Tone who had poured thousands of dollars into that organization!

Franchot resumed his shocking revelations.

"I like Hollywood as a place to live very much. Unfortunately the ballyhoo has made it seem like no other spot in the world, intellectually, morally and ethically. Actually I'm afraid it's like any other town in America, except that there are far more beautiful, witty and open-pursed people around than anywhere else. I particularly love the feeling of a community which sprawls from the San Fernando Valley hither and thither toward the sea and toward the hills, held together by a common activity in a single industry. It is a big city with small town interests. Here, neighborliness is still a virtue."

Had Mr. T. noticed any changes? Any improvements?

"Yes, I think working conditions are better. Not for the stars and featured players, perhaps, but for the extras and bit players, whose position in the industry was insecure, disorganized, inadequately paid for. The Screen Actors Guild has won great concessions and will solve the problems in time, because the studios are anxious to cooperate."

Mr. Tone took a deep puff on his pipe and cut loose on a brand new tangent without any special coaxing.

"This trip out I'm enjoying myself for fair. For one thing I've discovered I prefer Hollywood routine. So far as an actor's work is concerned, there isn't basically much difference between stage and screen. But take a look at the respective schedules, will you?

"A stage player doesn't finish his stint until around midnight. After a snack he generally piles into bed at 2 A.M., provided that he isn't having what is known as an after-the-theatre date. At best he wakes up at noon feeling logey. The evening performance is ahead of him, and he doesn't want to eat much. Besides that he has to eat dinner around six o'clock, and in New York that means he eats alone. It all adds up to an unsatisfactory existence.

"Now in pictures it's something else again. You're usually through at 6 P.M., which gives plenty of time for a leisurely dinner plus a chat with friends. And you can get to sleep by eleven if you want to." Not that Franchot usually does.

The Tone, who has returned to the Hollywood which catapulted him into the nightly dreams of at least 194,327 college girls, 4,932,843 high school girls and heaven itself knows how many happily married wives and mothers, is a changed man.

He's ready to play any kind of role—provided the part has "character." He's tired of playing the Social Register playboy, the jaded blue blood who's always falling in love with a perfectly wonderful item out of his class.

"I enjoyed immensely playing in my first Western, 'Trail of the Vigilantes,'" he confided with a grin. "Why didn't someone tell me about the horse operas before?"

Would Mr. Tone say a few words about Deanna Durbin?

Gladly.

"If all young ladies of nineteen were as naturally lovely, unaffected, talented and intelligent as Deanna Durbin, America would indeed be the land of the Pilgrim's Pride."

From which you might conclude that Miss Durbin with whom he romped in their joint latest, "Nice Girl?" is somewhat okay.

Mr. Tone was going strong on the Durbin when a huge animal right out of a Disney cartoon bounded into the room. On closer inspection it proved to be a great Dane, roughly about nine feet tall. It gave way when Franchot's little Scottie (Continued on page 89)

AN ACE OF CLUBS

Chief attraction are the green parrots that sway in perfect rhythm to all the rumbas. Walls of cages are let down during the day for sunning and feeding.

Despite all the Latin implications ot its name, the sole south-of-the-border touches at the club are a rumba band and two huge black sombreros on the far wall.

Last summer, handsome silver-haired Charlie Morrison gave up his agency business and headed south to open a night club in Mexico City. He lifted the name "Mocambo" from a guide book, hired a young American architect named Peter Graham Harnden to design the interiors, and was prowling around the Paseo de la Reforma looking for a good location when a wave of homesickness hit him. He opened his club in Hollywood instead.

A new night spot in Hollywood should be as a coal in Newcastle—but Mocambo's clicking colossally! The walls are beginning to bulge from the strain of crowding 400 customers into the 250 available places, so anxious is everyone to find out whose hand Franchot Tone is currently holding, whether Rudy Vallee was successful in getting another date with Gene Tierney, and how soon Charlie Chaplin's weekly visit is going to include the pert Paulette Goddard.

Few movietown night spots have become a habit so quickly. David O. Selznick drops in nearly every evening. Adrian and Janet Gaynor caught the fever early and are constant visitors to the main room for dining and dancing. Ginger Rogers and Howard Hughes frequent the club, but never together or at the same time. Even the colony's stay-at-homes are lured from their firesides. Irene Dunne and Dr. Francis Griffin, Eloise and Pat O'Brien, Carole and Clark Gable come often. And proving that the competition knows a good thing when it sees it, one table last week was surrounded by managers from five rival night spots!

Each of the steady customers has his favorite table. If that table happens to be occupied when he comes in, the customer waits patiently in the bar for it to be

Maybe they don't suspect it. Or maybe they know all about it and just don't want to spotlight the people involved. But whatever the reason, there's a major romance flourishing under the very noses of M-G-M's publicity department—and not a word of it has leaked to the outside world. At least, not a soul has hinted that four-year-old Richard Nichols' feelings for two-year-old Christina Crawford are not purely platonic—and vice versa. Dashing Dickie, appearing with Joan Crawford in "A Woman's Face," was introduced to the alluring Christina several weeks ago when she came down to the set to see her adopted mother. Each recognized in the other something he and she had always been looking for. Dickie invited Christina to play with his toys and Christina blushingly accepted. Christina offered Dickie a lollypop and Dickie nearly choked with delight as he said his thanks. Unhappily, even as in the case of their elders, the course of true love does not run smoothly. Christina can't come to the studio until after she's had her nap, generally around 5 P.M. And Richard, being a minor, may work only a few hours each day and then must go home. In fact, the last time we talked to the half-pint Romeo, he was wailing because the law was making him leave by one door at the precise moment his love was entering by another!

Boys and girls who are trimming their new spring duds with belts, shoes and hats done in Palomino beige probably don't know that each time they don the color, they're paying tribute to a horse! Yet that's exactly what's happening. Here's the reason. Some months ago, Leo Carrillo met the president of the Chrysler Corporation. The two men grew chummy over a few beers, and before the evening was out, Mr. Chrysler Corporation had promised Leo an automobile the exact color of his Palomino pony, Golden Boy. Mr. Chrysler Corporation proved to be as good as his word. Ere many moons had passed, Leo was the proud owner of an $8,500 car which matched his horse right down to the last pore. A famous fashion magazine was intrigued by the story and promptly sponsored the new shade—Palomino beige. Leo's proud of the whole deal, but says he, "Golden Boy is worried. He can't figure out how anything can look so much like him—yet smell so different!"

OF HEARTS AND HOUSES

We don't know why ourselves, but no report on Hollywood is ever complete without a last-minute bulletin on the affaires du coeur of Lana Turner. This column's contribution follows herewith: By our calendar, Lana is now swinging into her seventh month of "keeping company" with Tony Martin. Such consistency naturally gives rise to rumors of marriage, love eternal and all that stuff about "till death do us part." Well, that's the purpose of our paragraph—to explode the idea that the pair has anything of the sort in mind. At the moment of this writing, Lana is buzzing busily over plans for the attractive three-bedroom house she is building for herself and her mother. And Tony, who won enough dough in a single day at Santa Anita to pay for a new home, is spending his spare time shopping for a comfortable bachelor's residence. If we know those two, they're not going to trip to the altar and then trip away again—to separate houses!

Where the truth stops and fiction begins, we can't exactly say. But the story goes that the recent George Raft-Humphrey Bogart fracas wasn't exactly child's play. According to reliable sources, the boys got together on a Warner Bros. sound stage where both were testing for parts in "Manpower." Also present on the sound stage was one Mack Grey, George's faithful companion and bodyguard. If the reports are true (and mind you, we don't say they are), Grey stepped up to Bogart and announced, "We (Raft and Grey) don't want you (Bogart) in our picture." Bogey thereupon saw red and swung at Raft. Raft ducked and the blow caught Grey who went out like a light! Another story has it that Raft wasn't even present at this little tea party. Whether he was or was not, one thing remains clear—Humphrey may have landed the punches, but Raft landed the part. Bogart is out of the picture, and the studio claims he was withdrawn because he was needed for another role!

CONSCRIPTION BLUES

Dat ol' debbil draft, blithely casting his shadow over romancers from coast to coast, isn't turning in his tracks when he gets to Hollywood. Director Garson Kanin will vouch for that. Gar's hankering for Katharine Hepburn is far from the realm of make-believe, yet he'll have to postpone his wooing of the red-topped Katie for a solid year. Gar goes into the infantry early in the summer, and unless Katie is the kind of gal who softens at the sight of a uniform, there'll be a twelve-month's stop signal on the Hepburn-Kanin courtship. Another pair to come face to face with the reality of conscription are Brenda Marshall and Bill Holden. They'd like to marry pronto (and are free to do so), but until Bill serves his term as Uncle Sam's soldier boy, they feel they can't make any plans for the future. Bill hasn't been drafted as we go to press, though he does expect the call to arms almost momentarily.

TO ANNIE WITH LOVE

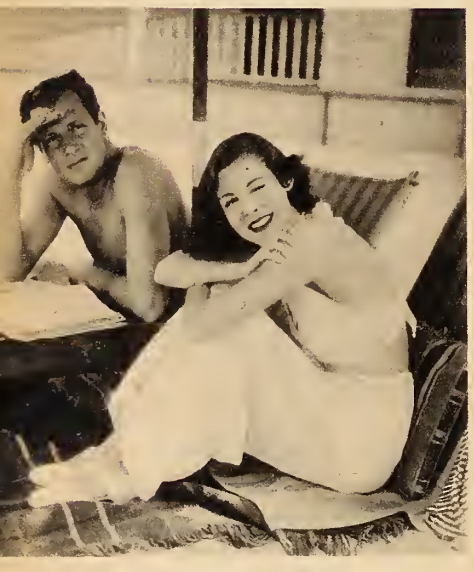
Boy, oh boy, what a boy friend that George Brent is! Ann Sheridan had a birthday a few days ago, and on the night preceding the event, George handed her an exquisite lipstick crusted with amethysts. Since he expected to work the next day, he topped his gift with a kiss, bid his Annie "Happy Birthday" and departed. The following morning, Ann was wakened from a deep and blissful sleep by George's secretary, Rita. "Mr. Brent just phoned," said Rita. "He thinks he dropped his pipe in your garage. Will you see if it's there and call me back?" "Now?" asked Ann sleepily. "Yes, now," replied Rita. "It's his favorite, you know. He's anxious about it." Yawning widely, Ann hustled into a negligée and headed for the garage. Pushing back the heavy doors, she stood blinking into the blackness. Then suddenly she let out a cry. For completely wrapped in cellophane, standing silent, big and beautiful, was a brand new Cadillac coupé! "I thought I was still asleep," Ann confesses. "When I realized I wasn't, I felt like crying. I didn't though. I was afraid the servants would think I was disappointed!"

SON-NY DAYS

The last time he came to Hollywood, Oscar Levant hopped on the telephone and dialed his good friend and one-time teacher, pianist Arnold Schoenberg. Though 68 years old, Schoenberg is the proud papa of a three-year-old son. Oscar, himself a recent father, hoped to get together with his old pal and compare paternal notes. To his astonishment, Schoenberg gave him the cool, cool shoulder. "Call me some other time," he said frostily, "in a week maybe. Or two, or three." Oscar was hurt. Schoenberg had never acted that way before. He put the treatment down to old age and accompanying grumpiness and hung up the receiver. But the whole incident troubled him. A few days later he phoned Schoenberg again. And again he received the same vague, indefinite response. This was more than he could bear. "Arnold," he exploded, "you know me like a brother! What's the meaning of this?" The aged maestro was on the spot. "All right, Oscar," he stammered, "I'll tell you the truth. We had another son yesterday!"

SNAPPY COMEBACK

Ann Rutherford, now twoing with 20th Century-Fox's George Montgomery, will probably be surprised to hear that her handsome boy friend had as tough a time getting the breaks as did many a pie-faced actor. According to George, when he first came to Hollywood he got a heart-breaking runaround. After several months of disappointment, he went to his agent and asked for advice. "Get out of town," counseled the agent. "Lay low till they forget you. Then, some day, we'll bring you back under a new name." "Some day!" gasped George. "How long will that be?" "Oh, about two months," came the too-true reply.



STEP SISTER

Remember, we told you a short while back that dance director Hermes Pan had nominated Betty Grable's figure as the most perfect in Hollywood? Well, now it's Betty's turn to slap back the compliment. Asked to name the best all-'round ballroom beau in town, Betty promptly panted, "Pan!" When it comes to picking the specialists, though, Betty has to run up a long line of movie heroes. Here are the names she'd fill in on her dance card for an evening with the experts: Viennese waltz, Charles Boyer; jive and swing, Mickey Rooney; rumba, Cesar Romero; fox trot, George Murphy; broken rhythm, Fred Astaire. For the tango, Betty selects George Raft. But we've a hunch George could fill Betty's order for anything from the polka to the Virginia reel. After all, wasn't she overheard telling him just the other evening, "I love you so?"

ARMY MANEUVERS

Fans of Jimmy Stewart, Hollywood's Number One Draftee, needn't worry about their favorite falling for a glamorous army hostess while he's in camp. Glamour isn't one of the things the army is selling. They proved it when private Everett Scott came to town to receive an airedale puppy intended to replace "Laddie," the famous dog who died of lonesomeness when Scott was drafted. Slews of screen sirens, including Dorothy Lamour, Hedy Lamarr and Paulette Goddard, offered to gift the young buck private with a substitute canine. It will never be known, however, whom Scott might have chosen as his patroness. His superior, a Major-General Joseph Stillwell, instructed him to pass up the offers of the glamour queens and accept his pup from very girlish, unsophisticated Deanna Durbin! Hoping, no doubt, he would set a sweet example for the rest of the army!

ONE FOR THE BOOKS

It happens every now and then. An autograph hound turns up with such a rare item, he doesn't know whether to hide it in his back yard or turn it over to the Smithsonian Institute. Such an item is now in the hands of a freckle-faced kid who thrust his album into the hands of Frances Dee the other afternoon. Frances accepted the book graciously and, flipping rapidly through its pages, selected a nice, shiny sheet for her message. After a moment's thought she scrawled a few lines and returned the book to its owner. When Frances had gone, the youngster scanned the inscription eagerly. What he saw there made him blush to his hair-roots. For on the page following Joel McCrea's autograph and preceding Rita Hayworth's, Frances had written: "I'd better get in here between 'Papa' and Miss Hayworth —while there's still room!"

TENTH AVENOO FASHION PLATE

For the first time in his flicker career John Garfield is ashamed to be seen in costume. Prisoner's stripes, tramp clothes, seamen's togs—none have abashed the great Garfield. But the latest dish is more than he can swallow. For his part in "Gentle People" John must strut around in flashy duds complete with double-padded shoulders, high trousers and pinched in waistline à la Rochester. John, who's always prided himself on being a plain guy, is so miserable about looking like a "slicker," he's ready to bawl. And that's not the whole of it. Not only does he have to wear the darned things—he had to buy them, too! Studios, you know, rarely furnish players with modern-day wardrobes. So before he could report for work, John had to shell out his own hard-earned cash for an outfit he wouldn't ordinarily be caught dead in!

LOUISIANA PURCHASE

At a nearby studio John Carroll bumped into a clothes problem similar to Garfield's. But Carroll must know all the angles because his turned out much more happily. When the New Orleans oriole was assigned to his newest picture, the studio instructed him to appear on the set with a beautiful, streamlined assortment of "what-the-well-dressed-man-will-wear." John smiled sweetly, said he'd be happy to do as the studio requested —but he didn't own anything that nifty and couldn't buy it, either. Needing him for the part, the studio had no alternative but to send John to the swankiest tailor in town and order him the finest wardrobe money could buy. Since the clothes were built just to fit Carroll, they're of no value to the studio and, when the picture is completed, there'll be nothing to do but turn them over to Mr. C. himself!

COME OUT, COME OUT, WHEREVER YOU ARE

It's been more than a year since newspaperman John Barry began editing Priscilla Lane's heartbeats. Yet in all that time, official Hollywood has never gotten a glimpse of Pat's beau. Contrary to suspicions, Pat hasn't been keeping Barry under cover because he's old or deformed or even plain repulsive. In fact the reverse is true of him. Barry is a charming and attractive young man as the town will soon discover. Pat always wanted to show him off but she's kept him out of public places because she feared she'd run into one-time hubby Oren Haglund. Unlike Alice Faye, who can smile brightly when she sees Tony Martin, or Joan Crawford, who always stops for a chat with Franchot Tone, Priscilla felt a reunion with her "ex" wouldn't be much fun. But she's safe now. Haglund's been drafted and, at long last, the coast is clear.

Step right up, folks, and meet Red Skelton! He's the crack comedian currently threatening the august position occupied by Messrs. Bob Hope and Jack Benny. Like his distinguished competitors, Skelton tells his funniest stories on himself. Unlike them, however, Skelton occasionally tells a story that's true. For example, there's the one about telephones. Red confides he's so allergic to Mr. Bell's brain child, he hasn't lifted a receiver since 1936! Even today if he as much as hears a voice coming through an earpiece, he breaks out in a rash. As a consequence Red is so anti-telephone, he can't even get a phone message straight. "Like the time my manager called me up and said I was to do an engagement in St. Louis," he explains. "I got scrambled on the date and hit the town a week too soon. The theatre manager is still trying to figure out why there were six acts of vaudeville that week!"

Brittle Nails

BY CAROL CARTER

If your nails split, break, peel or chip easily, don't blame your liquid polish. Bring those arid nails back to health and beauty by giving them a little well-planned extra care.

If you live in a steam-heated apartment, if you go in for sports, if you're run-down or on a reducing diet, or if a hundred and one other modern problems of living confront you daily, then you shouldn't be surprised if your nails split, break or become too brittle for comfort—to say nothing of beauty. What your nails need is a little special attention—more lubrication, nourishment and stimulation. Coddle them a bit and they'll respond by becoming as strong and flexible as ever.

Those nails you gaze at so regretfully are similar to your hair in composition and the way they grow. They're made of keratin, a highly resistant substance, and though they're connected with your body, they're only appendages, not actual living parts. Nails are produced, however, by living cells called the matrix, which lies beneath the base of your fingernails, and their health, while developing, depends on the condition of these formative cells. After nails reach the surface of the skin, they're on their own and depend on you for all their care and attention. If the way you live and your activities dry them out, it's up to you to replace the natural lubricants in order to keep them strong and flexible.

Since the nail-producing matrix is fed by the blood stream, the condition of your health affects the growth and texture of your nails. Have you ever noticed horizontal ridges on them? These indicate temporary retardation in their growth. If nails continue to split and break no matter how much care you give them, look into your health, and check your (Continued on page 101)

Winning Hands . . .

Beautiful hands depend upon three conditions—cleanliness, protection and perfect grooming.

You'd think everyone would know how to wash her hands, but you'd be surprised how many girls fail to wet their hands before rubbing on soap, and then neglect to rinse off every trace of soap and soil before drying. Blot your hands free of every vestige of moisture and massage the cuticle and entire finger back toward the wrists as you dry. If you don't take that initial precaution, all the creams and lotions in the world can't counteract your carelessness.

You see, the skin on your hands differs from that on the rest of your body. On the palms there are no oil glands at all, but an extra number of sweat glands. The backs of your hands have fewer oils for natural protection than other parts of the skin and get extra hard usage besides.. That's why you must not only wash and dry hands carefully, but also protect them with a cream or lotion after every wetting, to replace lost moisture and supply needed lubrication.

As a further precaution against aging, unlovely hand skin, apply cream or lotion generously the last thing before retiring each night and always before going out into either sun or inclement weather. A dusting of talcum powder over the cream will give added weather insurance.

Massage increases the good effects of creams and lotions. Start at the fingertips and massage in a deep rotary motion down each finger and back over the wrists. Given daily with a good cream or lotion, this will help ward off wrinkles and rough, unsightly hand skin for years to come.

Besides massage there are many excellent exercises to keep hands supple and soft. Just the simple motion of twisting and wringing them while covered with cream or lotion will do wonders if repeated regularly.

Another good exercise is to clasp your hands together, press fingers downward hard against the hands, then relax. A third beautifying exercise is to hold hands upward, press fingertips together firmly and relax. Still another is to clasp hands together and twist the wrists back and forth, pulling the fingers against one another. Repeat each of these ten times every day.

Rita recommends the daily use of a rich, oily cuticle cream to soften nails and prevent breaking, peeling and brittleness.

Open and close your hands, bending the fingers as far back as possible and try shaking them loosely, as if they were covered with water you want to dislodge. Continue this little exercise for two or three minutes. Take a piece of tough paper and try to wring it just as hard as you can, as if you were wringing out clothes, squeezing and twisting as hard as possible. Of course, if you do your own laundry and wring your clothes this way frequently, you've already done that little beauty stint, so skip the paper wringing.

Another grand little hand and finger limber-upper is to pull on a cord or old towel just as hard as you can with both hands, in opposite directions. Such exercises give not only grace but strength to hands and wrists and firmness to arm muscles, too.

If you want narrower fingertips, you can do pretty well if you're willing to constantly pull and press at your stubby digits. However, the shape of your hands is not nearly as important as (Continued on page 68)

A cream or lotion massage should follow every manicure and washing and be your last beauty rite at night.

Secrets of the Boudoir

BY CLAUDETTE COLBERT
as told to Gladys Hall

Any woman can give the illusion of beauty—and Claudette Colbert proves it!

The first secret that comes to my mind is the rather painful admission that I am a one hair-do woman. One coiffure the year round makes Jill a dull girl, but better a dull girl than a laughing stock. One of my worst fears is that I may sometime be the object of the suppressed titter. That's why I try to avoid extremes in hair-dos, make-ups, hats. They're apt to be plain funny!

If, like myself, you have large features, broad cheek-bones, a prominent nose, no rosebud for a month, large eyes and a large head, you are a one hair-do woman, too, whether you know it or not. The only time I ever change my hair-do is when I play character parts on the screen. Wearing a pompadour, I become the serious type and in the long bob, a siren. Off-screen I can't wear the long bob at all. Never do, for it makes me look too heavy. Besides, I think that with smart clothes the long bob is not very chic on anyone. I've a feeling that men don't like fantastic hair-dos on women, but maybe that's wishful thinking since I must serve a life sentence in bangs!

Claudette's dressing room is done in yellow and features this fabulous 20-drawered dressing table of her own design.

Some women I know have magnifying mirrors in their dressing rooms — illuminated by 100 watt bulbs. I wouldn't have one of those things around for anything. Why torture myself unnecessarily! After all, the human eye is not a magnifying mirror. Mine is a mirror made of pink glass—wonderfully flattering. I don't make up in front of it, use the ordinary mirror for that and face facts, but that last peek in the pink glass is a grand cocktail for the vanity.

Now that my boudoir is giving up its secrets, I may as well let you in on my most important one. It's this: Make yourself as comfortable as you can. When in the boudoir, try to feel as much as possible like a sleek cat upon a silken cushion before an open fire. Cats love their comfort, you know, and that's why they never seem to age. Lazy by nature, I loathe exercises, and only do them when they're fun. That's my motto and one of my secrets—only when a woman is having a good time is she really beautiful. I never have massages, either. They make me feel silly, like a French roll being kneaded, and to me anything that makes a woman look or feel ridiculous detracts from her charm. I always take a hot bath just before going to bed—a bath, not a shower. You have to stand up when you take a shower, and that's not my idea of creature comfort. I stay in the tub at least twenty minutes and do all of my thinking there; even read, occasionally. Whenever I can, I have breakfast in bed; read the papers in bed, do my telephoning in bed and sometimes even spend a whole day there. I look ten years younger when I get up.

Dressing in an attractive room is another important aid to beauty. Why do you suppose the studios provide us with luxurious dressing rooms, tastefully furnished with cushioned couches, soft rugs, drapes and what not. Because they love us and can't do enough for us? Don't be silly! It's because they want us to look our best and know that a charming environment is most conducive to charming results. Not all of us can have luxurious boudoirs, but we can all have clean, neat ones. There's something fussy and frazzling about dressing in the midst of confusion, and it's bound to show. Dressing should be a quiet, orderly process; not a mad scramble, with pin-pricks of exasperation because the mascara brush is clotted, the eyebrow pencil blunt, the powder puff grimy, the lipstick removers not on the dressing (Continued on page 86)

IN THE MIDST OF FABULOUS HOLLYWOOD, YOUNG BILL HOLDEN PAINTS THE TOWN RED ON A FRUGAL $10 BILL!

LOVE ON A BUDGET

Bill and Brenda seldom wear formal clothes—just for premières and various "anniversaries." They're always broke, and Ciro's is a luxury. When they go, they get their money's worth—are the first to come, last to go. Wind up every evening at the Derby. Often double-date with Wayne Morris and Pat Stewart.

A FORMAL DATE'S A RARE OCCASION, AND BRENDA MARSHALL'S TICKLED PINK AT THE PROSPECT OF DRESSING UP!

Bill dotes on the shower in his self-furnished, $50-a-month parlor-bedroom-and-bath apartment. Showers in three minutes flat; always shaves afterwards, claiming that the hot water softens his skin and brings out whiskers.

Brenda creams her face before tubbing. Says it keeps her skin from drying. Yards of black net protect her elegant coiffure. (Bill likes it long, but she "ups" it for big nights.) Neither reads nor soaks in the tub. Just scrubs.

Has "5 o'clock shadow" before noon, he says. Can never get by on one shave a day. Has fun shaving all around his face leaving a mustache and goatee. Laughs his head off at them, then takes ages shaving them off.

He never has Brenda's flowers sent. Delivers them in person—white baby orchids for special occasions. Always sends her a telegram the day she begins a picture. Brenda thinks he's stunning in long bob and sideburns. This set's for "Texas."

Does her hair and puts on make-up before dressing, though she admits that's all wrong. Powders several times during an evening. Applies fresh lipstick once or twice (in privacy of the ladies' room), with her special lipstick brush.

She keeps her toilet water in refrigerator so it'll be cool and refreshing after hot tub. She has dozens of brands but sticks exclusively to French-made "Tabu." It isn't sold in U. S. A., so they drive across the Mexican border to get it.

Part of the routine is phoning to check on Bill's progress. She's sentimentol obout the silver sondol neckloce; soys everything Bill gives her is o good-luck chorm. Between weekly monicures, she touches up her noils herself.

Bill's a Fred Astaire in his own boudoir, a dud on the dance floor. "He just walks when he dances," complains Brenda. His fabulous record collection is the result of their many evenings' browsing in the local music shops.

Bill lives for the day he can afford a valet. He does all his own work—washes dishes, makes bed. Won't buy even an ash tray without consulting Brenda. She comes over weekly to vacuum rugs; a man comes twice monthly to wash windows.

Evening's plans are generally indefinite and very informal. Brenda just has a few evening gowns, mostly white ones, 'cause Bill likes 'em with her olive skin. In turn, he wears blue and white shirts to please her.

The weekly allowance doled out by their business managers doesn't provide much cash for dining out. Besides, Brenda knows how slow niteries are on service, so she wards off hunger pangs by some icebox-raiding before she goes out.

"THESE 3 WOMEN have as Beautiful Complexions as I have ever seen"—says Hurrell, Hollywood's famous photographer

HURRELL, who has photographed many of the most glamorous women in America, says he was tremendously impressed by the lovely complexions of these three society beauties. The striking charm of their skin is not a matter of chance. Naturally beautiful, their skin is made even lovelier by their faithful following of the Pond's Beauty Ritual.

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, Jr. looks like a lovely Dresden-china figurine. Since she was in boarding school, she has used Pond's at least twice every day—and her skin is damask fine—soft, smooth.

MRS. WHITNEY BOURNE has the poised beauty of an orchid. Her pink and cream skin is dazzling—rich, vibrant. She has used Pond's since her deb days.

MRS. ANTHONY J. DREXEL, III is one of Atlanta's loveliest daughters, with great dark eyes and a glorious complexion. For at least seven years she has guarded her exquisite skin with Pond's.

Give YOUR skin THEIR Beauty Care

A BEAUTIFYING CLEANSING—with ultra-soft Pond's Cold Cream every night, and for daytime cleansings. You smooth it on, wipe it off with Pond's Tissues. Your skin is freed of dirt and make-up. Apply Pond's Cold Cream again, spank it in well, wipe off. Little dry lines and pore openings show less. Your skin is immaculately clean, soft, supple.

A rousing splash. Make your skin tingle and glow! Splash it with Pond's cooling, astringent Freshener. It takes away oiliness, too.

A NEW LOOK, A NEW FEEL to your skin. Apply the 1-minute Mask—a thick coat of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Wipe off after 1 full minute. You will hardly believe your eyes. The keratolytic action of Pond's Vanishing Cream has taken off countless tiny bits of dried skin that roughened and dulled your complexion. Your skin looks more delicate, clearer—it feels definitely softer. It has a lovely mat finish that takes powder with exquisite smoothness—and holds it for hours.

See how YOUR skin responds! And this simple beauty ritual takes only a few moments each day! See your complexion looking more and more radiantly lovely.

their grace and well-groomed appearance.

And don't think that just because the weather's warm, you can neglect your daily ritual with creams and lotions. Sun, wind and water are no respecters of seasons, and they get in their destructive work in summer just as well as winter.

Don't tell us that you haven't time or can't afford to care for your hands, either. There are always a few odd moments that can be devoted to such important self-improvement. And with the inexpensive sizes of good hand and nail preparations everywhere available in chain and variety stores, expense should no longer be any excuse.

And don't feel sorry for yourself if you have a lot of work to do, either at home or in business. Busy, capable, well-trained hands are more beautiful than lazy, idle ones any old day.

Good grooming for hands means more than anything else a perfect manicure. And there are so many advantages to doing ones own at home that it's no wonder nearly every girl now has her own kit of manicuring equipment. For one thing, you can squeeze that home manicure in at odd moments, and you can have a perfectly heavenly time trying all those luscious new shades of liquid nail polish. Besides, you'll then have all the gadgets and shades of polish necessary for a good retouch job as often as you need one.

Begin by washing your hands thoroughly and removing every vestige of old nail polish. (Use a cotton-wound orange stick dipped in polish remover to persuade it out of difficult corners.) Shape your nails to a medium rounded oval with a fine-grained file or an emery board. (Files are grand if your nails are strong and healthy. If they're brittle or thin, do most of your shaping with an emery.)

NOW soak the nail tips in warm sudsy water for ten or fifteen minutes. Apply a cuticle softener to the base and sides and press cuticle back with a clean orange stick. Rough, shaggy cuticle edges should be removed without cutting, whenever possible. A safe, effective preparation is especially made for this purpose. (The better you train back cuticle with fingers or towel after every washing and every time you apply cream or lotion —the smoother and thinner your cuticle will be.)

Next rinse hands thoroughly and apply white pencil under your nail tips. This accents their outline. Be sure that all oil and soap are off nails and that they are thoroughly dry before you attempt to apply polish. A buffing at this point is excellent to stimulate, smooth and strengthen nails. Buff them in one direction only. This repeated once or twice a week will considerably improve roughness and ridges.

A colorless foundation polish or undercoat will do a great deal to protect nails and help polish go on more smoothly and last longer. After your liquid foundation has thoroughly dried—and not before—stroke on the shade of polish most suitable for the kind of clothes you wear and the way you spend your time.

Fairly light or soft burnished shades are certainly always safe for sports or business wear. Bright, exotic colors are dramatic with black, white or navy, and brilliant "red reds" will be worn a lot this year with all kinds of clothes. Do try always to match or harmonize your polish with both rouge and lipstick and tone the shades of all to harmonize with the colors in your costume as well as with the basic undertones of your natural skin coloring.

TOP off your manicure with a bit of cream or oil rubbed into nails and cuticle and a fresh fragrant scented lotion or hand cream massaged well into hands from finger tips to wrists.

Some girls have asked us about the effects of constantly using liquid nail polishes. Far from being harmful, liquid polishes actually do a real service in beautifying and protecting nails from splitting, ridging and scaling. If yours are properly cared for with oils, creams and lotions, as we recommended in the beginning, you should have no difficulty whatsoever. If your nails are thin or brittle, look to your diet and check up on your physical condition before you blame your polish.

Hangnails are often caused by constant snipping of cuticle, improper washing of hands or the use of a rough or worn out hand brush. If you'll keep cuticle soft with oils and creams, pushing it back with every drying, and use mild soaps and brushes that are in good condition, you should have little trouble.

If your palms perspire too freely, the source is likely nervousness, exhaustion or some other general physical condition. Alcohol or toilet water or a sprinkling of refreshing talcum powder will relieve this temporarily. For permanent results, though, check up on your rest, diet and mental habits. Control your nerves and don't be a worrier, if you'd have dry, comfortable palms.

One of the best cures for nail biting we know is to give yourself such gorgeous flawless manicures at all times that you just couldn't think of ruining them by the childish habit of nail nibbling. Poise and self-control are the first essentials of any kind of charm or attractiveness. Can you imagine girls like Rita Hayworth, Madeleine Carroll or Hedy Lamarr chewing their cuticle? Neither can we. Take a lesson from the stars and give a hand to beauty every day. Cleanliness, protection and grooming are your watchwords.

The taals for o manicure ore simple and inexpensive. Here's whot you'll need: a little bowl, o coke of easy lothering soop, o small firm-bristled brush, o noil file, emery boord, oronge stick, a bit of catton, cuticle softener ond remover, polish remover, noil white, cuticle oil, palish faundotion or noil protector and a few af your favorite shodes of palish (far different manicures). Add to these a bottle of lotian or a tube or jor of frogront hond creom, ond you'll be all set for manths af perfect monicures. A poir of cuticle scissors, o buffer ond o bit of powdered pumice ore good, but not always necessory. It wan't be omiss ta add ta your kit a few of thase handy little crescent-shaped potches for mending braken nails (yau put one on ond palish right over it—slick as onything.) A set or two of those ortful artificiol nails are onother boon for either on emergency when some of your noturol nails ore broken, or just for the fun of o little variety. Every one of these articles can be hod far a few pennies at your locol chain or voriety store.

CONFIDENTIAL REPORT

The Subject entered the theatre at 2:15 P.M., going in alone, and Operatives kept her under surveillance by keeping the front of the theatre under observation.

At 4.38 P.M., Operatives noticed Miss Sheridan leave the theatre. She walked slowly along Ventura Boulevard, stopping to look in several shop windows.

At 4.55 P.M., she entered a drugstore and made a call from a public telephone booth, which lasted about ten minutes. She came out of the booth, waited for about three minutes then re-entered the booth and made another call which lasted until 5.15 P.M.

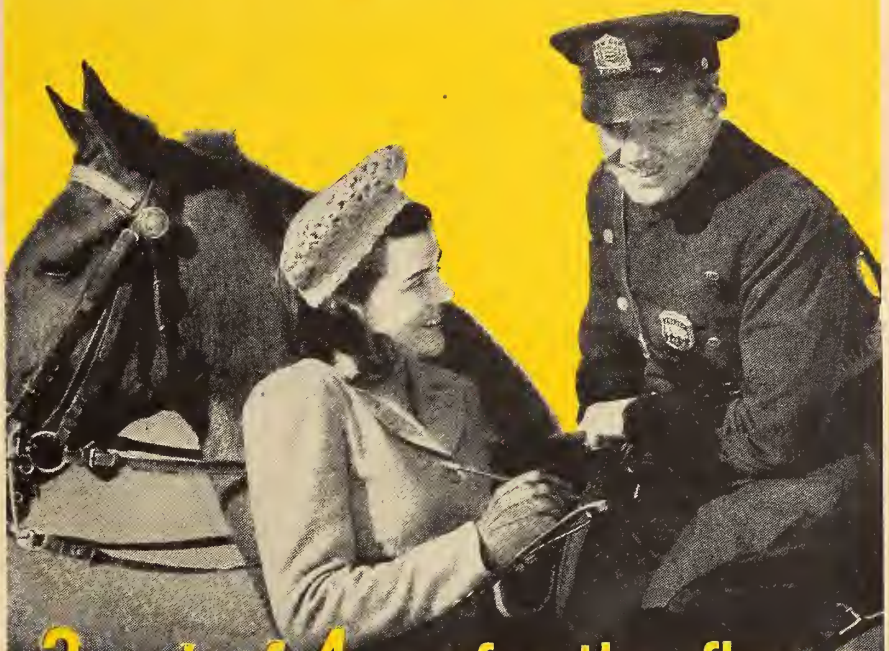
Upon leaving the drugstore, Miss Sheridan walked to Miller's Music Shop on Ventura Boulevard, entered the same, and Operatives noticed that she selected an album of Deanna Durbin's music. She took the album to a soundproof room and played three records. She then left the room, made a purchase and returned home at 6.00 P.M., first taking her car to the garage. Due to the inclemency of the weather, Operatives were forced to abandon use of the camera for the balance of the investigation.

At 6.04 P.M., Operatives noticed a light in a room that seemed to be a bedroom, and the Subject appeared to be dressing. Then the lights went on all around the living room, and Operatives could see some activity around the house.

At 6.45 P.M., a red Dodge coupé drove up to the front of the house, and a man wearing a gray suit and dark hat entered, whom Operatives later identified as George Brent, the movie actor. Mr. Brent stayed in the house for about 20 minutes, at which time Miss Sheridan and Mr. Brent walked out to the Dodge coupé and drove away. Operatives followed the surveillant pair down Sunset Boulevard to Olvera Street in Los Angeles. There they left the car at 8.05 P.M. and entered the La Golondrina Café where they had dinner and a few dances.

At 10:45 P.M., Miss Sheridan and Mr. Brent left the La Golondrina Café and drove directly to Miss Sheridan's home where Mr. Brent entered with the Subject. Mr. Brent stayed for 14 minutes, then left. This was at 11.44 P. M.

Operatives noticed no activity in the house after this except a light in what seemed the bedroom, but the lights went out at 12.16 A.M.



Operatives stayed until 1.00 A.M., and seeing no necessity for remaining, discontinued the case for the day, returning to the office of the Agency to submit this report.

Respectfully submitted,

POLICE REPORT!

3 out of 4 prefer the flavor of Beech-Nut Gum

203 OUT OF 269 POLICE PREFER THE DELICIOUS PEPPERMINT FLAVOR OF BEECH-NUT GUM

The extra goodness of delicious Beech-Nut Peppermint Gum has been tested by an independent fact-finding organization.

(Here's the way it was done):

269 policemen in 15 different cities were questioned. Various brands of peppermint chewing gum were bought in local stores and identifying wrappers were removed.

Each policeman was given two different brands (Beech-Nut and one other, both unidentified), and asked to report which stick he preferred. Result: 203 out of 269 (3 out of 4) preferred the peppermint flavor of Beech-Nut Gum to that of other brands.

Try the yellow package of Beech-Nut today. You'll enjoy its delicious long-lasting peppermint flavor.

STIRLING HAYDEN
Born Stirling Hayden, Montclair, N. J., 1917. A confirmed sailor since he first stepped aboard a ship. Traveled around the world several times and is a full-fledged shipmaster. Planned to start shipping service with ex-Kaiser's yacht but was wrecked off Cape Hatteras before getting into action. Never set foot on a stage before going to Hollywood after being spotted in a picture magazine by a movie mogul. Authority on Polynesian dress. Sleeps in a sarong. Neither smokes nor drinks. 6' 4" tall. Unwed.

Born Charles Louis Hayward, Johannesburg, South Africa, March 19, 1909. Most punctual man in Hollywood, usually wears three watches. Hates night clubs, red nail polish and onions. Is a tea addict, won't miss a single Mickey Mouse cartoon, loves Daiquiris, red roses and roller coasters. Collects classical records, but loves swing, too. Has a dog that sits up at bars and drinks milk. He can whip up a tasty meal in nothing flat.

Born Edythe Mariner, Brooklyn, N. Y., July 16, 1920. President of "Perfect Legs Institute of America." Trained to be an artist but turned out to be a N. Y. model. Hollywood beckoned and her first role was the lead in "Beau Geste." She loves to walk in the rain, gnaw on carrots and go barefoot. Has a temper, flaming red hair and bright blue eyes.

Born Margarita Cansino, New York City, October 17, 1918. A member of the celebrated Cansino family of dancers, she made her début at the age of six. Is terrifically extravagant, spending between $12,000 and $15,000 a year on her clothes. Is the honorary mayor of 12 South American cities. Sleeps in a 12-foot satin upholstered bed. Always sucks lolly-pops unless she is chewing on wheat wafers. Owns a Doberman-Pinscher that lives in a doghouse with a sun-porch attached to the regular sleeping quarters.

SONJA HENIE
Born Sonja Henie, Oslo, Norway, April 8, 1912. Her father taught her to skate at the age of six. She is thrice winner of Olympic figure skating championship, ten times winner of World's championship. Thinks roller skating is too dangerous! Her skating tights, made of sheerest silk, can be worn only two or three times and cost $35. She has been decorated by the King of Norway and was recently rated as the fifth most important person in that entire country's history.

HUGH HERBERT
Born Hugh Herbert, Binghamton, New York, August 10, 1888. Contrary to popular opinion, he is Scotch Irish. His favorite exercise is sleeping, his hobbies are farming and drinking beer. Owns fifteen dogs, but can't stand the sight of a Mexican hairless. Can cook beautifully, his masterpieces being spaghetti and apple pie. Is a chronic laugher-at-his-own-jokes. He would rather ride in a bus than the most luxurious limousine. Sings loudly and quite badly every morning in the shower.

IRENE HERVEY
Born Irene Hervey, Los Angeles, California, July 11, 1910. Broke down the stubborn resistance of Ben Piazza of M-G-M's casting office by literally camping on his doorstep for weeks on end. He finally succumbed and got her a screen test, which resulted in a part in "Stranger's Return." She knows all her parts by heart. Greatest ambition is to do comedy. Can't sit still a second; rides, plays badminton, and swims in her spare time. Doesn't eat much at mealtime but is always nibbling on some tid-bit between times.

Born Frances Eloise Hodges, Des Moines, Iowa, January 29, 1916. Is a demon with a firing stick, being a member of two gun teams. Collects perfume bottles and bracelets. Can't resist shoes and never has less than forty-five pairs in her closet. Loves sweaters, tailored suits and sport dresses. Chinese food is her idea of ambrosia. Used to sing with an orchestra and claims she still "bellows a bit" in the shower.

FAY HOLDEN
Born Fay Hammerston, Birmingham, England, September 20, 1895. Was on stage for 32 years as Gaby Fay. Much younger looking in real life, she wears a wig to make her look older when she plays Ma Hardy. Hobby is gardening, but Mickey Rooney says she is the world's best cook, too. Nothing makes her prouder than to have some fan call Mick "her son." She loves scrambled eggs and sausages at all sorts of weird hours.

WILLIAM HOLDEN
Born William Beedle, O'Fallon, Illinois, April 17, 1918. His rise to fame reads like a scenario—from Pasadena Jr. College student to the title role in "Golden Boy" in one step. Was so excited when he started to work on the picture that he ran a temperature of 102° the first three days. Hates restaurants, loves roller coasters. Would do anything on a dare. Drives like a demon. Prefers brunettes. Would love to have a crew-cut. Is incredibly absent-minded.

A DREAM COME TRUE

open this one, she broke a fingernail. It contained records from Lewis Milestone, her director, "because you're such a good little girl." She takes equal delight in the reverse procedure. From December 1st on, no one's allowed to enter her workshop at home. There she hoards all her Christmas purchases and wrappings, keeps the door locked and spends happy hours wrapping up gifts.

It's no whim but an illuminating clue to her temperament that she dislikes loudness in any form. She can't endure the color orange and shrinks from violent noises. Her set is more subdued than most. At the blare of a playback her palms go over her ears. She refuses to argue. In any conflict of opinion she'll listen quietly and weigh viewpoints that oppose her own. Once her mind is made up, nobody can budge her.

SERENITY is her watchword, the keynote of her life. She lives in a white house, atop one of the highest Beverly hills. Here she feels it's her right to demand strict privacy. The grounds have been photographed, but no camera has ever penetrated beyond the front door. As movie homes go, it's an unpretentious place. Because it's so high up, she had to have a retaining wall built on the side away from the road. If you've had any experience with retaining walls, you know they're expensive. It's the one costly note in the whole ensemble.

As you enter you're laved in a sense of coolness and peace. The first thing you see and all you see at first is the soft, pervasive, monotone beige of the hall and living room. The furniture's modern but not bizarre. What you get is an effect of tailored order, of a place for everything and everything in its place.

Upstairs are two bedrooms and baths—one for Ginger, one for her mother. Ginger's blue and white room is furnished in fruitwood and, except for the bed with its white canopy and satin coverlet, looks like a sitting-room. The rug is deep blue. There's a chaise longue in one corner. A huge bay window, its seat covered in a homespun blue and white tweed, frames the hills by day and the fairyland view of the city by night. Two barrel chairs flank the open fireplace, with a round table on a handmade white rug between them. Except for the books on this table everything is sprucely laid away. There are French books among them, which Ginger reads with comparative ease and occasional help from a dictionary. Her secretary, Jacques Parsons—better known as Jackie—used to be a French teacher, and Ginger has taken lessons from her for three and a half years.

Against one wall stands a specially made cabinet, glass-shelved and doored, which holds her exquisite array of perfumes. This can hardly be called an extravagance, since the collection is made up of gifts. If her friends didn't keep her supplied, though, she might be tempted to supply herself. She's a perfume-lover. She had a herb-garden planted under her window and lies in bed at night sniffing its delectable odors.

Blue mirrors form the walls, ceiling and wardrobe doors of her dressing-room, and the windows are shaded by white-mirrored Venetian blinds. Here as elsewhere, the impression is of an almost ascetic neatness. There is no dressing-table litter. Except for the aforementioned photo of Brooke Hayward, the tabletop is bare. The center drawer holds

"Just because they're twins—she spoils them twice as much!"

The twin's grandmother learns there's a difference between "spoiling" and modern child care

1. My mother-in-law was off on her favorite subject again! "I'm not one to meddle," she was saying, "but someone ought to tell Joyce that if she doesn't stop kow-towing to these twins they'll be spoiled for life!"

2. "Now, mother," Dad Jones said, "you let the children bring up their babies in their own way." "Why, I wouldn't dream of interfering," my mother-in-law exclaimed. "But—my word! Special foods, special soap, special this and that . . ."

3. "And even," I interrupted, "a SPECIAL LAXATIVE! Pinkie's going to get some of it right now. I'm not spoiling the twins, Mother Jones, I love them too much for that. I'm bringing them up exactly as the doctor told me to!"

4. "The doctor says a baby's system is delicate. You can't treat it like an adult's. Babies need things especially designed for them. So of course they need a special laxative, too. The doctor recommended Fletcher's Castoria."

5. "The doctor said I'd find Fletcher's Castoria thorough—yet always mild and safe. It works mostly in the lower bowel, so it isn't likely to upset a youngster's digestion. What's more . . . the twins are crazy about it. Watch this!"

6. Pinkie took her Fletcher's Castoria and licked the spoon! But Winkie howled 'cause he wasn't getting any! So Mother Jones grinned and said if that was the modern way, she'd see to it that all her grandchildren get Fletcher's Castoria from now on!

HERE IS THE MEDICAL BACKGROUND

Chief ingredient of Fletcher's Castoria is senna.

Medical literature says: (1) In most cases, senna does not disturb the appetite and digestion or cause nausea . . . (2) Senna works primarily in the lower bowel . . . (3) In regulated dosages it produces easy elimination and has little tendency to cause irritation or constipation after use.

Senna is especially processed in Fletcher's Castoria to eliminate griping and thus allow gentle laxative action.

a Lucite comb and brush and a lipstick—all she requires for street adornment. In fact she needs little more at night—the only difference between day and evening makeup being that she darkens her lashes. She uses neither nail polish nor powder, original in that she dislikes shiny nails and doesn't mind shiny noses. Because of the screen she keeps her freckles under cover most of the time by a tan acquired through swimming and sunbaths.

She splurges on bath luxuries which gleam, scented and inviting, from a little tray beside the tub. The bathroom fixtures include a hanger attached to the door for her pajamas, with a bar over which the pants can be folded.

SHE has a good but not fantastic wardrobe, and she wears her clothes out. Asked to contribute something she was through with to the Ann Lehr Guild, she replied: "When I'm through with them, they're ready for the ash-heap," and handed over, among other things, a lovely silk jersey sports dress, parting with it with a rueful pat as one parts with a friend.

Irene, the swank Hollywood designer who numbers Rosalind Russell, Carole Lombard and Mary Martin among her customers, makes most of Ginger's clothes. Within the last few years her taste has changed. From the frilly feminine she has veered to the simplest of simple lines. For color she sticks to blues and greens and hazy, smoky tones, avoiding the hard and brilliant. She loves brown and uses it for street wear as most women use black. Texture is all-important, with stiff, shiny fabrics out. She may fall hard for a color, but unless the material is soft and pleasant to the touch, she'll pass it up.

Her informal headgear is a beany. Otherwise she prefers large, off-the-face hats, the kind described by Vogue this season as "pure-brow." Except with pastel-toned dresses, she uses a special shade of hose—a kind of bronze, very sheer, like gun-metal—but brown instead of gray.

The only section of her wardrobe that looks like a movie star's is her shoe closet. Tier on tier of 5B's they rise, and she sighs as she looks at them—partly in delight, partly in self-reproach. She can't resist them. Lapel gadgets are the only form of costume jewelry she goes for, and she wears real jewels only on rare gala occasions. A diamond necklace graced her throat on the night of the Academy Award dinner, but rumor has it belonging to her mother. The much-publicized square emerald, said to have been given her by Howard Hughes, has never been seen in public.

Emily and Guno, married, compose the household staff. Guno takes care of the grounds, and drives either the large Packard or the Buick coupé. Emily runs the house, with Ginger planning the meals when she's alone, otherwise turning the job over to her mother. Her favorite sports are tennis and swimming, and she's good at both, having reached the semi-finals in a tennis tournament last year.

She can indulge in both at home. The pool and court stand apart from the house and on a slightly higher level. After her swim she climbs into sweater and slacks, or shirt and shorts, sticks a beany on her head and leaves her hair to curl at will. She doesn't need permanents. Ordinarily she wears her hair parted at side or center, brushed back from forehead and temples, bound with a ribbon and falling loose to her shoulders. It's been various colors at various times, but she's let it revert to its natural chestnut now, a chestnut less red than it used to be. Looking like a boy, she romps with Sharma, her Afghan hound and only animal, or mixes herself a chocolate soda. A pushover for ice-cream, she shares with Jane Withers the proud distinction of owning a private, fully-equipped soda fountain.

When the bathhouses were built opposite the pool, she had a workshop added for herself. There she draws, paints and models clay. She makes no fetish of her hobby but works as the mood takes her. If the place doesn't see her for a month she owes no one including herself an explanation.

She is self-taught. Once, taking it into her head to do a bust of her mother, she engaged an instructor to tell her what not to do. "Let me go my own way," said Ginger. "Only tell me if I handle the tools wrong."

On the evening of February 27th last, she slipped into the new gown Irene had designed for her to wear at the Academy Award dinner. It was of dove gray marquisette over a nude-colored angel skin slip. It had a peplum, a fitted bodice with inserts of black chantilly lace and a very full skirt. With it she wore a tiny Juliet cap of blue-gray flowers. Her mother clasped the diamond necklace round her throat and gave her a big kiss for good luck.

Shaking inside, she maintained an outward composure. There was a five-to-one chance that this evening would set the seal of triumph on years of endeavor. George Schaefer, head of RKO, had invited Ginger, Mrs. Rogers, David Hempstead, producer of "Kitty Foyle," and several others, to attend the dinner as his guests. President Roosevelt spoke. Many people spoke. The hours wore on. Award followed award.

Then Walter Wanger introduced Lynn Fontanne. Her "thank you" was happily brief, after which she read the names of the nominees for best actress—Bette Davis, Joan Fontaine, Katharine Hepburn, Ginger Rogers, Martha Scott.

"The winner of this award—" she said and paused—the auditor handed her a sealed envelope, which she opened—"is Ginger Rogers."

HEMPSTEAD, seated next to her, planted the first kiss of congratulation on her cheek, while bedlam broke loose. Ginger rose and walked toward Miss Fontanne almost as if she were afraid of stumbling. The older actress hugged the younger as she handed Oscar over.

"Thank you," croaked Ginger as if with four frogs in her throat and burst into tears. Through the click of cameras and a tangle of outthrust hands, she made her way slowly back to the table trying to mop her eyes between handshakes. Her first whispered words were for her mother: "I've never been so happy in my life."

Garson Kanin, director of "Tom, Dick and Harry," Ginger's current film, doesn't keep all his cute gags for pictures. When she came to work next day, she found Kanin and the crew drawn up at salute—the director in tails, the others in tuxes to do honor to the Academy Award winner.

If it was a gag, it was also a symbol. She'd started her career at fourteen by winning Charleston contests. She'd climbed to enviable heights as a dancing star and comedienne. Most girls would have been well content. But through all this she'd nursed one dream—the dream of recognition as a serious dramatic actress.

Well, it certainly looks as if little Virginia MacMath has made the grade!

and even a tremendous swimming pool.

"Barrymore didn't go back to the set that day. We talked our heads off all afternoon. And that night he took me to the opening of the Carthay Circle Theatre. My trunks hadn't shown up, and I had no dress suit. He said, 'I'll have the studio send one over.' And over one came. It was a perfect fit except that the trousers were up to here"—he hauls his present trousers up to the tops of his socks to illustrate. "But we went anyway. As we drove up to the theatre, the announcer called out, 'Mr. John Barrymore and the noted foreign actor, Conrad Veet'—which sounded a little like Conrad Feet. And I step out with my trousers up to here. People screamed with laughter. They whistled at me. I thought I was a ruined man.

"I was surprised when Barrymore still wanted me in his picture, 'The Beloved Rogue.' I played the part of Louis XI, a short, wizened man. A feat that I managed"—he smiles again—"by wearing a tremendous robe, which hid the fact that I was walking around in a squatting position.

"After that, I signed with Universal where I played a varied assortment of men without souls. The high spot was the title role of 'The Man Who Laughs,' in which I played a tortured human being made horrible by a permanent grimace. I think that might have led somewhere. But talkies came, and I couldn't speak English well. I went back home."

HE IS an English citizen now, and has been one for years, but his birth—over which he had no control—took place in Germany, where his father was a minor public official.

"My first ambition," he says, "was to be a doctor, and I held on to it for almost four years. When I was about 13 or 14, my father fell very ill. Our doctor said that only an operation could save him, and that there was only one man who could perform such an operation—a very famous surgeon. We had no money. But this great man consented to operate and did save my father's life. Afterward when we tried to pay him a few marks, he said that was enough and sent the money off to some charity. He was almost a god in my eyes. A tall, gruff man who hated pretense and worked miracles as a matter of course. I was fascinated by his hands—by the thought of the power they held over life and death. Knowing such a man, I wanted to be such a man."

He pauses for a moment. "Later, much later," he continues, "I tried to discover what connection there might be between a doctor and an actor; why I found it so easy to change my ambition. I'm not sure I have the explanation; it's very highbrow. It's that actors, too, have to know everything about human beings—to be able to operate on human emotions. It's a terrific experience to stand on a stage, and say things that dope audiences, night after night, as effectively as if you had doped them with pills." His blue eyes twinkle. "It's so fascinating that you can keep at it for a lifetime."

It all started with the effect that he produced, reciting a prologue to a school play. "I was in what you call high school, and the students every year put on a Christmas play for parents. I wasn't asked to appear in this particular play, but to deliver a long monologue before the curtain rose. That changed the entire course of my life. The play was a flop—but everybody said I was a big success. I was a great man around school for a few days. I had a taste of the satisfaction of doping an audience. Even though I had done it unconsciously.

"I made up my mind to study all the great actors I could. I had precious little money. That meant that I had to sit in the balcony and stand in line for two hours before a theatre opened to get even a good balcony seat. I saw these great actors, and it was the old story. I said to myself, 'They're very good, but I could do just as well if I had the chance.' You have that kind of self-confidence only when you're very young, when you don't know better.

"Finally I spoke to the porter at the Max Reinhardt Theatre, an old man who looked like Father Christmas. 'How can I become an actor?' I asked him. His answer was, 'Have you any talent?' I said, 'Lots of it. Where can I go for acting lessons?' He knew an old character actor who sometimes picked up a little extra money teaching. He said he would speak to him about me. One matinée, Father Christmas took me backstage to the old actor's dressing-room. The old man asked me to recite anything I might know. I reeled off passages from 'Faust' and 'Hamlet,' which I knew by heart. 'You have talent,' he said. 'I'll take you as a pupil.' Then came the big question: For how much? The price was more than I could pay. He said, 'That's all right. You can pay me later.' I was very lucky to find such a teacher. Very lucky.

"After about ten lessons he smuggled me into an audition before Max Reinhardt; it was an audition for actors who were already actors. I delivered the first 'Faust' monologue, and Reinhardt listened, smiling, but said nothing afterward. I thought he had been amused by my youth and my long Bohemian haircut. Then next day came word that I had a contract. Not as an actor but as a volunteer. That meant that I was hired as an extra—at just enough money to keep me from starving. And I had the right to go to the Reinhardt school, the best in the world, absolutely free. All of which was wonderful training. I constantly learned, constantly smelled the atmosphere of the theatre.

"That went on for two years. Then came the War. They said I was too thin, too emaciated to be a soldier. They said I could do my bit as an actor in one of the theatres behind the front lines. They sent me to Libau near the Russian border. That theatre was terrific training. Every day another play. One day it was 'Hamlet'; the next day, a comedy; the day after that, an operetta. And I was in all of them, including the operettas—even if I couldn't sing."

It wasn't until 1916 on leave from acting in Libau that he finally made his bow on the Berlin stage in, believe it or not, the role of a priest.

"I was never a villain on the stage. I always played strong, sympathetic types. In that play, I brought happiness to a condemned man in the last two minutes of his life.

"It's amusing," he adds, "to recall what one critic said on that occasion. His name was Siegfried Jacobson, and he was the George Jean Nathan of Berlin. If he tore into you, there was nothing left—but if he praised you, you were 'made.' We all waited in fear and trembling for his verdict. Out came the weekly which he wrote for, and his whole article was about a new actor named Conrad Veidt, whose strong characterization of the priest promised much for his future. He ended the article by saying, 'I pray he will never make a film in his life.'

"I shared Herr Jacobson's distaste for films. There was no art in them. They were low, low entertainment. That is"—he raises his eyebrows eloquently—"I thought so until the producers started coming around with offers. One of them asked me how much I made a month on the stage. In dollars it would have been about fifty. He offered to pay me that much a day to act on the screen. That's how the movies got me." He smiles frankly. "After I had signed the contract I wondered if I were selling my soul, like 'Faust.' I didn't know that I would find movies fascinating. Even if they did make a villain of me.

YOU see, after they had me under contract, they started wondering, 'Now how are we going to sell this strange-looking man?' I couldn't be a variety of things as on the stage. I had to be something special, something that could be trade-marked. They decided that, with my appearance, I should be something bizarre. A hero couldn't be bizarre. So, by the simple process of elimination, they arrived at the conclusion that I would have to be a villain. And to establish the fact firmly in the public mind that I was a villain, they tagged me 'The Man with the Wicked Eyes.'

"In my first picture I played a sinister Hindu fakir and discovered to my surprise that I had made a distinct impression. I mention this to show you how life travels in circles. In 'The Thief of Bagdad,' I played a sinister Hindu fakir again—and again discovered to my surprise that I had made an impression."

That first screen success led to a long string of successes which, he hopes, is prophetic now.

"Only I hope I can stay recognizably human this time," he says. "I couldn't when I first started. I was caught up and swept along on a tide of sombre futurism and cubism, which reached its high point of expression in 'The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari'—then faded into oblivion. I was lucky not to fade with it, lucky to be in demand still as a demonic actor."

Lucky—?

He smiles at the question. "Yes. There is a strange satisfaction purely from an acting standpoint in being able to play a demonic character convincingly. To make an unreal character real. It's the hardest kind of role to do, because it's the easiest kind to over-do."

A remark that should convince you, if nothing else has, that he is definitely a phenomenon. Most actors don't go around looking for the hardest work they can find. And that's why few actors can cast the spell that Conrad Veidt can. They haven't let themselves in for as much practice as he has.

But don't start thinking at this point that his only measure of a role is how demonic the character is. "A villain can be very phony," he says, "if he's villainous just for the pleasure of being villainous. If he isn't compelled to villainy by something beyond his control—some illness, mental or physical; some abnormality; some supernatural force. I always try to find an excuse for any villain I play. Something that will make the audience sympathize with him even as they hate him."

All of which would seem to make it apparent that it was no simple accident you felt a twinge of positive liking for the Hindu fakir and the general.

What makes it difficult for Conrad Veidt to explain his sudden popularity is that this is no new approach to villainy for him. He has had it for more years than he cares to remember. He had it when he was in Hollywood the first time. "It was most apparent in 'The Man Who Laughs,'" he says. "For all his horribleness, The Man was a human being."

And there was a flurry of fan mail then. Except that he wasn't around to receive it. He was back in Germany, playing villains in the only language he knew—now that pantomime was no longer eloquent enough for Hollywood.

"I made some more sombre pictures in Germany," he says. "Then I made two pictures that had a possible world market, if they were given English versions —'F. P. I. Doesn't Answer' and 'Congress Dances.' So I made both German and English versions. I still didn't know the English language. The English words had to be put into my mouth. But they came out so well that I had offers from England. Thank God. I went over in 1931, and I was still there in 1933 when terrible things started happening in Germany. Things I had smelled coming.

"I became a British citizen. Meanwhile I made one British picture after another. And I started a new cycle—playing first a villain, then a good man. I played The Stranger in 'The Passing of the Third Floor Back,' for example, just before I played the fakir in 'The Thief of Bagdad.' Then I played a straight role in 'Contraband,' which has now become 'Blackout.'"

WHEN World War II broke out, he offered his personal fortune to the British government, interest-free. And it was to raise more funds for England by getting "Contraband" released in America that he brought it over himself last summer. He didn't seek the part of the general in "Escape." The part sought him. And he wouldn't sign to play that or any future Hollywood roles until he had arranged officially for the major portion of his salary to go to British War Relief. All of which he is reluctant to talk about. "I'm only doing what we're all doing," he says.

He talked to me about his hobbies—gardening, astronomy and reading. ("You won't believe it after seeing these mental cases I portray, but my favorite reading is Philosophy.") Or about the Americanization of the young English boy he has adopted for the duration. Or about his secret ambition, which is to direct. ("I'd like to do a modern religious picture—something to help people appreciate the things that God has given them that no war can destroy.") Or about how he approaches a role. ("First I read the whole script to get a complete mental picture of the character. Then I ask myself how he would walk and move. That will tell me how he would speak.")

He is a man of intense, warm enthusiasms—whose newest enthusiasm is his role in "A Woman's Face" with Joan Crawford and Melvyn Douglas. "I play the greatest meanie in the world," he says. "I befriend a girl who has never had a friend, and then, when she falls desperately in love with me, I try to make her the instrument of a terrible vengeance against my fate. If only I can make people feel that this man, this spirit of evil, is an unhappy human being. Sick with unhappiness, the unhappiness of Lucifer, the angel cast out of heaven. If I can do it as I see it, other unhappy people will feel they're lucky by comparison. And even happy people will have a little sympathy for him."

We hate to think of what's in store for the boys at the Culver City Post Office!

Got any secret longings?

Daydreams are as important as diplomas! So hang on to yours. Who knows . . .

Someday you (yes, you!) may keep a theatre spellbound while you play a great love scene. Or you might be a famous writer, fashion designer, or top-flight radio star!

Or maybe the altar is your goal. And you dream of sweeping up an aisle in a cloud of tulle and lace . . . to take the name of a man who is yet unknown . . . a man who will cherish you always.

Well—daydreams can come true!

But it takes more than wishing to get what you want! For one thing—it takes plenty of self-confidence and poise. On trying days of the month, especially!

Jittery fears needn't ruffle your poise though, if you use Kotex* sanitary napkins. (Not with the moisture-resistant safety-shield that's inside every Kotex pad!)

You needn't worry about embarrassing, telltale outlines, either! For Kotex has flat, pressed ends that never show. Never give your secret away!

And how grateful you'll be on strenuous days that Kotex doesn't chafe!

You'll sail through days crowded with work and social engagements, scarcely conscious of wearing a pad . . . for Kotex is less bulky . . . so naturally more comfortable!

Now you know why Kotex can help you career girls take difficult days in your stride . . . can help you forget the "grim business" and concentrate on your work and play!

And because millions of other women also know this . . . Kotex is the most popular of all napkins. More popular, actually, than all other brands together!

This is just to remind you that Kotex comes in 3 different sizes: Super—Regular—Junior. And all 3 sizes sell for same low price!

MOVIE REVIEWS

★★★ Girl in the News

Here is a real surprise, a swell movie, full of excitement and sure to be loved by audiences once they get into the theatre. The difficulty is that it was made in England under war conditions and has no stars to lure you in. But if you get a chance, be sure to see it—you'll be grateful.

There is no war propaganda here, and no mention of world conditions at all. It is simply a thriller-chiller in the best tradition. Margaret Lockwood, Barry K. Barnes and Emlyn Williams have the leading roles, and all three are people you should know a good deal more about; they have real talent. Towering above their work, however, is the hand of the director, Carol Reed, a master of melodrama. He works a good deal along the same suspense lines as does his countryman, Alfred Hitchcock, and much may be expected of him.

Miss Lockwood was here in Hollywood for a while a couple of years ago and should have been kept here. She is a looker and has tons of talent.

She plays the part of a nurse who gets involved in a strange series of coincidences which lead to her trial on a murder charge. She is found not guilty and released, but a cloud hangs over her name and she has a tough time getting a job. Eventually she does—and walks into a second murder rap. She is freed by the clever work of her lawyer, Barry Barnes, who pulls a cute court-room trick for a finish after a lot of exciting footage.

Barnes is a pleasant young man who is not too good looking and should make femme hearts flutter; also he is a grand actor. Emlyn Williams, of course, is one of England's best; you may remember that he originated the leading role in "Night Must Fall" on the stage in both London and New York. There is a top-notch cast of support players. Directed by Carol Reed.—20th Century-Fox (British made).

★★★ Murder Among Friends

One of the most pleasant duties a film reviewer can possibly have is to report seeing a good picture; especially when he didn't expect the film to amount to much. "Murder Among Friends" is a refreshing slab of homicidal humor. It is first-rate mystery and first-rate comedy, all in one. With a stronger cast (more star power, that is) it would have been a four-star attraction on anyone's list.

Marjorie Weaver is a wacky gal who drives John Hubbard nuts by dragging him into a series of murders. You have never seen so many killings in one movie. It is a good, compact whodunit plot, and writer John Larkin deserves a distinct bow for having figured it out and dished it up as pleasantly as he did. And the Weaver gal jumps eight or ten steps up the ladder by her performance here; she's very definitely a bit of all right.

Cobina Wright, Jr., the socialite, is one of the top actresses, but that won't get in your way too much because, fortunately, she doesn't have much acting to do. Hubbard is plenty okay; Truman Bradley, as one of the few sensible detectives ever handed a movie script, is splendid, and Eddie Conrad does a neat comedy bit. Directed mighty neatly, by Ray McCarey, Leo's brother. 20th Century-Fox.

★★★ The Man Who Lost Himself

Universal has a new (and most amusing) trick. It kids itself and other Hollywood studios without ever mentioning Hollywood. Swell stuff. Not so long ago this studio turned out a highly amusing spoof on the invisible character yarn, and this one is a take-off on the double-identity routine. Brian Aherne is two different men here, who change places—but instead of using the theme as the center of a straight story, the studio kids the pants off it. And, of course, it's rare good fun.

First we meet Aherne as a poor young nobody. Then we meet Aherne as a rich young wastrel who conceives the idea of changing places with his look-alike for a few days. It's a lark. But the rich guy (the real one) is killed accidentally, and the poor guy is stuck with the rich guy's life. Well, he tries to get out of it. He tells his new "family" about himself and yells his head off—but they don't believe him because (this is the clever trick the writers devised) the rich guy was a bit on the nutty side to begin with. "Yes, yes, we know," they tell him pleasantly. "You're not yourself, you're really two other guys!" And he's stuck.

It's all written brightly and with a smart notion that the audience is on to all the situations. Thus, instead of being corny, it becomes laugh material.

Aherne is very good in the lead role, playing it with clever timing and a keen sense of comedy. Kay Francis, as the wife, is smooth; you can't tell half the time whether she's actually fooled by her "husband" or not. And the supporting cast is much better than average, with S. Z. Sakall stealing the comedy and honors as the butler. Henry Stephenson and Marc Lawrence are also very good, and Nils Asther makes his movie return promisingly, though in a very short bit. The direction by Edward Ludwig is very broad and worthy of mention.—Universal.

★★★ Footsteps in the Dark

The news in this one is that Errol Flynn is all dressed up in modern clothes. And Errol Flynn in a murder mystery is something to ponder, too. It's one of those farced mysteriosos played for laughs rather than suspense. The only trouble is that there aren't as many laughs as there should be.

Errol is supposed to be an amateur detective who keeps sticking his nose into police business and then writing lurid books about it all. Brenda Marshall is his unsuspecting wife and Lucille Watson his acrimonious mother-in-law. Neither of them knows what he is up to and both are suspicious of him. That, of course, makes for a worse mix-up than would be normal because the gal Flynn plays around with, in order to straighten out a killing, is Lee Patrick, a hard-boiled burlesque queen.

Have we mentioned that Flynn belongs in the very snootiest social set? Well, he does. Add a dash of Alan Hale as the police inspector, Allen Jenkins as Flynn's chauffeur-confidant, and William Frawley as the dumb cop, and you can probably write the rest of the picture yourself.

It's pretty good stuff because the basic story is nicely figured out, but the dialogue could be brighter, and there could have been a lot more imagination displayed in all of the characterizations. The cast is uniformly good, and in key with exactly what you expect of them. Lee Patrick, perhaps, stands out a bit over average. Directed by Lloyd Bacon. —Warners.

★★★ Lady From Cheyenne

Frank Lloyd's name on the masthead of a movie usually means a big extra-special extravaganza. Not so this time. For once Lloyd has manufactured a simple, unobtrusive little picture. To be sure, it has to do—more or less—with history, but it is a small-scale affair. Loretta Young is the star and there is a lot of slam-bang action, so don't let it worry you. You'll probably enjoy it a great deal.

The movie starts off with a warning that it is based on history—as the authors would like to think it happened. It seems that there is no available data explaining the circumstances that led to Wyoming's passing the first American law permitting women to vote. It's true, but how it happened no one knows. So the authors made up this story to explain it. And a merry notion it is, too.

Loretta Young is the gal who is responsible, according to this yarn. She is a mild and naïve schoolmarm from the East who comes out West to teach the three r's. Well, Eddie Arnold is an old meanie who controls the town, lock, stock and barrel, and Preston Foster is a suave lawyer who fronts for Arnold. They try to push Loretta around and she, mostly because she doesn't know any better, gives them a tough battle. She finally goes to the state capital and lobbies through a bill giving femmes the vote. It's the only way she can think of to lick the ornery gents.

The yarn makes for fun as you can imagine, and it's told in neat tongue-in-cheek fashion. The three principals are better than average in their acting, although it takes a couple of reels to get used to Loretta in dowdy old-West clothes; she's been a clothes-horse in too many films and (truth to tell) looks better in modern dress. Also, the writing of Foster's role is a bit on the difficult side. The movie writers seem to be getting the idea that all they have to do to regenerate a heel is to have him say, 'I'm sorry,' and turn over a new leaf. It's not as easy as that.

There is an extra good cast of supporting players, best among 'em being Gladys George, Willie Best and Charles Hinds, who wears a beard for the first time in years and years of movie playing—in case you care. Directed by Frank Lloyd. —Universal.

★★★ That Night in Rio

A bit of disappointment here. This picture could have been a smash; actually, it is pretty good, but not as good as expected. It is a lavish musical starring Don Ameche, Alice Faye and Carmen Miranda, and it is all done in magnificent Technicolor, so you're pretty sure to have a good time—if you don't go expecting too much.

Don Ameche has sprouted into two guys this time; he is himself, a pleasant enough actor, and also a South American millionaire playboy. For story purposes he switches with himself in order to handle a big financial deal, and this causes great confusion in the household. That is to say, Alice Faye, who is married to the rich financier, is not told about the substitution when the actor replaces her husband for a couple of days. She thinks she notices a difference in him but is not sure. That, of course, makes for a number of amusing musical comedy situations—especially since Miranda is the inamorata of the Don Ameche who is an actor.

If it all sounds a bit familiar, it is because this is a new version of "Folies Bergere," which was a movie starring Chevalier, Merle Oberon and Ann Sothern way back when. It hasn't been rewritten much but it is still fun, though not logical or sensible. Come to think of it, who ever heard of asking a musical comedy to make sense?

Besides the three top names, all of whom are excellent, a strong cast includes Curt Bois, S. Z. Sakall and Eddie Conrad in very funny bits. There are five songs, none of them too hot. But the color is really tops. Directed by Irving Cummings.—20th Century-Fox.

★★½ Sleepers West

This is the second in the new series of Michael Shayne whodunits, and not too hot, although carrying a certain amount of action and excitement. Trouble, largely is that there are too many characters and too much story.

Lloyd Nolan is plenty okay as Michael Shayne, the cop who is worried because he wants to save an innocent guy from the electric chair. He once convicted the same lad on a different charge and thinks he knows the facts. Before he manages to prove his thesis, there is, of course, a lot of back and forth to-do. It's all played on a train, which should have speeded the pace considerably — but didn't.

Besides Nolan, the cast boasts of Lynn Bari, who is fine as a nosey newsgal. Mary Beth Hughes, again, is merely decorative as the other girl. Louis Jean Heydt and Don Costello are swell in minor parts. Watch this Costello guy. Directed by Eugene Ford.—20th Century-Fox.

★★½ Melody for Three

The newest Dr. Christian picture is pretty good. There ought to be some way of keeping the Dr. Christian name in the title to help identify the series, although the producers are scared to keep using it because they fear you will think you have already seen it. Maybe. At any rate it is a neat little package of pleasant family entertainment.

Jean Hersholt is master of his characterization of the kindly country doctor by now, of course. This time, in addition to the usual assortment of medical homilies, he manages to reunite Fay Wray and her son with Walter Woolf King, her estranged husband. The quarrel between Fay and her husband is not properly explained, but it probably doesn't matter since all ends well.

Because Fay is cast as a nurse and former music teacher, and since her son, Schuyler Standish, is supposed to be a violin prodigy, and her husband a famous conductor, there is room in the script for a number of interpolated musical numbers, which doesn't hurt at all. Directed by Erle C. Kenton.—RKO-Radio.

★★½ Dead Men Tell

The oldest of the series pictures is the one about Charlie Chan, who goes merrily on his way in this newest episode. The pattern of these yarns is pretty thoroughly established, and this one makes no special effort to be different. There is a good deal of mystery, there are a couple of killings, there are a number of amusing situations, and Chan gets himself into a tough spot and squeezes out of it narrowly. It's in the detail and settings that the difference lies, and this one (on these scores) is refreshingly entertaining. It's worth the price of your ducat—which is what you wanted to know, isn't it?

Sidney Toler carries on quite pleasantly as the fattish Chinese detective, and Sen Yung, his number two son, makes the usual assortment of mistakes for comedy and plot complication purposes. The yarn develops on a boat, as a group of people are about to set out for a treasure hunt, having found a mysterious map coming straight from a dead pirate. A few more laughs would have helped. Sheila Ryan and Robert Weldon, both of whom are pleasant to the eye, supply the romance. Directed by Harry Lachman.—20th Century-Fox.

★★½ Here Comes Happiness

This is an innocuous little comedy which would not rate much mention, if it were not for the fact that the cast is made up almost entirely of youngsters—most of them a lot better than the experienced troupers they will replace some day. Meaning, especially, Mildred Coles, a beautiful young lady with a great deal of histrionic ability.

Mildred is the daughter of Russell Hicks, a self-made copper tycoon. She is about to marry Richard Ainley, a socialite heel, but runs away on the eve of her wedding and tries to battle things out on her own. She meets Edward Norris, an ambitious window cleaner, and love blooms. After the usual number of movie mix-ups she marries the poor boy, with pop's blessing, while Marjorie Gateson (mamma) faints dead away.

Norris is a clean-cut young man for whom there should be room. Richard Ainley, too, seems to have a lot of possibilities. Directed by Noel M. Smith.—Warners.

★★ Lone Wolf Takes a Chance

This rather exciting series of whodunits gets a setback this time; the weakest in the set thus far.

You will remember that the Lone Wolf is a diamond thief who has reformed and who now practices his nefarious tricks only in the interest of justice and kindness to his fellow men. Of course he always gets himself into a terrific jam about half way through and doggone near lands in jail. The trouble with this one is that the story elements are too heavy and complicated.

Warren William, of course, is his usual debonair self in the top role and Eric Blore, again, supplies the laughs, with Don Beddoe swell in his cop assignment. June Storey and Henry Wilcoxon handle the romance in so-so manner. Directed by Sidney Salkow.—Columbia.

★★ Double Date

Some of us old-timers remember Glenn Tryon as a charming and lovable comedian in the silents. Well, here he is now as a director—and that is about all the good news there is in this particular movie. It's not much of a show, but Tryon's hand is plentifully evident. The timing is A-1 and there are numbers of amusing touches throughout which must have been put there by the director. So expect to see Tryon's name at the head of some worthwhile product soon.

The story is a slapstick affair about a college boy and college girl who try to prevent his father from marrying her aunt. They think marriage is inadvisable for the oldsters, but learn their lesson.

Peggy Moran and Rand Brooks are okay as the youngsters, but Una Merkel and Edmund Lowe grab the honors. Directed by Glenn Tryon.—Universal.

AN ACE OF CLUBS

lure of getting something for nothing. Raffled prizes consist of gift orders for John Frederics hats and jewelry and clothing from the village's swankiest shops. Owner Morrison always calls on one of the celebrities present to do the number-pulling. George Raft won a lady's hat last time. Carole Landis picked her own number, purely by coincidence. Mischa Auer, who owns a night club down the street but spends most of his time at Mocambo, gave his dramatic all to choosing a number and came up with a mouse-trap clutching his fingers! Mischa swears it was Morrison's revenge for Mischa's nightly habit of striking a pose in the foyer when he's ready to leave, and bellowing in mournful, measured Russian tones, "Private bus leaving in five minutes for the Scheherazade." You've guessed it. "Scheherazade" is the club Mischa owns.

Charlie, the bartender, knows exactly what the stars will order the minute they walk in the door. He presides over a blonde wood bar and hears "scotch and soda" more often than anything else. Charlie's also noted that actors are second to producers in the matter of tipping, with Mark Hellinger and Gene Towne leading the field in generosity.

It's the birds in the glass cage, though, that rate as the club's top attraction. Twenty little scarlet tanagers and an assortment of wide-winged parrots and cockatoos stare down at the stars from a specially built niche in the south wall. The birds spend most of their time teetering peacefully back and forth on the artificial tree limbs arranged in front of a ripply blue background. But when the rumba band begins to warm up with claves and maraccas, they go wild with excitement. They can't hear the music but they do feel the vibration from the drums.

The Mocambo management can pat itself on the back for this stunt. It's the first night club in history to make a success of giving its customers the bird!

table where they belong and that sort of thing.

And now, back to the mirror. My eyes are my best feature so I do whatever I can to emphasize them. In the daytime I use mascara; in the evenings, both mascara and eye shadow. I pluck my eyebrows a bit and always from underneath because I pluck them only to curve them (they'd be string-straight if I didn't), not to thin them. An astonishing gadget which I'm sure most women don't know about is a liner—little pencil-sized things made of soft cotton stuff, gray in color which you can buy in little bunches at the dime stores. You simply rub the liner on the eyebrow pencil, and instead of a sharp black or brown line, your brows look like any natural hair; it does away with that sharp, pencil line.

My nose is the least attractive of my features. For the screen I shadow it like mad in order to, well, curb it. Offscreen I don't do a blessed thing about it; there's nothing I can do. Anyway, my theory is that by emphasizing my best feature I simultaneously play down my worst. Making my eyes worth looking at detracts from my nose.

I use a raspberry red rouge and not just a dab on each cheek—sort of blend it over the whole of my cheeks, right up and into my hairline. And I always apply my face powder (use a rose-beige) with a soft wad of absorbent cotton. It seems to go on more evenly that way.

As far as my hair is concerned, I have one serious session a week—a shampoo and lemon rinse. When making a picture, I dye my hair auburn, but between films let it go back to its natural dark brown. I have four or five light permanents a year, with the heat on for just two minutes to give the hair a twist.

I love perfume and believe every woman should use one scent so that when she wafts by a blind man could say, "There goes Claudette Colbert," or "There goes Jukie O'Grady." The sense of smell is the most acute of all the senses, and the most stirring to the masculine heart!

And speaking of appealing to the male, here again comfort's the thing. I try to make him physically comfortable first; nice, squashy chair, a drink and smoke convenient. I try to make him feel at ease; if I can't, I pass him on to someone else, but quickly.

Back to the boudoir . . . all my nightgowns have appliqué work on them, never lace for I don't like it. My robes are mostly quilted ones, quite tailored, and most of them are in shades of coral. I wear only one kind of bedroom slipper; heelless white ones, lined and edged with rabbit. I don't like high heels, anyway, and never wear them unless I have to. Secret! Women, who walk softly, walk the more surely into a man's heart. There's something devastatingly feminine in the soft whispering foot-fall.

Men notice daintiness before anything else, I believe. I have often heard them say of an exciting looking woman, richly gowned, "but she doesn't look very, er, clean." Make-up should never show very much or look smeared. I always scrub my face with a stiff bristled brush before I put on fresh make-up, to be sure my face is immaculately clean. Little dainty touches help an awful lot. I always have a crisp, monogrammed handkerchief peeking out of a suit pocket, a dress or sweater pocket, even my robe pocket. I never wear artificial flowers, very little jewelry—mostly a lapel clip and a ring.

I'm not the formal type at all. Whenever I cut loose and buy a very formal evening gown, it's completely lost and so am I. I think you must never feel self-conscious in your clothes. Flatter yourself with your best styles and colors, and let who will be exotic. I look best in white evening things, with short sleeves and a square neckline. When I'm not working and my hair is back to natural, I wear a lot of tomato red, a lot of Kelly green and aquamarine. I cannot bear the pastel shades. Never wear fussy shoes with lots of straps and geegaws. Give me a plain tailor-made pump any day.

Every day in every way be as completely relaxed, as much the purring cat as possible, and you'll have all my secrets.

THE WELLS-DEL RIO ROMANCE

shaking hands with "the most beautiful woman in the world" and wondering what they could find to talk about. He assumed she would ask him, as fifty other people had, what his impressions of Hollywood were (after two days).

But she didn't. With no apparent effort, she thought of something else to say, completely removed from prying curiosity. Something about the music that was an obbligato to the hum of conversation. Before he realized what was happening, they were comparing tastes in music and he was discovering, with surprised delight, that she was as intelligent and charming as she was beautiful. And she was discovering, with equal surprise and delight, that he was as animated and refreshing as he was brilliant.

It wasn't a case of love at first encounter. At the most, it was a case of instant congeniality—which both of them found very pleasant. But he didn't think about her seriously until several months later.

When they met, Orson knew that Dolores was married, and he had no reason to suspect that she and her husband weren't congenial. There had been no inkling of the growing coolness between them. Dolores likewise knew that Orson was married, and she had no reason to suspect that he and his wife were not congenial. He had emphatically, even belligerently, denied divorce rumors.

That, ironically enough, was one good reason why they didn't immediately think of each other in terms of love. Another good reason was that both of them were trying to stay married to their respective mates—Orson because of his little girl, Dolores because of her religion.

They met again, soon afterward, at another party and again found themselves at ease with each other conversationally. After a few such casual meetings, they automatically became good friends.

No one said, "Orson and Dolores had better watch out or they'll be falling in love." It didn't occur to anyone that their mental congeniality could ever develop into a physical attraction. Especially after Orson started growing a fantastic beard for a screen role that later failed to materialize.

No man setting out to steal the heart of a glamour girl would ever have committed the psychological error of sabotaging his appearance as Orson did with that beaver. He would have said, "If I have to wear a beard in my next role, it'll be by courtesy of the Westmores."

SAYMAN'S Vegetable Wonder SOAP

In December 1939, Orson's wife—the former Virginia Nicholson, a Chicago socialite—announced in New York that their marriage would end as soon as she could get a Reno divorce. She got it early in February 1940.

The gossip columnists maintained a sharp watch on Orson but couldn't figure out whom he would marry next. He kept everybody, including himself, guessing. He went out with a varied assortment of beauties. He made it apparent that he wasn't in love with any one girl.

Then, in March 1940, Dolores announced that she and Cedric Gibbons had separated. She said, simply, "After months of unhappiness, both Cedric and I have decided it is best to part. I have no intention of getting a divorce, but when marriage between two people becomes impossible, it is wiser to say goodbye."

HOLLYWOOD was completely bowled over by the news. Why, the Gibbons-Del Rio marriage had looked set for a lifetime! They were the couple who made a sentimental pilgrimage every year to the Santa Barbara Mission, where they were married. It was hard to understand what could have made them part. After nine years together, "incompatibility" didn't seem like the answer. Hollywood started looking around for a better reason.

Suddenly, people remembered that Orson Welles had been divorced only a month before. They also remembered hearing that Orson and Dolores had become "very good friends." They catapulted to the conclusion that Orson was to blame for the break-up of the Gibbons-Del Rio marriage.

The circulation of that suspicion gave a large segment of the public a very unflattering opinion of Orson Welles. Let it be said to his credit that that didn't frighten him. He didn't decide to think of his career and forget Dolores. What he decided was that enough people were going to avoid him without his avoiding a friend. He called up Dolores and asked her to go to a concert.

She might not have gone if people hadn't taken the trouble to tell her that they had to laugh at those ridiculous rumors that Orson Welles meant something to her. She had too much respect for Orson to let him be a target for ridicule by her would-be defenders. She accepted his invitation.

That was when the romance really began.

That evening spent together to spite malicious rumor, they discovered just how completely at ease they were with one another. They stopped taking their mental congeniality for granted, started thinking of it as something exceptional, something to appreciate.

Since that evening, Orson hasn't been interested in dating any other girl, and Dolores hasn't been interested in being dated by any other man. They have been sufficient unto each other.

They didn't decide that it was love after three or four dates—or even after three or four dozen. Both had been too recently disillusioned about love to rush into any new emotional alliance on short acquaintance. Each of them was happy just to have found someone companionable—and willing to let time decide whether or not their companionship could be love.

In May 1940, Orson's former wife married again, but the event received only fleeting notice. No one speculated on the possibility that it was she and not Orson, who had wanted a divorce to be free to marry again.

Meanwhile, he and Dolores were beginning to see each other daily—usually for dinner. Orson, particularly, had a great deal to talk about. He was writing "Citizen Kane." He was excited about it, and he had to communicate his excitement to someone who understood him. Not that that was all they talked about. Far from it. They were beginning to share all their thoughts. And Dolores' thoughts were just as interesting to him as his were to her. He would sit back, fascinated by the miracle that a woman so incredibly beautiful had such a marvelous mind.

Dolores thrived on all of this. She hadn't had so much stimulating conversation in years. Or so much companionship. So many days she had just killed time, waiting for Cedric to come home, hoping he would feel like taking her out—and so many nights he had come home too tired even to talk—until, finally, she couldn't bear it another day.

People who hadn't seen her gay in years suddenly noticed that Dolores was learning how to laugh again. The same people who had once ridiculed Orson began telling her that Orson, with his mad sense of humor, was good for her. One of them asked him curiously whether he thought Dolores was more beautiful when she smiled or when she was serious. His answer was: "I think it's nip-and-tuck."

But there still are people who can't believe that Orson and Dolores are a match. Half of them shake their heads and say, "But he's so much younger than she is!" The other half shake their heads and say, "She's so much older than he!"

Somebody, sometime, somewhere, printed that Dolores was twelve years older than Orson—and that figure has stuck in people's minds. Actually, Orson will be 26 in May, and Dolores will be 33 in August. No girl of his own age, and certainly no girl younger, could cope with him. He was a child prodigy, remember. And he's still several jumps ahead, mentally. For companionship, he needs someone with a mature mind, a poised mind, able to discuss life, love, literature or anything else worth discussing—intelligently. And Dolores has that kind of mind.

THEIR mutual interests are unlimited. They enjoy conversing with one another, yet they're the sort, too, who can feel companionable without talking. Which happens when they go fishing, or go on painting-picnics. (Orson, characteristically, paints huge canvases.) They hold hands at concerts, as if to guarantee that the music flows through one as it does the other.

Enjoying the pleasant things of life is important to Dolores—and it's becoming important to Orson, who used to think he wasn't living unless he was in a hectic hurry. He gulped his meals to get back to work sooner. He may still gulp breakfast and lunch, but not dinner. He takes time to eat that slowly, and conversationally, with Dolores.

He thrives on her tolerance. She thrives on his exuberance.

When she parted from Cedric and announced that there would be no divorce, Dolores meant it. She didn't anticipate that she would ever want to marry again. And, particularly, she meant it because of her religion.

Even after she and Orson realized that they were in love, she didn't think she could ever bring herself to sue for divorce. She hesitated weeks before she took the drastic step.

That she did take it, finally, is proof that she and Orson are desperately in love—even though the chronic scoffers scoff, and though they, themselves, refuse to discuss it until Dolores is legally free.

let out a deep and business-like growl.

"That mastiff," Tone explained, "is as harmless as a lamb. His name is Bad Boy and he belongs to Burgess."

Eventually Bad Boy departed, and we picked up where we had left off.

What about the life of the free lance?

"The free lance life is strictly for me. I love it. I'm committed to two pictures a year for Universal. But it's an intelligent arrangement. No sappy scripts will be fastened on me. Where we have differences of opinion, Universal and I will talk it over. Beyond that I will do what pictures I please and when.

"Right now I seem to be doing a siege of comedy and enjoying it. Yesterday's dull cinema Casanova has acquired a much-needed sense of humor. It was that way in 'Trail of the Vigilantes' and in 'Nice Girl?' That's how it is in my next, 'She Knew All the Answers,' the 'she' being Joan Bennett who knows a thing or two about romantic comedy herself. I'm a Wall Street broker and she's a smart young operator, sparkling as a pinwheel and mad as a hatter."

None of this sounded like the Franchot Tone we'd read about—the one who was distrustful of interviewers, answered questions with monosyllables, and sped the parting guest so's he could be alone.

"Has your personality changed at all in the last few years?"

"I don't think so. But I have become more aware of whatever personality I possess. One thing I like about this business is that it leaves you no illusions about yourself. Publicity departments, columnists, fan magazine writers—the whole build-up processes—force you to stop and say to yourself: 'Am I really like that?'

"And when you stop to analyze, you generally have a lot better idea of what you are. Of course you are never sure, so you gradually lose any know-it-all attitude you might have had five years ago."

"What about interviewers?" We finally came right out and asked him. "Do you resent them?"

"Only if they want to distort facts. A good many of them want to fit my remarks into a preconceived story idea. My answers in that case don't really matter. Nor do the interviewers seem to care a jot."

AT WHICH point we will have to begin summarizing the results of our long talk with Mr. T.

His philosophy of life is this: "Gather your rosebuds while you may. Only be sure they ARE rosebuds." What he'd like best of all to do in his leisure is to go fishing with his father and brother.

He is very eloquent (and diplomatic) on the topic of "The Type of Woman That Interests Me Most." Says Franchot, after some prodding by the reporter:

"All types of women interest me most. An impromptu and brief reply is really an insult to a subject so intricate, so delicate and so inexhaustible. Beauty, brains, buoyancy; face, form, fancy, feeling, fire; sincerity, sophistication, sensitivity—is there any letter of the alphabet that doesn't furnish a hundred headings?"

What woman he currently believes contains most of these wonderful ingredients you will not learn from us. When we asked him he said: "And what do you think of Shirley Temple?"

He had no hobbies he quickly volleyed, anything to change the subject. He owned "ten yards of records," most of them classical. His favorite composers are Mozart and Verdi; Respighi and Shostakovitch; Hoagy Carmichael and Artie Shaw.

He swears he's a woebegone dancer. "I have failed to get the rhythm of every ballroom innovation since 1927, the year I left college. My favorite dancing partners are the ones who agree that the floor is too crowded anyway."

His Number One phobia is the professional celebrity chaser who devotes his time to lying in wait. His main regret is that he never knew hardship or poverty. He adds very humbly: "I suppose there is still time." Flattery is his chief abomination. His favorite people are willing waiters.

For a Blue Book playboy he has an extraordinary nonchalance about clothes. "I'm interested in clothes merely as items of comfort—not display."

He subsided for a moment, sent a neat little smoke ring toward the ceiling. "Anything else?" he asked with an amused smile.

We were about to inquire what he thought of Carole Landis with whom his name has been linked a trifle more forcefully than it has to the names of eighteen other luscious damsels, when the telephone rang.

He was humming "Londonderry Air" when he disappeared into the adjoining room. And thinking, in all probability, of those wonderful ingredients that go into the type of woman who interests him most.

At dinner time we bumped into him at Dave Chasen's. With him was a wonderful dream girl, blonde and svelte.

Her initials are all that we'll relay to you.

for the Walter Langs now work for Cesar. It's questionable as to which appreciates the other more. William has one complaint. He hates to have his picture taken and dies the death of a dog when photographers ask him to pose with the boss. Cesar has no complaints. He puts himself into William's hands. William plans the meals, markets, cooks, cleans, valets. The only thing he doesn't do is the washing. "I'm having six—or eight—to dinner," says Cesar and comes home to a beautifully laid table, beautifully arranged flowers, a beautifully served meal. When it's dinner for eight, William borrows plates and silver from the neighbors. Cesar's service covers only six. The perfect servant, however, doesn't cure the most of anticipatory jitters. He's always afraid his guests may not have a good time. They always do. After dinner they relax with backgammon, gin rummy or gab. The people with whom Romero spends most of his leisure—seeing them constantly either at his home or theirs—include his family, the Walter Langs, the George Murphys, Ann Sothern and Roger Pryor, the Ray Millands, Ty and Annabella Power, the Gary Coopers, the Fred MacMurrays, the Alan Curtises.

His wardrobe provides further evidence of conservative tastes. He owns not more than fifteen suits accumulated over the past seven years. Three or four Oxford grays, three browns, three tweeds that get better-looking with age. When the elbows wear out, he has them patched with leather pads and calls them hunting jackets. Three midnight blue dinner jackets, of which he wears only the newest, keeping the others for rain scenes or walking through brush in pictures. One set of tails, six years old, and he thinks it's high time he bought a new pair. No blue suits. He got fed up with them as a kid when, every time it came to buying a new best suit, it was always blue serge. One loud blue and beige sports jacket which he looks at askance and wears only at a ranch outside Victorville, where he spends occasional days off. He favors striped ties and shirts that are white or tan or white with tan stripes. His dinner shirts are soft-bosomed and collared—he can't bear 'em stiff.

He doesn't care about slipping into something loose. A smoking jacket Bob Taylor gave him five years ago sees the light maybe once in six months. He wears a gold key chain, a gold wristwatch and, on his left pinky, a gold ring presented by Joan Crawford. He sleeps in pajamas, both sections, and for at least eight hours. His favorite drink is gin and tonic.

He's not fussy about food and his breakfast is always the same—orange juice, scrambled eggs and bacon, white buttered toast and coffee. He eats it from a breakfast set with which he was gifted by a former butler who won them via punchboard. He doesn't like skimming the papers, so when he works—which is practically always—the morning paper waits beside his favorite chair, and he goes through it carefully at night with the evening paper. He's an inveterate reader, buys all the latest books and has just finished Jan Valtin's "Out of the Night." He thinks it should be required reading for Americans, to make them realize how damn lucky they are to be Americans.

His house has no tub, because he always showers. If he ever gets a month or two off, he'd like to go down to Cuba. He was a boy on his last visit and wants to take a look at the cousins he's never seen. He smokes two packs of Chesterfields a day. When people say "tsk, tsk," he picks up a stub to prove that he rarely takes more than three or four puffs. He's a crack tennis player, and his likability is nowhere more in evidence than at the club where everyone wants to sit down and talk to Butch—the tag his friends gave him because he's so un-Butchish. He swims but isn't crazy about it, bowls occasionally and loves to ride. He'd like to own Jimmy, the horse he rides in the "Cisco Kid" pictures, but he's not for sale.

His favorite forms of music are swing and opera, but what he enjoys most is his mother singing at the piano—a happy childhood memory carried happily over into his maturity. He gets a kick out of raking his flowerbed, transplanting cuttings and watching them take root—another holdover. His kid ambition was to be a florist. The only job he ever disputes with William is flower-arranging, at which he's good.

He's had no luck with dogs. Of two cocker spaniels, one was killed by a car, the other by distemper. When Tyrone Power's police dog had a litter, he gave Cesar one of the pups, promptly dubbed "Ty" by Cesar in appreciation. For no discoverable reason, the four-legged Ty took a powder and never came back. Cesar, undiscouraged, is looking forward to the boxer Kay Francis promised him.

He drives a Buick convertible sedan, maroon, at a snappy forty to forty-five, which he thinks is plenty when you're not going to a fire. It's the fifth Buick he's owned and he's owned it five months. Six months ago coming home from a party, he fell asleep, crashed into a tree, smashed the car up and escaped unhurt. Now he sleeps only when stationary.

If he's not the playboy he's been painted, neither is he a stick-in-the-mud. But he's missed many a good party because he hates to shave and, given the choice between shaving and not dancing, he frequently picks the latter. He does the rumba and tango supremely well, doesn't care for the conga and loves to watch jitterbugs. He thinks midriff dresses are vulgar, sees nothing pretty in the public display of feminine stomachs and eyes with cold distaste strangers who approach him at night clubs with requests that he dance with their wives.

Like any man, he enjoys going out with girls who are attractive, smartly dressed and good companions, and has been seen most recently with Alice Faye, Katherine Leslie and Priscilla Stillman. Katherine and Priscilla are old friends from New York. Priscilla's husband, whom she's divorcing, is also a friend of Cesar's, which is why he did another of his rare burns when Louella Parsons had them waiting only for the final decree before merging.

He has no special heart interest, would like to marry, but sees no sense in marriage unless you're sure you're deeply in love and want to spend the rest of your life with the girl. From the sidelines he's watched so many of his friends divorced, that it's given him to think.

Definitely, finally and forever, he has no ideal, and thinks a man's as likely as not to fall in love with a woman he'd never have expected to look at twice.

She could be Helen, Sappho and Mrs. Midas combined, and Hollywood would still vote her big winner the day she becomes Mrs. Butch (Sweet Guy) Romero.

Delfin Mendes, Lisbon, Portugal. Virginia Grey's first screen role, that of Little Eva in Universal's "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was given her by virtue of her spindly legs and yellow hair. Born in Hollywood, her mother was a cutter at the studio and, although Virginia was brought up in a movie atmosphere, her one ambition was to be a nurse. She's actually had a year's training in a hospital, but is under long-term contract and can't continue with it. Five feet five inches in height, she weighs 117 pounds, has golden hair and blue eyes. She's playing in "Blonde Inspiration" for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Margaret Kahn, Medford, Mass. Ted North's fate was decided the moment he was born into one of the Middle West's oldest theatrical families in Topeka, Kansas, on October 3rd, 1916. In college, he attempted to branch off into law, but the smell of grease paint was too tempting, and he came back to the family fold and played in the North stock company. Warner Baxter took an interest in him and helped him get a job just six weeks after he first set foot in California. To date he's played in "The Bride Wore Crutches" and "For Beauty's Sake." He's six feet one inch tall, weighs 170 pounds, has blonde hair and blue eyes. He loves sports, especially basketball and boxing, and always turns to the sports page of a newspaper first—even before the funnies! Thick, juicy steaks smothered in mushrooms are his favorite dish; knocking on wood, his sole superstition; biographies and Esquire his choice reading material. His greatest hope is that he'll be a great actor; his greatest fear, that he won't. You can get hold of him at 20th Century-Fox, Box No. 900, Beverly Hills, Cal.

Miss B. J. W., San Diego, Cal. Yes, indeed, Red Skelton's raising Cain in another picture—"Lady Be Good," with Ann Sothern and Eleanor Powell. . . . John Wayne's starring in "A Man Betrayed" and "Lady from New Orleans" at present. In neither does he play opposite Claire Trevor, sorry to say. . . . As far as Helen Parrish and Charley Lang are concerned, they're inseparable at present.

Jane Follett, Savannah, Ga. Dave Niven's with the British army, but makes his headquarters at the Boodles Club, Saint James Street, London, England, where you can reach him.

Jim Randall, Quincy, Fla. Bronco-busting Charlie Starrett's a big bruiser, measuring six feet two inches tall and 180 pounds, with brown hair and eyes. He's the 32-year-old dad of twin boys, Charles and David. His wife's an actress by the name of Mary MacKinnon. . . . Iris Meredith's better known as Iris Shunn to her home-towners in Sioux City, Iowa, where she was born in June, 1915. Her story reads like a fairy tale—she was discovered by a talent scout while cashiering in a theatre! Five feet five inches tall, she weighs a trim 109 pounds, has auburn hair and blue eyes, is as yet unmarried.

Dorothy Lanage, Pittsburgh, Penn. Lew Ayres found his screen name right in his own Frederick Lewis Ayer. . . . Yes, there's a new Dr. Kildaire picture in the making, but it's as yet unnamed. . . . All scenes in the series are shot on the set, not in a real honest-to-goodness hospital.

Tom O'Neill, San Francisco, Cal. Dick Greene's 26, a native Britisher. He's been in England for several months now. You can get his picture by writing 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box No. 900, Beverly Hills, Cal., and enclosing 25c in coin or stamps.

F. Lucille Modrak, Plainfield, N. J. That man-about-town, Vic Mature, hails from Louisville, Ky., is six feet two inches tall, weighs 198 pounds, has black hair and blue eyes. He always tried to write plays when he was a boy, but never gave a thought to acting until he landed in Hollywood a few years ago. Since then he's bowled 'em over in "Housekeeper's Daughter," "One Million B. C.," "Captain Caution" and on the Broadway stage in "Lady in the Dark." You can get stills from his pictures at United Artists, 1041 N. Formosa Ave., Hollywood, Cal. (10c apiece). Autographed pictures sell for 25c per. . . . Ask Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, Cal., for stills of "Gone With the Wind."

Ellen Jane Emery, Perth Amboy, N. J. Katharine Hepburn was born into a Hartford, Conn., socially prominent family; goes by her real name. Even before she went to Bryn Mawr, she had done a lot of backyard puppetry and amateur stock theatricals near her home. For 10c you can get an autographed photo of her at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, Cal.

Lebedeff, Charles Wilson, Helen Ericson and Barnett Parker. . . . You can get stills at 10c apiece at the studio. They'll send you a picture of Jean Rogers for 25c in coin or stamps. Her current film is "Dead Men Tell."

Janet, Charleston, S. C. Your idol, Bruce Cabot, is really Jacques de Bujac of Carlsbad, N. M. He was born 37 years ago this April, is six feet one and one-half inches tall, weighs 180 pounds. His latest picture is "The Flame of New Orleans" with Marlene Dietrich and Roland Young.

Bettina Young, Halifax, N. S. Yep, Ruby Keeler was born right in your home town and attended school there until she showed such surprising promise in "drill." Her parents took her to New York and entered her in the Professional Children's School. At 13, she began her stage career in a Broadway show chorus and rapidly sped toward stardom on stage and screen. The person who really takes the honors for discovering and encouraging her is Florenz Ziegfeld, who signed her for "Whoopee" and "Show Girl." We don't know if she has any relatives in Halifax or not. She doesn't spend much time there, 'cause her three homes are located in New York, Scarsdale, N. Y., and Los Angeles, Cal.

M. B. N., Virginia. Since "Kitty Foyle," 30-year-old Dennis Morgan's acted in "Kisses for Breakfast" and "Affectionately Yours." He's married to Lillian Vedder and has a namesake, Stanley, aged 6, and a 3-year-old daughter Kristen. . . . Bandleader Bob Crosby's wed and has a couple kids. His latest pictures are "Rookies on Parade" and "Sis Hopkins." In case you don't know it already, he's Bing's twenty-seven-year-old younger brother.

Miss A. R. Wolf, Johnstown, N. Y. Up until Shepperd Strudwick happened to play Pierrot in the University of North Carolina dramatic club, he had his heart set on being a writer. Taking the part as a favor to a friend, he made such a hit that he decided to take up acting as a career. Upon his graduation he left his hometown of Hillsborough, N. C. and went to New York where he toiled as office boy to Charles Coburn before breaking into the theater as an understudy. Six feet two inches tall, weighing 170 pounds, he's married to Helen Wynn, a fellow-tourer in "Winterset." M-G-M will send you his picture for 10c.

M. Kelly, Little Falls, N. Y. Humph Bogart can be reached at Warner Brothers, Burbank, Cal., and John Barrymore is at 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box No. 900, Burbank, Cal. Photos cost 25c. Metro distributes Ann Rutherford's at a dime apiece.

Lois Bramblett, Middlebury, Vt. Alice Faye was born Alice Leppert in New York City on May 5th, 1915. From the time she was old enough to think, she liked to play "make believe," consequently centered her attentions on the stage. After several Broadway roles, she was called to Hollywood, where she moved her family and settled down permanently. She's five feet five inches tall in high heels, weighs 112 pounds, has blonde hair and blue eyes. She seldom wears jewelry, likes food (especially steak) and spends her spare time between bowling alleys and a comfortable chair with current novels. She loves dogs, is impulsive and can mimic like a parrot. Right now she's seen around a lot with millionaire Charles Wrightman.

James Rankin, Conshohocken, Pa. Ray Milland would be glad to hear from you. Write to him at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal. With your request for a picture, enclose 25c in coin or stamps. He was born in Neath, Wales, on Jan. 3, 1907.

Miss D. De Rose, New York City. Linda Darnell was christened Linda Monette Eloyse Darnell in Dallas, Texas, shortly after her birth on Oct. 16, 1923. One of six children, there wasn't time for her parents to spoil her. She had worked on the stage and as a model even before finishing high school. Five feet, four inches tall, she weighs 109 pounds, has brown hair and eyes. As far as her favorites are concerned, she has better luck with actors than animals: She gets roles opposite Ty Power, but she's always getting hay fever from her dozens of prize rabbits!

DO YOU INHALE?

All smokers do — sometimes. And the smoke, passing over delicate membranes, increases exposure to irritation. So — choose your cigarette with care! Eminent doctors long ago reported that compared with the strikingly contrasted Philip Morris: four other leading cigarettes were found to average 235% more irritant — with irritant effects lasting more than five times as long!

GRAY HAIR WRECKS HOME!

HOW MANY homes have been wrecked because a woman neglected her personal appearance? No one knows — but you do know this: One of the greatest blights on a woman's appearance can be gray, streaked, or faded hair.

And it's so unnecessary! Right today, in the privacy of your room, you can comb through your hair a color that will take years off your appearance. Mary T. Goldman's Hair Coloring Preparation will color your gray, or faded hair to the desired shade, so beautifully and gradually that your closest friends won't guess. It won't rub off, wash off, change the lustre of your hair or interfere with your wave.

And it's so easy! Just go to your drug or department store and ask for your shade of Mary T. Goldman's, the way millions have been doing for 50 years with beautiful results. Competent medical authorities pronounce it harmless. No skin test needed.

Make up your mind to look YOUNG! Get your bottle of Mary T. Goldman's today — accept no substitute. Money-back guarantee. For further proof, clip and mail coupon below. We'll send you ABSOLUTELY FREE a complete test kit for coloring a lock of your own hair.

Turn to our valuable Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. The "general rating" is the average rating of our critic and newspaper critics all over the country. 4★ means very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. C denotes that the picture is recommended for children as well as adults. Asterisk shows that only Modern Screen rating is given on films not yet reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

in the company of Cary Grant. Dave Chasen and sundry other Hollywood restaurant impresarios, by instruction, fend off all lensmen whenever Cary and his lady step into their places for a spot of cakes and ale.

They met on a boat, these two. The boat was bound for Europe. They met and they parted. A year was to pass before they saw each other again.

At the time the two met, the movie magazines were carrying stories which showered premature blessings on "the coming marriage" of dark Cary to blonde Phyllis Brooks. By the time he returned to Hollywood, the Grant-Brooks romance had simmered down to the freezing point. Barbara Hutton, on the other hand, was in the throes of the great disillusionment which had come over her in the wake of the crash of her marriage to Count Kurt Haugwitz-Reventlow. The vibrations were just right. So were the two temperaments.

They met again the following March in New York, whither Cary had repaired for a vacation. As the poets say, they discovered each other. It was a wonderful discovery entailing nights on the town, nights perpetrated with that legendary good taste and quiet that is Cary's long suit.

They parted once more. Back in Hollywood, Cary's then room-mate, one Randolph Scott, noted with a chuckle of delight that once again a blonde lady's photograph was decorating the Grant quarters. Her name, of course, was Barbara Hutton.

Episode three took place last summer. It was very picturesque and spontaneous. Miss Hutton put into San Francisco with her son, Lance, en route for Honolulu. It was a brief visit and has nothing much to do with the story except that she was entertained by the Countess di Frasso with such élan that hardly had she arrived in Hawaii before she turned back and headed for California and the di Frasso hospitality. The delighted hostess, casting about for a nice eligible male escort, bethought herself of Cary Grant. She arranged for him to be on hand for the dinner party celebrating Miss Hutton's arrival in Los Angeles and saw to it that he put in his appearance for follow-up dinners. She noticed that the two were doing fine, and quit playing Cupid.

THE immediate outgrowth of this was that Barbara Hutton leased the Keaton house and decided to stay awhile. From this point on, you might say, love was in full bloom.

Cary's friends took to Barbara almost from the beginning. It took a little time to get by the shy Barbara to the gay and even hilarious Babs, but it was well worth the effort. Ever afterwards, Cary's friends were Barbara's friends, a condition which improves by the day. Closest of their chums are Reginald Gardiner, Ricardo Cortez, Mr. and Mrs. Johnny Maschio (she's Constance Moore), Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., Elsa Maxwell and, of course, the Countess di Frasso.

Babs Hutton is the person that probably charmed Cary Grant. The same painfully shy person to strangers, is a veritable pixie on the proper occasions. Gay, merry, and even waggish, she is a one-woman Mardi Gras. In this mood, she's in love with life and even more in love with dancing.

A typical occasion was last January 18, which happened to be the birthdays of Cary Grant and Connie Moore, a fete celebrated jointly by the parties concerned. Last year Johnny Maschio gave the party. This year Barbara Hutton tossed a . . . well . . . spectacle. There were twenty-four guests for dinner and after that the house was thrown open for dancing.

The first chorus had hardly begun before Babs was on the floor with Cary, gay and light-hearted. For something like one hundred and twenty choruses she kept it up, not with Cary, of course. She danced with any and all comers—conga, shag and rumba, along with the old stand-bys. It was six A. M. before she had gotten enough. At six, as you guessed, the party broke up.

People meeting her for the first time see Barbara Hutton as a frail-looking, retiring and uncommunicative girl. The frailness amounts to a mere 96 pounds. And she wants it that way. Once she weighed something like 140. A three-year diet brought her down to her present lissomeness, which she wouldn't trade for the controlling interest in General Motors. Her retiring disposition comes of an inability to take people in at a glance; born, as she was, with a warm, trusting nature that was too often abused. Her uncom-

the big bad Wolf says "Goody"

The Wolf met Little Red Riding Hood going to Grandma's with a basket of food and a package of Dentyne (that delicious chewy gum that helps keep teeth bright).

The Wolf could have gobbled up R. R. H. right then but he thought he could eat Grandma first. So when R. R. H. arrived, there was the Wolf pretending to be Grandma herself.

"Hello, Grandma!" said R.R.H., pretending she didn't recognize him. "How do you keep your teeth so bright and sparkling?"

"By eating raw meat!" snarled the Wolf.

"How old-fashioned! You should chew Dentyne. Its extra firmness helps your teeth keep healthy and lustrous white. And that spicy flavor—mm!" And she offered the Wolf some Dentyne.

"My! My! How delicious!" purred the Wolf. "From now on I exercise my teeth only on Dentyne!"

(Moral: Help your teeth keep bright and sparkling this pleasant way—chew Dentyne! You'll enjoy its smart flat package, too.)

municative nature is the result of conditioning; too many of her statements have been twisted to the purpose of the hearer. This, then, is Barbara Hutton.

Babs is the down-to-earth person who is always playing tricks on Cary, who takes them in his stride. This is the same Babs who loves to hike with Cary. And she does. Their favorite haunt is the Malibu mountains. A veritable antelope, she covers ground with lightning dispatch.

She's also fond of swimming. The locale, often, is Cary's beach house which is the focal point for Cary's friends. The blonde one swims well, dives better. Cary is just as apt to loll on the sands and toss a medicine ball at one of his pals, preferably one who can catch his hot tosses.

They play tennis together and they're about even. One day she'll trim him badly and the next time, after brushing up like mad for a solid week, he'll take her into camp.

For non-athletic diversion, the favorite pastime is record-making. Barbara pours out her heart in Hawaiian song for the benefit of the recording machine. Jimmy Stewart will do some incidental clowning. Connie Moore will team up with Cary for a duet. After they make a batch, Cary, Barbara and their guests will spend the afternoon running them off and shrieking with glee.

One of Barbara's cutest habits is word collecting. Every now and then she will come running up to Cary or maybe Reggie Gardiner and say: "I've got another word!"

Then with girlish glee, she'll pronounce it carefully, spell it, define it, and for good measure, tell how she came across the word. Naturally, anyone that enthusiastic about words can be counted upon to be a to-the-death foe of wrong pronunciation and bad grammar.

"The accent is on the second syllable, not the third," she's often telling Cary.

"All right, darling, all right," he comes back, mispronouncing it again on purpose.

During Cary's last trip to New York, he put in a call to Barbara.

"What are you doing, Cary?" she inquired, en passant.

"Oh, just laying around," he answered.

"Lying," said Barbara. "You ought to know better."

"Darling," expostulated Cary, "am I getting lessons in grammar at two dollars a minute, or am I calling up to find out how you're feeling?"

They seldom go night-clubbing. Ciro's would be nifty, but there's always a photographer lurking around with a camera that takes a picture in 1/2500th of a second, which is very fast, indeed.

In clothes, both lean toward the British school, which is to say, to the chic without splash. Cary goes for anything from tweeds to subdued plaids. Barbara's street clothes are conservative, although for evening wear she exhibits a glamour that is truly queenly. Her wardrobe, of course, runs into the hundreds of items. What is not from the closed European ateliers of Lanvin, Schiaparelli, Vionnet, and Alix is the handiwork of Bernie Newman of Hollywood, the I. Magnin designer. For daytime wear, she fancies suits, many of them tweeds. Evenings, she loves gold and silver lamé. The number she wore for the Grant-Moore birthday to-do was a masterpiece. It made her look like Snow White in white tulle that "went on for hours," with a row of brilliants across the bust. To boot, there was a rope of rubies and diamonds that gave out a choker-effect, and made her look like a Persian princess. Ordinarily, she is content with a pear-shaped diamond that may or may not be the gift of one Cary Grant.

Her present quarters contains something like twenty rooms, is staffed by a half dozen servants, all of whom love her, thanks to the democratic and considerate treatment she shows them. You couldn't bribe one of them with a Cord automobile.

Cary and Barbara have dinner alternately (more-or-less) at one another's places. They are gay affairs—with friends for the most part. Miss Hutton drinks seldom and little, an occasional glass of champagne representing her entire stint. Cary has no truck with champagne, likes scotch and soda, and drinks with typical English moderation and minimum after effects.

A peerless pixie under the right auspices, she is for all that, a devoted mother. Never was more love lavished on an offspring than is showered upon the tousled, blonde head of Master Lance, aged five. Bright as a 1942 penny, he's the darling not only of his mother but of Cary, himself. The two are always indulging in horseplay. He thinks Cary as an actor is "super-colossal," a word he picked up when Sam Goldwyn and he had a five-minute chat. He calls Cary, "Uncle." Cary has stopped blushing.

This, gentle readers, is the story. If Cary Grant turns around and marries Phyllis Brooks the day this history hits the stands, don't blame us. Cary is just perverse enough to do something like that.

unpleasant Bolshevik waving a butcher knife.

Well, that sort of thing has its impressions on a growing tot. And maybe that's why Sanders is firmly resolved to enjoy life at this latter day. One thing is certain. That Continental suavity, that absolutely icy poise and polish the fellow has today, stem right from a childhood crammed with passports, visas and foreign hotels. George has visited practically every country in and out of Europe. He can whip from Spanish, into French, into German, into Russian and back to a fairly thick Oxford accent without dropping an aitch. That's the reason he can play Nazis so easily. "I have a flair for accents," yawned George.

He was finally Anglicized, more or less, by exposure to schools in England, Dunhurst, Bedales, Brighton College and the Manchester Technical School where, incidentally, he acquired a mania for inventing gadgets which haunts him to this day.

His first job took him right to the ends of the earth—to Patagonia, of all places, to sell English cigarettes. Business was terrible, of course, and so was salesman Sanders. The toasted, roasted, cream-of-the-crop line didn't bother them a bit.

The tobacco company back in London soon got sick of George's empty order book and issued an ultimatum. "Either get rid of some cigarettes," they cabled, "or we'll do likewise with you." George turned to show business.

He hired a magician, a hootchy dancer and a couple of guitarists, bought a checked vest and started en tour. The natives were impressed. He sold a lot of cigarettes that way and, what counted more in the long run, George, doubling in brass, learned how to play the saxophone, the guitar and, when things got tough, to step to the footlights and warble out a song.

The company next ordered him into Chile to make the back country "gasper"-conscious. That's what threw George. They never had enough theatres for his show in the Chile sticks and sometimes not even roads. He got the old inventive bean working and figured out a cigarette blitz by airplane. He designed little parachutes to waft a pack of his brand down from heaven, wrapped in a dodger telling about their tasty, tangy goodness. Then he flew over backwoods Chile bailing them out like parachute troops over Holland. The Chileans smoked George's cigarettes, but they didn't care for his literature. "Eventually," sighed George, "I was fired."

That was about the time of Black Friday and the Wall Street flop that was heard 'round the world. When George dragged back to London there was plenty of nothing to do. Some of the things he was forced to do to keep body and soul on speaking terms were, Mr. Sanders told us, "practically unmentionable."

"I used to live in a foul boarding house," George reminisced, "with the most treacherous looking bunch of blokes. One used to stalk around the place wrapped in a sheet. He only had one suit. Another was a wrestler, who let his whiskers grow so he could gash up the other fellow. When you opened the door to this heaven the odor almost knocked you down. The landlord charged twenty shillings a week and for breakfast we got an egg on a fish—can you imagine that to greet the morn? Ghastly!"

Once when things got extra tough George put an ad in the agony column of the London Times. "Wanted—home," it said, "by talented young man of good character and education, pleasant disposition, etc., etc." That was his inventive gag mind going again, as it always does in pinches or just for pleasure. George figured there might still be philanthropists in the world. Well, he got a couple of hundred letters from other boarding houses extolling the merits of their bed and board and one from a nice lady who asked him to call. George did, expecting some ancient Christian soul. Instead there was a lovely girl with plenty of this and that to greet him. "I met a lot of nice people through her, too," recalled George.

SANDERS might still be knocking about London if it hadn't been for his uncle who was a musician. "Why don't you try singing?" asked the uncle. "Anybody who can talk can sing, if they just work a little at it." George took his advice for six months more of starvation. Then one night at a party he boomed out "The Road to Mandalay" in his new found baritone, and tickled the ears of a London stage producer who hustled him right into a revue called "Ballyhoo." He doubled in a piano act and was off to the races.

I don't mean it was all fish and chips right away. George kept on missing a meal now and then. But he got in some more revues and then on the stage with Edna Best and Dennis King and Noel Coward. That led to radio and television and pretty soon the British picture boom came and British Dominion signed him up to make movies. He did that for a list of pictures. He'd still be there but, "The studio burned down," snored George quietly. "Had to, by Jove, to get rid of me. They sold my contract in America—down the river, you know. Body belongs to Hollywood, but my soul to God!" George sighed and closed his grey eyes peacefully.

In Hollywood today, if you ask him what his real ambition is he'll say, "Good heavens—financial security, of course!" without handing out any stuff about artistic expression. On the face of things you might call George on the tight side with his money. He lives in a tiny apartment about as big as a dinette in unfashionable Hollywood. He drives a four-year-old Buick which he swears he's going to wear out to get his money's worth. He handles all his own financial affairs and trots to the bank each payday to sock it away personally. He doesn't lay any out across the plush picture colony bars at a dollar a snort. As for clothes, sack jackets and flannels are his speed, and he wears them down to the last thread.

A little while ago a local Hollywood charity guild planned a display of stars' clothing for a benefit. They sent out requests for duds not in use and the Hollywood luminaries put their fanciest rags on display for sweet charity. When George was asked for something for fans to gaze at he sent over some old underwear. There was Dietrich's latest Irene creation, Joan Crawford's dazzling furs, Shearer's swank chapeaux and—George Sanders' torn and tattered shorts!

They thanked him—er—just the same, and asked if they should return them or give them away. "Send them back!" yelped George. "There's lots of wear in those pants yet!"

About the only screen relief George has had from cads and bounders in almost five years has been the "Saint" series, although he did a nice sympathetic guy in "Rage in Heaven." He's up to his old tricks again being a Nazi in "Man Hunt" at Twentieth Century-Fox, a thriller diller about a chap who takes a pot shot at Hitler.

George says he'd just as soon keep on being a bad egg if it's all right with the customers. It's so much easier.

"You have to get up so blasted early to make pictures," he explained. "I'm always in a terrible temper. It's a bloody cinch to be nasty. I have to act to be nice. Acting's work."

What George Sanders considers definitely not work, he informed me, is tinkering. "I am simply nuts about making gadgets, gags and Rube Goldberg inventions," he sighed happily. "If I could sit at a desk all day surrounded by a gang of craftsmen sawing, pounding and screwing together my bright ideas, I'd be the happiest man on earth. My ambition in life is to invent some toy or gag that catches on like wildfire all over the land. Any picture I make is out of date in six weeks. But if I could only click with a gadget—then I'd feel practically immortal."

Well, George has been hard at it gadgeting all the time. He's working right now on a new, improved ski. In the past he's patented easy gadgets for this and that—the kind of freak things you read about every now and then—like wienies with zippers and things. "Definitely crackpot," admits George. George took time off, too, not long ago, and built himself a cabin cruiser with his own hands, down in Santa Monica Bay. He almost got to Catalina with it, but not quite. Then he sold it and put the profits in the bank.

Sometimes George, who can still bang a piano, sing and bleat at a saxophone, composes a bit. For instance, he composed the whistle melody that tags all of the "Saint" pictures, and that got him in a pretty hot spot, by the way.

The Los Angeles police put the bite on George recently to appear at a local theatre and give a talk on safe driving.

The minute he showed up on the stage, the crowd began yelling "Hello, 'Saint'—the whistle—the whistle!"

"And there I was," said George, "and I can't whistle!" They dub it in at RKO, but the crowd didn't know that. They were pretty disgusted when the big bruiser screwed up his face and hissed weakly like a small girl.

Most of the time, however, George Sanders doesn't stick his neck out like that. He is as cagey as a canary and comfort comes first—above career and even kinfolks. Not long ago George brought his family, now refugees, over from England. He has one sister in Berlin, married to a German. But the rest of his folks—his brother, father and mother—are on the other side of the fence. So George rented a big Beverly Hills mansion with swimming pool, palm trees, patios and hot and cold running Japs. It didn't work. George liked to snooze and his folks were up and about and a lot of other things. He has them in a house in Laguna now, and George moves around, like any other typical bachelor, from hideout to hideout. He doesn't own a stick of furniture; doesn't want an ounce of the worry possessions bring.

Once a while back, George joined up with the Westside Tennis Club, a fashionable movie court club. That didn't last long either. "The business of getting dressed and undressed, showering and all that — too much bother," explained George. "I like tennis, but I certainly won't play until I have everything within ten steps and a bed handy."

How he keeps his giant body in trim remains a mystery considering the Sanders constant state of coma. Maybe it's because food means nothing to him. He's a milk, bread and cheese boy, and he'll gnaw happily at an apple while the rest of the studio is loading up on a six-course lunch. For diversions George said he plays a fair rubber of bridge, lots of ponderous chess with a small circle of friends. He doesn't go too much for reading. One, because it's a lot of effort and, two, because he likes to think his own thoughts instead of cribbing them from somebody else.

As for the ladies—well, he likes them as much as they like George. Yes, indeed. Only you'll never hear much about George Sanders' romances. That makes it especially irritating to the mob of eager females who burn to think of George going to waste. They want to know why someone hasn't hooked him.

Well, I asked George how come, and he arched his eyebrows, like he does, into a perplexed peak and said, "To tell the truth, I've had some narrow escapes. But I guess the reason I'm single is because I like to have my cake and eat it too. I like my freedom. Yessir! Still," mused George Sanders, with a slightly twisted grin, "I'd probably be the easiest bachelor in the world to catch on something like Sadie Hawkins Day. I simply couldn't run very hard. I'm awfully lazy, you know."

So go to it, girls. But don't say that you weren't warned about him. I still say he's strictly unreliable.

You'll never forgive yourself if you miss the July MODERN SCREEN, 'cause we're giving you a peek into the closet of your pet teenster—you'll see her wardrobe from beanies to scanties!

diet to see if it contains sufficient nail-building essentials—calcium and minerals. Foods that are particularly rich in these and which you need for strong, beautiful nails are milk, citrus fruits, cheese and leafy green vegetables. Find out if you're drinking enough water, too, at least eight glasses a day, because nails react to systemic dryness just as complexions do. Try to protect your nails from small shocks and blows and careless manicuring for an injury to the base may affect the nail-manufacturing process going on in the matrix.

Taking care of your health and correcting your diet can improve the quality of your nails, but once you have grown good ones, what do you do to keep them that way? If you aren't already following a regular routine of nail care, begin today.

Get off to a right start by treating yourself to a thorough, careful manicure, using only oily preparations. Always use an oily polish remover and cuticle softener, then soak your nails in special oily nail lubricants before proceeding with your regular manicure. File and smooth brittle nails with an emery board, holding it at right angles with the nail and filing from the outside toward the center.

UNTIL your nails come back strong and healthy, don't yield to the temptation to shape them in long slender points. These are much more vulnerable to breaking than oval shapes which have strong bases to support them. Let your nails grow out at the corners, too, as this strengthens and gives them added support.

Buff brittle nails before applying polish. This has a two-fold advantage. It stimulates the circulation beneath the nail and promotes its growth, and it also polishes the nail surface, leaving a satiny smooth base to which nail protectors will adhere.

After your manicure, smooth on another coat of nail cream or oil and massage your hands well with a rich lotion or oily cream. Brittle nails and their companions, dry hands, devour as much lubricant as they can get and show their appreciation by looking better with every application.

One weekly manicure—no matter how well done—isn't sufficient to restore brittle nails to pliancy and strength, so here's a day-by-day routine to follow. And it can't be pursued willy-nilly if you want results.

After you've washed your hands and smoothed on an oily lotion or cream, apply a special nail lubricant around the bases, allowing it to remain on long enough to be absorbed.

Go over brittle nails daily with an emery board to remove all rough edges. They're regular dust catchers and split nails always invite more accidents, too.

Every night before you retire, buff each nail at least ten times, then lubricate the tips with a rich cream or oil. As frequently as possible—at least once or twice a week—give them a hot oil treatment, soaking them for five or ten minutes in oil that's comfortably warm.

You'll add to nail flexibility and to the softness of your hands, too, if you will leave the excess oil on over night. Slip your hands into cotton gloves like those Dorothy Lamour is wearing on page 55. These gloves are inexpensive and really great little sheet-savers as well as wonderful oil keeper-oners for your hands.

If you are as faithful to this routine as you are to the regular cleansing and care of your face, it won't be long before your nails begin to take on new life and strength. Don't be discouraged, however, if wonders aren't accomplished overnight—and don't abandon this treatment at the first signs of improvement, either. The care you are giving them now is beautifying your present nail-surfaces, but there is new nail growth to come and that takes four or five months to mature from matrix out to the tip.

You can pursue your everyday activities, of course, but do use discretion. Don't expect your nails to have the strength of mechanical devices that are made to remove thumb tacks from walls, to scratch paint off doors or to open tightly sealed packages. Don't laugh. We've seen pretty intelligent girls try just such stunts with their nails. But don't you do it. Treat your nails with respect and keep them well lubricated, and before you can say onychocryptosis*, your nails will do you proud.

With mesh gloves and short sleeves in the offing, your hands are in for particular scrutiny this summer. But they'll be lovely to look at if you keep them soft and smooth with Chamberlain's Lotion. It's a marvelous summer beautifier for both hands and arms, and a grand protection against dryness, heat and wind when you go motoring. It spreads quickly and easily and leaves your skin satiny smooth, and it isn't at all sticky. Many women like to use Chamberlain's Lotion as a powder base, too. Why don't you try a bottle today? You'll find it in a handy 10-cent size at your local variety store. Also in 25-cent, 50-cent and $1.00 sizes.

We hope you're not one of the girls who risk infection and ruin the beauty of their nails by forever hacking at their cuticles with scissors. Rough cuticle is unsightly, we'll admit, but it's pretty "old hat" and absolutely unnecessary to cut it. There's an excellent product on the market, called Trimal, that softens this dead tissue so that it can be easily removed without cutting. All you have to do is to saturate a cotton-swathed orange stick with Trimal and work it around the bases of your nails. Then soak your fingers in warm water for a few seconds—and, presto, the dead cuticle can be wiped away without further ado, leaving your nails smooth, well-groomed and healthy.

Here's a new summer thrill for girls who are fastidious about the appearance of their fingertips. Lady Esther 7-Day Cream Nail Polish, a new improved lacquer, has been introduced in twelve delectable shades besides transparent, all packaged in newly designed hard-to-tip bottles. The colors run the entire gamut of becoming nail-polish tones, ranging from the palest flesh tint to clear red, slightly brown red to deeper shades with undertones of blue. There's a shade to harmonize with every popular summer color and several that will blend beautifully with your own skin tones. They're only 10 cents apiece, so you won't feel extravagant if you buy several to be up-to-the-minute in finger-tip beauty whenever you change your outfit. The polish has a grand lustrous finish and, if properly applied, will last for days.

Cracking, peeling nails are a social error you ought to avoid. If your polish chips off easily, let Mani-Prep do the job will delight you also. It renders a two-way service:

1. It produces maximum lip loveliness because it has all the fine qualities of any good lipstick.
2. It gives additional assurance of daintiness by neutralizing unpleasant breath, also breath odors from cocktails, cigarettes, highly seasoned foods, etc.

Only Priscilla Parker Breath Correcting Lipstick contains special, effective, yet harmless ingredients which neutralize offensive breath odors as you naturally moisten your lips.

of putting your nails in condition. It's a scientific preparation that checks the cause of peeling and chipping and produces a clear, clean nail surface over which polish may be applied evenly and smoothly. Rub each nail with cotton soaked with Mani-Prep, then wipe dry, and apply your usual nail lacquer. You'll be terribly surprised at how much longer it will last.

Do your hands play a game of hit and miss whenever you begin to apply nail polish? If they do, you'll find the LeSager Finger Rest a source of never-ending joy and comfort, for it holds one hand steady while the other applies the lacquer with sure, deft strokes. And what an improvement there is in the finished job! The finger rest is a neat little gadget made of light-weight metal, with four roomy, long grooves for fingers to repose in comfortably. Its light frame base is as firm as the Rock of Gibraltar, so you don't have the worry of keeping the finger-steadier steady. You can buy this device for a trifle at your local syndicate store.

If your busy hands are rough and dry with little lines showing up like the divisions in a patchwork quilt, they need a rich softening cream that will supply to your skin the natural oil it lacks. Helen Ayars Hand Cream is a smooth spreading cream that contains lanolin, a particularly good skin softener. It's light in texture and smooths into the hands without leaving an aftermath of stickiness. You'll notice the improvement in your hands after the first two or three applications, and we know you'll like its light, dainty fragrance. You can buy it at your neighborhood variety store.

ISN'T HOLLYWOOD WONDERFUL!

Frankly, the workings of studio publicity departments fascinate and bewilder us. We've been racking our brain and scratching our scalp in utter puzzlement, and we can't for the life of us figure out how a major outfit conceived that story about Lucia Carroll's ancestry. When the studio put Lucia under contract, they openly admitted her real surtag was LaCerte. Shortly after, with much fanfare and horn-blowing, they changed the LaCerte to Carroll. And then with astonishing aplomb and glibness, they released the tale that their lovely starlet was the sole-surviving descendant of a great American statesman named Mr. Something-or-other Carroll!

MISS INGRID BERGMAN

Spencer Tracy isn't the gush and goo type, but just mention Ingrid Bergman, and Spence does everything but break into handsprings. He thinks Ingrid is so far out in front, she'll become the greatest celluloid star the world will ever see. About "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," their current co-starrer, Spence says: "When you see Bergman on the screen, you won't even know Jekyll and Hyde are in the picture!" To prove he's not kidding, Spence has asked Ingrid to do a Broadway play with him in the fall. However, now that her husband is here in Hollywood, it isn't likely that Ingrid will voluntarily take off for New York and the rigors of the stage. The best indication of her sentiments is contained in a little story they're telling of her recent meeting with David Selznick. As they shook hands, Selznick noticed that Ingrid's were rough and red. "Have you been doing housework again?" he scolded. Ingrid grinned. "Yes," she admitted. "Before I go to the studio in the morning, I cook breakfast for Peter and the baby, and then I wash up. And when I come home, I get their dinner and wash up again. You see, that's my real job. Acting is just my sideline."

(*Underarm Perspiration Odor)

This amazing test was one of a series, supervised by registered nurses, to prove the remarkable efficacy of Yodora—a Deodorant Cream that's actually soft, delicate and pleasing!

1. In the morning, Miss A.D. applied Yodora to underarms.
2. Played 2 sets of tennis—at 91° in the shade!
3. Examining nurse pronounced underarms sweet—not a taint of P.O.—Perspiration Odor!

Yodora gives positive protection! Leaves no sickly smell on dresses. Actually soothing. 10¢, 25¢, 60¢.

is urgently instructed to kill the talk by growing a moustache (known in movie slanguage as a "Ronnie Colman"). Incidentally, Westmore explained, and we also hasten to add, that Movietown men earn their living by featuring their good looks. Their make-up tricks and quirks are just part of the business and very seldom, says Perc, do they spring from personal vanity.

DO YOU CALL THAT GLAMOUR?

The most unexpected sight of the month was Gary Cooper and Marlene Dietrich hunched over lunch in the Warner Bros. commissary the other afternoon. The pair was deep in conversation when we walked into the room and were still talking like mad when we got up to leave. Curious to know what common interest was absorbing the two, we sidled past their table on our way to the door. And we're sorry we did, because our news-hungry nose got a mean jolt. Both Gary and Marlene were gabbing a mile a minute about "my Maria." And only then did we realize that mama Dietrich and papa Cooper were discussing nothing more unusual than their respective children—both of whom happen to have the same name. "Does my daughter go out with boys?" we could hear Marlene exclaiming as we closed the door behind us. "Certainly not! And she won't for two more years! In Europe, we don't let girls of sixteen have dates!"

HALLOWED GROUND

We doff our lid to Universal Studios for the maddest scheme of the month. The other day a corps of stars and lesser employees marched en masse to a newly-erected building on the lot. Upon arriving at their destination, they cheered and shouted wildly. Then suddenly a reverent hush fell over the crowd. Miss Marlene Dietrich had stepped to the fore. With a pair of shiny scissors clutched in her hand, Miss Dietrich walked confidently up to the building. Deftly she snipped the red ribbon strung across its doorway—and Universal had officially dedicated its new "powder room" for men!

GINGER AND SPICE

Hollywood citizens got the shock of their lives when they picked up their newspapers the other morning. Right smack in the middle of the movie advertising section was a photograph of Ginger Rogers surrounded by such hair-raising expressions as: Ginger Rogers In Her Greatest Sex Sensation, Her First Night Of Love, Daring Sex Facts Revealed, See What Can Never Be Told, The Truth About Sex Frankly And Fearlessly Told, and so on! A second glance revealed the whole thing to be nothing more than a reissue of Ginger's film "Primrose Path," which happened to be appearing on the same bill with a film called "Married Love" and a "dynamic sex authority" called Mrs. Jardine McCree. We're happy to say that the ad did not appear a second day. Deemed so unethical and so brutally unfair to Ginger, it was yanked from the paper immediately, and the picture exhibitor's contract cancelled in a flash.

MATRON IN KINDERGARTEN

Charlie Chaplin is the only man in town who can sympathize with French actor Marcel Dalio. Dalio, who is forty-ish and a star in his native land, is the husband of Madeleine Lebeau, willowy Paramount importation now appearing in "Hold Back the Dawn." Madeleine is only 17 and, under California law, still of school age. So whenever Dalio comes down to the set to see her, he has the unique experience of watching his wife rush from a dramatic scene with Charles Boyer to an off-stage schoolroom where, with a half-dozen other kids, she buries her nose in history and geography books. Chaplin, of course, was in the same position when he was wed to Lita Grey. The only thing that makes the Lebeau case a bit more unusual is this—Madeleine has been Mrs. Dalio for two years!

OFF THE COB

Gags of the month from Hollywood's funny-bone specialists:—Bob Hope (upon being told that Shirley Temple was contracted by M-G-M): "Poor kid, she was working so hard at 20th Century-Fox, she began to get bags under her savings account" . . . Jack Benny: "So Mary says I'm a liar. Well, many true words have been spoken by false teeth!" . . . Hugh Herbert: "Sure I feel fine. I'm as happy as the girl who dreamed she went to Hollywood and lived in a house with seven Gables." . . . Gracie Allen: "Everyone thinks my nephews are twins. They're alike in so many disrespects." . . . Mischa Auer (discussing Deanna Durbin's marriage): "What do I think of weddings? A wedding is a funeral where you smell your own flowers!"

MUSICAL COMEDY

You all know her name. She's a top musical star at a top studio. Her golden songs have made her beloved wherever pictures are shown. The magic of her melody has won her fame and fortune. What few people have known, however, is that ever since she came to Hollywood her entire career has been in the hands of one man—the studio's musical sound editor. It's been this unsung hero who has bent his ear over his playback machine and listened carefully as the songstress made a dozen or more recordings of each of her numbers. And it has been he who took the best phrases from each, patiently patched them together and made it possible for the world to hear perfect renditions of every tune she warbled. Without him she would have been mediocre. With him she was a great artist. Now, alas, the gay deception is ended. The star is in tears. The studio is frantic. The reason? Last week the draft board came and got the soundman—making it the first time in history a voice has been put in khaki!

BIOGRAPHY OF A CHAMPION

Some day, in the not too distant future, one of the biggest stars in Hollywood is going to be a little girl called Kathryn Grayson. When that day dawns the entire movie-going public will be chattering about the lovely lass who just a few months ago was known as plain Zelma Hedrick. As preparation for that time, Modern Screen has gathered its readers some useful conversational fodder. So—here goes: (a) Kathryn is a Southerner. Her home town is Winston-Salem where she was born 19 years ago. (b) Her father is a building contractor. (c) There are four more young Hedricks—three boys and a girl, all of whom are picture-minded. (d) Metro signed Kathryn a year and a half ago. They paid her salary regularly and kept her busy with dental appointments and music lessons. (e) She's a brilliant lyric soprano, taking daily lessons in grand opera, light opera, harmony and scales. (f) She studies dancing in her spare time. (g) Every morning she hops out of bed at 6 A. M. and goes down to the studio where she is soundly pounded by

BLACKOUT

George Brent is a happier man today than he's been since he first came to Hollywood. Not only because his romance with A. Sheridan is going along as smoothly as Annie's skin, but because, for the first time in his celluloid career, George has been permitted to be himself. It seems George's hair began to grey when he was just a kid of fifteen. Movie producers, showing a surprising ignorance of womenkind, felt his silver locks wouldn't go over with the matinée trade and doomed him to a lifetime of casting the dye. George suffered through ten years of black-up jobs, but, at long last, in "The Great Lie" he blossoms out as the real Brent. He says he feels like a man released from bondage—and we say he looks so oomphie, probably everyone from Mick Rooney up will try following his silvery trail.

DUTCH TREAT

When Joan Crawford pleads for something, it's got to be good. And plead is exactly what Joan did when she got it into her noggin that she wanted Philip Dorn in her latest drah-ma "A Woman's Face." The front office gave Joan a snappy turndown on her request, because they had other plans for the Dutch delight. But that should give you some idea of how Dorn stacks up in this town. The glamour gals think he's a simply terrific performer. And his accent! Wow! Funny thing about that accent. Dorn was so eager to lose it when he came to America, he saw 203 movies in 7 weeks, just to perfect his English diction! Though he is himself a great star in Holland, Dorn says the three foremost favorites of his countrymen are Bette Davis, Gary Cooper and Spencer Tracy.

OUT OF THE NIGHT

It happened at a British War Relief party. Master of Ceremonies Herbert Marshall was auctioning off a woolen sweater which formerly belonged to the King of England. "I bid six," came a voice from the side of the room. "I raise it to seven," shrilled an individual sitting down in front. Gene Lockhart jumped to his feet. "And I say eight," he boomed. Mrs. Lockhart tugged at her husband's coat-tails. "Gene," she whispered. "He means hundreds, not dollars!" "Oh!" said the horrified Mr. Lockhart, sinking back into his seat. "Nine," called the man down in front, and the auction went on as before.

BONING UP ON BURNS

Being out of pictures doesn't mean being out of the picture where Bob Burns is concerned. The Palooka with the Bazooka plans to return to the screen in serious roles before long. Meanwhile, here are a few lines to keep fans up on their Burns-isms: (1) Bob keeps an incubator full of chicks in his bathroom. That's the warmest place in the house for them. (2) He and his wife pedal a bicycle 9 miles into the mountains every single day, then turn around and pedal right back again. (3) He never swims in his beautiful pool, but uses it as a proving ground for all his wacky water inventions.

Ruin YOUR VACATION

You can have a better time with young-looking hair. So, if you have gray hair, just wet it with Canute Water. A few applications will completely re-color it, similar to its former natural shade . . . in one day, if you wish. After that, attention only once a month will keep it young-looking.

Your hair will retain its naturally soft texture and lovely new color even after shampooing, salt-water bathing, perspiration, curling or waving. It remains clean and natural to the touch and looks natural in any light.

SAFE! Skin Test NOT Needed

Canute Water is pure, colorless and crystal-clear. It has a remarkable record of 25 years without injury to a single person. In fact, scientific research at one of America's greatest Universities proved Canute Water to be perfectly harmless.

Easy to Use — Experience NOT Necessary

Try it and you will soon understand why leading dealers in most of America's largest Cities sell more Canute Water than all other hair coloring preparations combined.

Lucky you if you've a May birthday! According to the stars, it's the month to be born in if you want to have any fun. You get a kick out of everything—a bar of jive à la Shaw, a painting by Rembrandt, a rip-roaring Western.

There's a wide streak of Scotch in you; you hoard everything . . . twine, paper, months-old magazines. You also have quite a wide streak of Winchell. Simply crave gossip—it's your one and only vice. You're always in love, though not necessarily with the same person. However, once you've found The One, it's likely to be a till-death-do-us-part proposition.

You adore singing, talking, eating, gardening, reading—everything! You're such a jolly one, you really don't need anyone's good wishes—but, somehow or other, you get them anyway.

"A LOVELY SMILE IS YOUR MOST IMPORTANT BEAUTY ASSET!"

say well-known beauty editors of 23 out of 24 leading magazines

In a recent poll made among the beauty editors of 24 leading magazines all but one of these beauty experts agreed that a lovely smile is a woman's most precious asset. They went on to say that "Even a plain girl has charm and personality if she keeps her smile bright, attractive and sparkling."

Smiles gain sparkle when gums are firm and healthy. Help to keep your gums firmer with daily Ipana and Massage.

YOU CAN HAVE dates and dances—admiration and romance. Charm counts as much as beauty. Even the plainest girl has an appealing charm if she keeps her smile at its sparkling best.

Make your smile the real, attractive YOU. But remember, bright teeth and sparkling smiles depend largely upon healthy gums. So help keep your gums firm and your smile more attractive with the aid of Ipana and massage.

If you ever see "pink" on your tooth brush—see your dentist immediately. He may say your gums are only lazy—that they need the work denied them by today's soft and creamy foods. And like many dentists, he may suggest "the healthful stimulation of Ipana and massage."

For Ipana Tooth Paste not only cleans your teeth but, with massage, is specially designed to help your gums. Massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums every time you clean your teeth.

That special invigorating "tang" means circulation is quickening in the gum tissue—helping gums to new firmness. Make your smile your most important beauty asset with the help of Ipana and massage. Get a tube of Ipana today.

The greatest star of the screen!

Folks, take a friendly tip. Keep your hands out of your pockets and your proboscis clean. Billy the Kid is dustin' into town!

His real name? William Bonney. He's quick on the draw. Shoots with his left hand. Can hit a wart on a lizard. Asks questions later. He's Wanted for Murder!

★ ★ ★ ★

Garbed in black—to match "Hassie", his horse—Billy the Kid will lift you out of your seats with his ways and means. He's a one-man prosecutor and a one-man court. He's a menace. And handsome as Bob Taylor.

★ ★ ★ ★

M-G-M's "Billy the Kid" is a "Western" true enough. But you gotta use those words "saga" and "epic". Real galloping tintypes and buckets of blood.

★ ★ ★ ★

Never was Technicolor so magnificent. The sunlit freedom of the open plains, the glory of the canyons, the steel blue of the revolver, the jet black in horse and rider, the peachbloom of the fair damsel. Folks, tonight's the night!

★ ★ ★ ★

You can have your "Easterns" with their villainous demitasses, your "Northerns" with their relentless man-getters, your "Southerns" with their crinoline coyness—

★ ★ ★ ★

But give us a "Western" like "Billy the Kid" any time. And now's as good a time as any other.

★ ★ ★ ★

Somehow we can't help sending along a fan note to Robert Taylor for his splendid performance. Bob, you're a really great star and this he-man role fits you the way you fit that horse. Which is better than a glove.

★ ★ ★ ★

No time for elaboration, but would just like to toss a sprig to author Gene Fowler for the way he does it.

★ ★ ★ ★

It's another big hit from

BY WOLFE KAUFMAN

CITIZEN KANE . . . . . ★★★★

This is the most talked-about film of recent years. You may agree with the raves that it has been getting prior to release, or you may disagree. In either case, it is a film which will arouse your violent interest.

To this reviewer's mind, "Citizen Kane" is powerful drama and an engrossing human document. In two hours it tells, with infinite detail, the life of a man, from the age of 25 to the age of 80. But it is not episodic, and it is not jerky. And it is not overlong. It seems just about right, and it flows smoothly. That is what makes it an important movie—the way it is done.

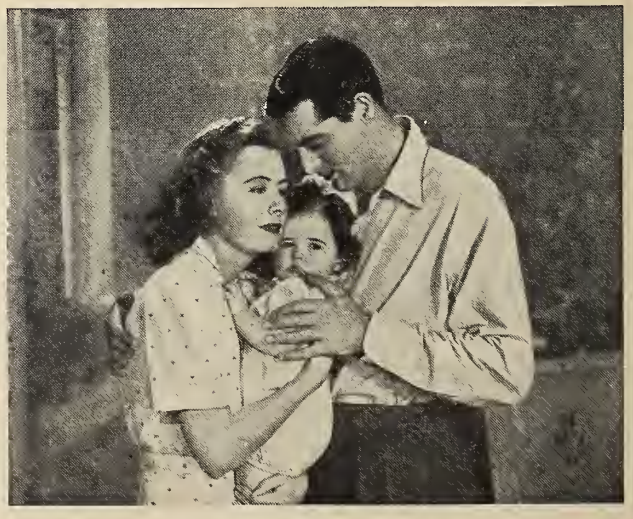
The acting of Orson Welles in the difficult leading role is unbelievably good; it is not an actor you are seeing on the screen, but a living, breathing, full-bodied human being. Welles' direction is not far behind; it is masterful and in full control. It seems incredible that this could possibly have been Welles' first movie directing job, because his hand is so sure and deft. And his third task, as writer of the script, is equally impressive, although here he had the cooperation of an experienced screen writer, Herman Mankiewicz.

Another very important item—perhaps the most important—is the technical excellence of the film. As a matter of fact, it seemed as though there was too much attention to the technical end. Bernard Hermann's musical background and Gregg Toland's photography are exceptionally good—but do not blend into the whole the way the writing, acting and directing do.

There are quite a number of astonishingly keen characterizations by the little-known players in the company. Especially outstanding are Joseph Cotten, Dorothy Comingore and Everett Sloane.—RKO-Radio.

Most of the supporting players in Orson Welles' one-man show, "Citizen Kane," are actors and actresses totally unknown to the screen. With him above are Joseph Cotten and Erskine Fanford.

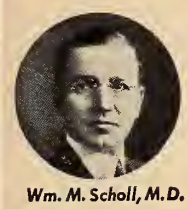
PENNY SERENADE . . . . . ★★★½



Get ready for a surprise when you see this picture. Cary Grant and Irene Dunne in "Penny Serenade" sounds very much like what it isn't. Because it is, actually, a simple, dramatic affair with heart-tug. In fact those of you gals who enjoy a good cry once in a while had better take your hankies along. The men may sneer at the "mush," but they'll enjoy it, nevertheless.

It is a new variation for Cary Grant, especially; not even for a moment is he his usual sophisticated, debonair self. The change should be good for him because it gives him a chance at some real and honest emotional acting. Irene, of course, is always in full control of herself, a seasoned trouper in the sentimental school.

It is a simple story, dealing with the domestic life of a young couple who adopt a baby. It tells of the fundamental concerns of rearing the child, and the homespun theme is handled with delicacy and rare good humor. The film has astonishingly keen understanding and moves with a fine marriage of mood and timing. You believe it all, every second of the way, and become part and parcel of the lovable family.



Aside from the two stars, there is an excellently selected and intelligently directed supporting cast, headed by Edgar Buchanan, Beulah Bondi and Ann Doran. Ann is a nine-year-old youngster who here joins the parade of the talented younger generation in Hollywood with a good deal of hope and promise for the future.

There are a few sentimental scenes that are overdone, but director George Stevens keeps things moving smoothly most of the time.—Columbia. (Continued on page 10)

In "Penny Serenade," Cary Grant drops his sleek sophistication and turns homebody. He and Irene Dunne play foster parents to one-year-old Baby Biffle, who has an identical twin!

★★★½ The Great American Broadcast

There are various ways of looking at these things, of course. Some people believe that every new movie which comes along ought to have a new story. Darryl Zanuck, on the other hand, believes that once he uses a good story and it turns out successfully, why should he bother thinking up a new one? And if this movie is any criterion—our reply is, why indeed? Go right on dishing it out, Mr. Z; change the characters a little here and there, give us new tunes, change the background. And we'll be right there cheering.

By which time you must have gathered that "The Great American Broadcast" is on the okay side. It's light, frothy and full of fun. Jack Oakie and Johnny Payne are the two lads who are life-long buddies this time (same set-up as "Tin Pan Alley"), and Johnny takes Alice Faye (same girl as in "T.P.A.") away from Jack. But the radio business (it was music business in "T.P.A.") booms up and up (yeah!) and the movie characters with it. For purposes of plot variation, Cesar Romero horns in and tries to take Alice away from both Jack and John, but he hasn't a chance.

The radio business, of course, is an exciting hunk of recent history, and this picture makes the most of it—whether any of it is true historically or not. There's a grand piece of editing which permits the inclusion of newsreel footage of the original Dempsey-Willard fight in Toledo, and it's so well done that you may think it was staged for this picture.

There are a half dozen okay songs, most of them with the same remember-when flavor which has proved so successful in films of this type. Alice does most of the singing; Johnny, surprisingly enough, does a good deal of it with her, and Jack clowns through several amusing lyrics. All three are in top form. Romero is a bit too heavy in his assignment, which isn't entirely his fault; the role is none too well thought out or written.

As usual in these pictures there are a number of highly entertaining vaudeville specialties, the best among them being, again, the Nicholas Brothers. This young colored duo has caught on astonishingly; they always get (deservedly) a big hand. The Four Ink Spots are plenty good, and the Three Wiere Brothers are amusing. Directed by Archie Mayo.—Twentieth Century-Fox.

★★★½ Ziegfeld Girl

Girls, girls, girls. You wouldn't think that just girls are enough for a movie—but then these are not just girls, they are the most delectable, the most luscious, the most eye-filling, the most—oh, dear.

It is difficult to find the correct descriptive adjectives for this movie, largely because it is so different from anything that has gone before. It is a lavish spectacle, full of big numbers, beautiful clothes, exquisite girls and lilting tunes. Also, there is a story that fits all this mass of material. As a matter of literal truth, there are, actually, three stories, but they all blend pretty well.

What the movie attempts to do is tell you what it means to be a member of a Ziegfeld show. For this purpose, there are many lovelies to look at, and the camera focuses with especial interest on three of them—Lana Turner, Judy Garland and Hedy Lamarr. Lana used to be an elevator operator in Brooklyn and was in love with Jimmy Stewart, a truck driver, until she got a chance to be "glorified" in the Follies. Then Ian Hunter, a stage door Johnny, helps to turn her head; and all of her life, as well as that of everyone in her circle, falls to pieces tragically.

Judy Garland's yarn is a happy, though emotional, one. She is the daughter of an ex-vaudevillian who gets her break and employs it wisely. While Hedy is the devoted and straightforward wife of Philip Dorn, a penniless violinist. Hedy, unlike Lana, never permits her love and loyalty to falter despite the attempts of Tony Martin to crash her affections.

Lana Turner is better at her role than she has ever been; it is an incredibly true performance. Jimmy Stewart's part was evidently fashioned directly for him; it is a typical Stewart role. Ian Hunter is first-rate, as usual. Judy Garland scores solidly in a role which, too, was written for her and fits her like a glove. Charlie Winninger couldn't be better as Judy's father. Hedy Lamarr has less to do dramatically than the others but more than justifies her presence in the picture by just parading some magnificent costumes on that chassis of hers. Philip Dorn has authority in his brief role. Tony Martin hasn't much acting to do, which is just as well, but sings a couple of songs very neatly.

And in case you don't think that's enough top talent, there are some A-1 performances in supporting roles by more name players such as Jackie Cooper, Fay Holden, Edward Everett Horton, Jack Kelly, Eve Arden and Mae Busch. And none of them are lost in the shuffle; they all get something to do in the seemingly unceasing parade.

The score is good, the best song being "You Stepped Out Of A Dream," which will probably be a hit. This reporter never did care for Busby Berkeley's ginger-bread specialty numbers, but if you like them, they are there; and if you don't, they won't bother you too much. And certainly there is a bow due to Adrian for imaginative and colorful costuming. Directed by Robert Z. Leonard. —Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

A better title for this honey of a movie would have been "Revenge in Hollywood." It may not be fair to hold up the review of the picture in order to gossip; but the two are really related, so listen to this one. "Kiss the Boys Goodbye" was originally a Broadway play kidding the pants off the movie industry. It seemed surprising when Paramount bought the rights to turn it into a movie. However, this is what the studio did: it changed the locale to Broadway and turned the same story into a satire on show business, rather than on movie business.

Well, now to get on with the criticism. Mary Martin is the star and runs away with the picture, easily. Yes, sure, Don Ameche gets top billing, but this is Mary's picture, nevertheless. There's a darb of a cast in support, by the way, including Oscar Levant, Virginia Dale and Barbara Jo Allen.

The story, in case you've forgotten, has to do with a talent hunt for a "typical Southern actress." Now we all know that Hollywood goes on such talent hunts quite regularly, and Broadway producers never do—and the more credit to Hollywood, it seems to us. But here the movies are making believe that a Broadway director named Don Ameche is touring the countryside hunting a songstress. But he doesn't really want to find one. He really wants to give the part to the gal he loves, Barbara Jo Allen, an established Broadway personality. Mary Martin scotches his plans. She's a Broadway showgirl who can't get a job on Broadway (remember that crack about prophets in their own backyards?), so she goes south, makes believe she's an amateur and snares both Ameche and the job.

It's fun. Somewhat strained at times, but fun. And Mary Martin really makes the role stand out. Ameche is only so-so in the male lead. It's hard to believe him as just a plain old-fashioned leading man who gets the girl. Oscar Levant, the sourpuss with the glib tongue on the Information Please radio program, wangles a lot of good, easy-going laugh lines, and Virginia Dale continues to climb nicely. With the right roles, this gal can develop into star material. Or have we already said so? Barbara Jo Allen, who is Vera Vague in radio, is badly miscast as the other woman; it's too heavy a role for her, and she's too good-looking a gal to take it.

There are half a dozen light and amusing songs, but none of them are especially outstanding. Directed by Victor Schertzinger.—Paramount.

★★★½ The Great Lie

The women folk ought to like this picture very much. It is strictly a dame's picture, as we he-men say, loudly beating our hairy chests and sneaking a quick peek when no one is watching us. Bette Davis is in her element in the top role, a well-conceived, thoroughly worked-out character portrayal. And Mary Astor matches her performance every inch of the way in an amazingly adult part.

What this film really amounts to, come to think of it, is a triumph of acting and directing over material. The basic premise is old-fashioned, mushy and highly improbable. Theatrical, perhaps, is the word for it. But it is all done so well that you can't help being intrigued.

George Brent has a few fleeting moments as the illegally wed husband of Mary Astor, a concert pianist. That washes out, and he marries Bette Davis. Then he goes off to the jungle and is lost for a year or so, while Mary gives birth to his child. The two women make a bargain. Bette agrees to secretly assume motherhood of the child. Brent comes back and accepts this—but now Mary breaks down. She wants the child and she wants George. She decides to try for both. You'll have to see the picture to find out what the finish is; it is not sloppy, and it is essentially an honest answer to a dishonest basic situation.

It is hard to conceive of any two women in the world playing this picture except Davis and Astor. They are a perfect match. It is impossible to say which is better or which grabs the major honors, and it is to Bette's eternal credit that she permitted herself to be cast this way in a picture, sharing the limelight inevitably with a lesser known personality. Henceforth, Mary Astor is indeed a star.

★★★½ Flame of New Orleans

For many years now we have been hearing terrific things about a French director named Rene Clair. This is the first movie made by Clair in the United States. That fact, plus Marlene Dietrich in the starring role, makes it tremendously important. And the good news is that the picture is distinctly on the credit side of the ledger—a grand piece of romantic entertainment for the girls; replete with amusing satirical commentary to make the men chuckle.

Marlene has never been as beautiful nor worn such gorgeous gowns. The story is eminently well suited to her, and Rene Clair, with his astonishingly keen handling of camera effects, has added new stature to her career as a dramatic actress. No matter what you thought of Marlene in the past you'll have to admit she's breath-taking here.

A New Orleans setting of about 100 years ago makes it possible for Clair to establish the same kind of atmospheric background he would have had if his story were laid in his native France. Marlene, it seems, has just arrived in New Orleans and has an unsavory past. She goes on the make for Roland Young, a very rich banker, and doggone near lands him. Stopping the wedding midceremony is the arrival of true love by way of sailor Bruce Cabot. All he has to do is look at Marlene, and all her play acting is over and done with.

It is interesting to note that this kind of romantic persiflage manages to get over without making anyone unhappy. If you are the sort of person who wants to believe that kind of story, there it is. If not, you will find that the film might just as well be a satire of the very kind of story it seems to be.

There are some delicious humorous incidents, some of which will have you chuckling for days afterwards. At times the picture moves slowly, but there's not one spot that really will bother you.

Besides Marlene the cast includes a new and surprising performance by Bruce Cabot. He's been a sort of heavy in the past but now emerges as an exciting male romantic lead. He reminds you a bit of Gable and more of the elder Fairbanks in his prime. Roland Young is topnotch, of course, and there is a very strong cast of support players including Laura Hope Crews, Melville Cooper, Frank Jenks, Andy Devine and Mischa Auer. And we mustn't forget an outstanding bit of acting by Theresa Harris, a colored gal with loads of oomph.

No picture in a very long time has made such an open bid for sentimental reactions nor such an unabashed demand for weeps as "Men of Boys Town." Not any part of it is basically real, but nevertheless, the picture is sock entertainment. You'll cry your head off, and maybe you'll be annoyed with yourself for so doing.

It is a sequel, of course, to "Boys Town" and has the same extra-strong stellar combo up in front, Mickey Rooney and Spencer Tracy. Plus the same director, Norman Taurog, who has no peer in the movie business when it comes to handling kids or stories about them.

The story is entirely too pat and easy. There are many coincidences, particularly notable being the one that sends

Aside from Tracy and Rooney, both of whom are A-1, as usual, there are a number of outstanding performances. Larry Nunn is very good indeed as the young, embittered crippled kid. Darryl Hickman will astonish you as the seven-year-old desperado. Bobs Watson, as Pee Wee, repeats from the first "Boys Town." ★★★ Pot O' Gold

This picture is probably more important because James Roosevelt produced it than for any other reason. It is the first production made by the President's son, and it's okay as first productions go. Jimmy (as all of us Hollywoodies are now very carefully calling him) shows here that he has a good showmanship nose and a feel for entertainment; he should click in the movie business, after he gets going.

"Pot O' Gold" is a lively, tuneful film-musical with Jimmy Stewart and Paulette Goddard heading a better-than-average cast. The story is one of those hashed-together affairs showing very little originality or depth, but it offers plenty of opportunity for the troupers involved.

Stewart is typed again in a fat role as the ingratiating, pleasant youngster who likes to play a harmonica and loaf through life. His uncle, Charles Winninger, is a tight-fisted, rough, tough old rascal who is constantly battling anybody and everybody. This is the best break Winninger has had in a long time. He gets away from his usual pigeonhole and he's swell. Winninger is carrying on a feud with Mary Gordon, a boarding-house keeper, and her boarders—the boys in Horace Heidt's band—help her side of the battle by playing all night long and keeping Winninger in the next house from sleep. Paulette is the daughter of the boarding-house keeper who battles with Jimmy until they both realize that they're in love. Then they invent the "Pot O' Gold" radio formula which solves everybody's problems. Or does it?

The film moves along pleasantly, and all the actors will please you. Also there's a lot of good music of the jazz school. That Heidt lad knows how to dish out easy, smooth rhythm. The songs are better than average, best of the sextet being "When Johnny Toots His Horn" and "Broadway Caballero."

In support roles, Frank Melton, Jed Prouty and Dick Hogan stand out. Give a hand to George Marshall for intelligent assemblage of a strange melange of cinematic fruit.—Roosevelt-United Artists.

★★★ That Uncertain Feeling

If you don't expect too much, this picture should prove a pleasant evening's diversion. Ernst Lubitsch has directed the frothy affair with that well-known light touch of his. None of it is weighty or important, but all of it is pleasant, and the Merle Oberon-Melvyn Douglas combination is one that will excite considerable interest.

You've seen so many variations of the sophisticated marriage problem theme that it's hard to believe there's anything new to be said about it. The big innovation in this picture is that it's played in a sophisticated "class" pitch, as opposed to the broad farce or zany methods seen so much recently.

Merle Oberon and Burgess Meredith are in a psychoanalyst's office as the picture opens. She's unhappy and the doc suggests that, perhaps, her husband doesn't satisfy her "artistic and emotional needs." She's glad to agree, and her fellow-patient, Burgess, is more than glad. He is an arty musician who wants her to leave her husband, Melvyn Douglas, and accept him (Meredith) as a substitute. They go right to Melvyn, and divorce proceedings are started pronto. How Merle gets straightened out to the point of giving both her doctor and Meredith the gate is the theme of the film.

It's all handled slightly tongue in cheek. Merle proves to be surprisingly adept at this type of off-the-cuff light comedy, while Melvyn has, of course, played the same abused husband role several times in the past. Burgess is the surprise (if it's really a surprise) by almost walking away with the picture. It's probably the best part he's had in pictures (unless you reach way back to "Winterset"), and he handles it surely and with conviction.

Topnotch support is given the main players by Alan Mowbray, Olive Blakeney, Eve Arden, Sig Rumann and Harry Davenport. Werner Heymann's background musical score is exceptionally good, helping a great deal in the establishment of mood and tempo. In the final analysis, though, it is the Lubitsch touch that wins you.—United Artists.

★★★ Sis Hopkins

This is a musical comedy that you shouldn't miss. It is right up there, leading the parade from the standpoint of solid entertainment, even though it is not pretentious. It is Judy Canova's finest movie job, and if anybody tells you that Canova is not a topnotch star, tell 'em to go smoke a herring.

Now don't bother us about story. There isn't any. It's just a lot of good comedy, good music, good acting and good fun.

Judy acts and sings in practically every sequence of the picture, which is okay by us. But it isn't all her own film. There is healthy support from Bob Crosby and his band; Jerry Colonna, mustachio and all, is wonderful; and there's swell trouping by Charles Butterworth, Susan Hayward and Katherine Alexander.

Best of the songs, perhaps, is "It Ain't Hay," though several others are mighty tuneful. Directed by Joseph Santley.—Republic.

★★★ Model Wife

Dependable, amusing entertainment here, in a well-knit little picture that can hold its own against almost any competition. The comedy is right down the alley for the great mass of customers, and the trouping of Joan Blondell and Dick Powell will surprise you—pleasantly.

Joan is at her best, turning in a spirited comedy performance as a girl who works as a model, but is still a good wife. Dick doesn't see any reason for her to hold on to the job—especially since she is soon to become a mother. That sets the stage for a lot of very funny marital bickering of which the writers took full advantage. Dick, by the way, is improving tremendously; he is better in every picture.

There is exceptionally good support from Charlie Ruggles, Lucille Watson, Lee Bowman, John Qualen, Billy Gilbert and Ruth Donnelly.

What makes the picture stand out, in retrospect, is probably Leigh Jason's direction. It is of the new school which pays great attention to minor characters and attempts to make all the people in the movie real human beings—rather than hunks of a plot.—Universal.

★★★ Reluctant Dragon

One thing you must say about this Walt Disney guy—there's nothing he won't try. After "Mickey Mouse," "Snow White" and "Fantasia," he tries a new tangent again—this time uniting animated movies with regulation screen acting. And it's a good marriage, too, as it happens. The picture is just a fraction or so too long, and some of it is old stuff to jaded wiseguys like this reviewer—but it's still interesting, educational and good fun.

Here's the way Walt does it. He gets Robert Benchley to make believe he has an idea. Now to all of us good friends of Benchley, that is funny right from the very start. Benchley makes believe he has an idea, and he comes to Disney to sell it. He wanders all over the lot and finds out how cartoons are made. All of you who have been wondering how it's done for years will love this. Oh, yes, Benchley doesn't get time to sell his idea.

That's not much story, but it doesn't matter, because there is so much to see and learn. And it is all done in the good taste and with the grand sense of humor you'd expect from a combination like Walt and Bob.

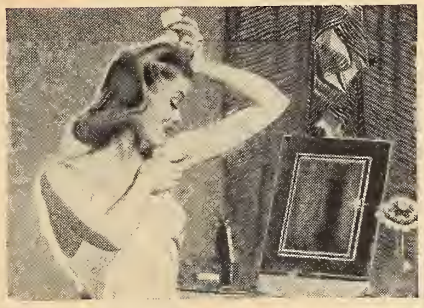
There are other human actors in the picture. Frances Gifford, cast as one of Disney's artists, is very lovely to look at, and Buddy Pepper is funny as an officious office boy. There are two hunks of animated movie brought in logically by way of explaining the business, and these seem not so good as they might be, although the Baby Weems cartoon is funny as all getout. Directed by Alfred Werker.—Disney-RKO.

★★★ Sunny

The temptation is to give this picture a higher rating, largely because you want it to be better than it is. There is so much in it that is very, very good and, oh shucks, why couldn't it all have been in the same category? Anna Neagle is lovely to look at, John Carroll is better than you thought he could be, Ray Bolger will emerge from this showing as a bona fide star, and the musical score of this old-time musical comedy is still a delight to listen to.

The trouble? The comedy. There isn't enough of it, and what there is, isn't funny enough. A little more time, energy and ingenuity in this department would have made the film absolutely top-notch. But don't let this keep you away; you will still want to see it.

The story is one of those frothy little musical comedy affairs. Anna Neagle is the circus performer and John Carroll is the rich guy who falls for her. His family tries to break things up, but love triumphs. Anna sings with Carroll and dances with Bolger. Which is okay both ways. John has a warm, agreeable voice and is entirely pleasant in romantic business. Bolger is one of the greatest dancers ever and very amusing to boot. There's room for him in this business.



An amusing light comedy dance routine is provided by the Hartmanns which, however, tends to overdo the dancing end of the show. The settings, especially in the early part of the movie, where a New Orleans Mardi Gras is reproduced, are exquisite. Directed by the British director Herbert Wilcox —RKO-Radio.

HERE ARE MARY HOWARD'S REFRESHMENT SUGGESTIONS FOR THE FESTIVE FOURTH!

Mary, whom you will see in "Billy the Kid," plans safe and sane Independence Day celebration!

Pinwheels, torpedoes, firecrackers, Roman candles, yes even flags and stars, are represented here in finest edible form!

BY MARJORIE DEEN

When you go to M-G-M's "Billy the Kid," you'll see something new and extra-fine in Technicolor, we are told. Well, it's too bad our pictures here can't be done in Technicolor, too, for only in that way could we do justice to Mary Howard's lovely coloring, with her fair skin and clear blue eyes set off by shiny dark locks; to the red, white and blue of her hostess pajamas with their star-studded blouse; and to the charming table setting and the delectable refreshments she plans on serving at her Fourth of July party.

The patriotic theme will prevail in foods as well as decorations, Mary assures us. And with her informal party plans and fine food ideas to inspire us we worked out a complete menu—something special in the line of sandwiches, a cheese "pie" to go with your salad, a help-yourself type of beverage, and that perennial favorite, homemade chocolate ice cream. Here's one menu, certainly, that you will want to remember and to follow when that gloriously long week end of the Fourth comes around to tempt you to give a party for your friends, too.

PINWHEELS

Remove crusts from a loaf of unsliced bread. Cut loaf, lengthwise, into ⅜ inch slices. Spread each slice with softened butter and olive spread (6-ounce jar). Roll crosswise as for jelly roll, wrap in waxed paper and store in refrigerator. Cut into ¼ inch slices just before serving.

TORPEDOES

Drain very large, ripe olives. Wrap each in a 5-inch square of waxed paper, twisting ends tightly. Wrap again in slightly larger squares of red cellophane, also twisting ends.

FIRECRACKERS

Remove cocktail sausages from jars. Stick a toothpick in the end of each and tie together, in bundles of three, with red, white and blue ribbon. Or stick toothpicks in both ends and arrange together in triangles. (See illustration.) Place on dish surrounding a bowl of highly seasoned mayonnaise.

STARS

Pickle Stars

Cut sliced bread into stars with cookie cutter. Spread with mixture of equal parts mayonnaise and finely-chopped sweet pickle, seasoned with prepared mustard. Cut rounds out of slices of tomato (well drained) and place one of these circles in center of each star. Season well with either onion or celery salt.

Strawberry Stars

1 tumbler pineapple cream cheese
a pinch of salt
24 slices of bread (⅜-inch thick)
creamed butter
1 jar strawberry preserves
¼ cup chopped Brazil nuts

Combine cheese and salt. Cut sliced bread with cookie cutter into stars. Spread with softened butter, then with cheese mixture. Place one preserved strawberry in center of each star, sprinkle with chopped nuts. Cover with waxed paper and store in refrigerator until time to serve. Yield: 24 star sandwiches.

FLAGS

6-ounce jar Maraschino cherries
¼ pound cream cheese
a dash of salt
12 slices white bread
creamed butter, whole cloves

Drain cherries, mince fine, drain again. Reserve one quarter of the cheese. Blend remaining cheese with salt and cherries. Remove crusts from bread slices. Butter 9 slices of the bread and spread thickly with cherry mixture. Pile 3 slices together and top with a fourth slice of buttered bread, butter side down. Wrap each of these "stacks" separately in waxed paper. Store in refrigerator several hours. With a very sharp knife cut each lengthwise into 4 even slices. Carefully place sandwiches, cut side down, on a tray covered with waxed paper. Cream remaining cheese until fluffy and spread it over the upper left hand corner to form a rectangle. Stud this cream cheese with cloves to represent stars. (See illustration.) Cover tray with waxed paper and slightly dampened towel and store in cool place until time to serve.

ROMAN CANDLES

4-ounce jar devilled ham
2 tablespoons salad dressing
18 slices white bread
4 sweet pickles

Combine devilled ham and salad dressing. Remove crusts from bread, place one slice of bread at a time on slightly dampened cloth and spread with butter, then with ham mixture. Roll lengthwise as for jelly roll, fasten each with toothpick, wrap tightly in waxed paper then in slightly dampened cloth. Chill in refrigerator. Just before serving tie each "candle" with red, white and blue ribbon and stick in one end of each a thin strip of sweet pickle to represent the "fuse."

PINEAPPLE PEPSICOOLER

1 cup canned, unsweetened pineapple juice
1 cup cranberry juice cocktail
5 bottles Pepsi-Cola
1 jar maraschino cherries (with stems)

Combine pineapple and cranberry juice. Freeze into cubes in tray of refrigerator.* When time to serve, fasten cherries together in two by tying stems with narrow red, white and blue ribbon and hang one of these pairs over the rim of each tall beverage glass. Drop 2 fruit ice cubes in each glass, place on tray with bottles of Pepsi-Cola.

 An added, attractive feature is to drop a cherry (without stem) into each ice cube section, before freezing.*

PATRIOTIC "PIE"

For this you will need two 8-inch pie plates. Line one of them with blue crêpe paper, cut considerably larger than the plate so that it extends a couple of inches beyond the edge all around. Flute edge with fingers to form a ruffle. Soften 1 envelope plain unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup cold water, dissolve in ¼ cup boiling water. Add ¼ teaspoon salt, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, 1 teaspoon scraped onion. Combine 1 (3 oz.) package cream cheese, 1 cup cottage cheese, 1 cup sour cream; put through a sieve and add gelatin mixture. Blend together thoroughly. Pour into second pie pan. Chill until set. When time to serve, place the cheese filled pie plate on the paper lined one. In the center of cheese place a red star cut out of pimento, with stripes of pimento radiating out from the center. Cut at the table into pie-shaped wedges and serve with a mixed green salad.

"ALL TIME FAVORITE" CHOCOLATE ICE CREAM

1½ tablespoons cocoa
4 tablespoons water
¾ cup confectioners' sugar
2 eggs, separated
1 cup heavy cream

Mix cocoa with water to a smooth paste. Heat, stirring constantly, until slightly thickened. Remove from heat, add ½ cup of the confectioners' sugar. Cool. Stir in well beaten yolks, add vanilla. Beat whites, add half of remaining sugar, beat until thick. Beat cream until it starts to thicken, add remaining 2 tablespoons sugar, beat until stiff. Blend beaten whites and cream, fold in chilled chocolate mixture. Freeze in trays of refrigerator with control at coldest point.

There's something about a clean shirt—I mean really clean. I come home completely fagged out, shower, slide into a crisp shirt, stow away some of Anne's gorgeous grub—and darned if I don't feel like stepping out and doing the town. (Relax, baby, I only said I feel like it.)

Just three weeks till my vacation starts and I can join you. Take it easy and don't worry about me. I'm doing fine—Love, Bob.

P. S.—Asked Anne about the shirts. She just looked wise and said 'Fels-Naptha Soap'. Does that mean anything to you?

Greer Garson, star of M-G-M's "Blossoms in the Dust," was stage-struck as far back as she can remember. At 7, she stuck up her nose at the dreary business of collecting cups for the best recitations in her native County Down, Ireland; unsuccessfully tried to join a group of visiting country-fair actors. Her parents would have none of it, packed her off to London and Grenoble Universities to learn school-teaching. Not until she fell ill and had no will to recover did they give in (on doctor's orders). After months of pavement-pacing in London, she nabbed a big role, wowed misguided theatre-goers who took her for a new American actress. Her one matrimonial venture in 1933 flopped, and she brought suit for divorce only five days after a one-month honeymoon. She spends hours teaching her French poodle to lie down and roll over.

Though John Payne's $5,000-a-year wardrobe is one of Hollywood's most impeccable, time was when matching patches was an unaccustomed luxury. In the two years following his graduation from college, he eked along in New York as poolroom operator, night club bouncer, scene painter, chauffeur, waiter, prizefighter, cook and pulp fiction writer. Summer stock led to Broadway and thence to Hollywood, where his emoting plus musical ability (one-time dance band leader and scholarship winner to music school) quick-changed him into the glamour lad you'll see skiing in 20th Century-Fox's "Sun Valley Serenade." Parents of a baby girl, he and Anne Shirley celebrate their fourth anniversary in August. Only time his nose gets out of a book is when he rides in the park or diddles around with model planes.

linda darnell . . .

Most movie-struck high-schoolers consider their lives well-spent if they catch a glimpse of their No. 1 Dream Man. Thrice blest is Dallas (Tex.) High School's Linda Darnell, who not only sees but gets a weekly $750 check for daily romancing with Ty Power in 20th Century-Fox's "Blood and Sand." In her new servantless home, completely equipped with pig sty, 3-cow dairy barn and chicken-coop for pet rooster "Weedy," she's called "Tweedles" by her mom and sister, who live with her. Keeps three turtles happy in the tub, eats gobs of salads and highly spiced Mexican dishes, entertains Mickey Rooney and writes to his arch-rival, Mexican Jaime Yorbe. She's famed among movie folk for her portraits and her ka-choos at the sight of a feather pillow, night club smoke and bunnies. (The latter are her favorite pets, too!)

victor mature . . .

Latest Hollywood swain to set women's hearts to beating is 6' 2½", 204-pound bachelor Victor Mature, who is 26" across the shoulders, has a fashionable 33" waistline and dark curly hair. Ever since his birth in Louisville, Ky., on Jan. 28, 1916, he's loathed exercise, was so lazy in school he was tossed out three times, finally quit at 15. Jerked sodas until he came to Hollywood in 1933. Nowadays he keeps in trim with occasional swims, tennis games, haunting night clubs till 5 every A.M. Despite all rumors, he's jolly, well-liked by his fellow men, admits he's never been in love, knows nothing about rumba-ing, dislikes dancing in general. Average number of hair-combings per evening: 8. Typical lunch: lamb chops, Pepsi-Cola, chocolate ice cream. Future: $1,750-per-week contract with Hal Roach.

priscilla lane . . .

Her heaven-sent aplomb saved Priscilla Lane's skin more than once. Right off the bat, at the age of 9, she fell flat on her face at a dance recital, picked herself up, unblinkingly explained it was premeditated! During her New York stage début with Fred Waring, she forgot to remove her gum, stopped the show when she couldn't get her mouth open to sing, saved the day with her bright ad-libbing. A thorough-going homebody, she prefers a book, fudge and her own hand-rolled cigarettes to night-clubbing. Keeps a pack of cats, owns about 200 nighties, doesn't give two hoots about fame and fortune. Picks Wednesdays and No. 7 for luck. Exercises by skinning the cat in her backyard—a hangover from tomboy days. Her sole complaint on the Warner Brothers set of "Million Dollar Baby" is that leading man Jeffrey Lynn absolutely forbids onion sandwich lunches!

Errol Flynn made his first American movie appearance as a corpse in "The Case of the Curious Bride." In his new picture, "Dive Bomber" (Warner Bros.), he's very much the man of action! His record is one of Hollywood's liveliest; Olympic boxer in 1928, pearl fisher, gold prospector, roving yachtsman, first-hand witness of Spanish Revolution and author of book about it called "Beam Ends." He's vehemently against mountain-climbing, Hollywood parties (rarely shows up, wears old togs when he does come), alarm clocks. He's sentimental about a thin, gold chain given him by a dying missionary. Believes it brings him luck. On the domestic front, he cooks, milks a cow, quakes at dentist appointments, raises Rhodesian lion dogs and is wed to Lili Damita, who's expecting a miniature swashbuckler!

Dave Rose talks about Judy

Her evening dresses are all red, green or white. She loves brown for the daytime, and her own four-room apartment in her Beverly Hills home is decorated in brown.

Neither Judy nor Dave ever took a music lesson. Both have tremendous record collections—everything from Bach to Bing. There's a spinet piano in her cedar-paneled dressing-room.

Dave Rose, who is Tony Martin's musical arranger, calls Judy "Big Ten" now that she's one of the ten leading box-office stars. He used to call her Jude and Baby.

THE FIRST INTERVIEW EVER GIVEN BY

Probably the most misunderstood romance in Hollywood is that of Judy Garland and Dave Rose. Misunderstood largely because people don't know what they're talking about and, under such circumstances, talk through their hats.

I'm not casting slings at people. I'm one of them myself. Until I made inquiries about and met Dave Rose, I accepted through inertia—or at any rate, didn't reject—the picture drawn by uninformed gossip. A very young girl and a man disproportionately older, more sophisticated—into the bargain, divorced. Judy Garland, the star, and who was Dave Rose anyway? Shrugs, lifted brows, the cynic's interpretation—he's not the first guy to cash in on a girl's publicity. Most of us shrink from tangling with a cynic, lest we be charged with the shameful sin of naiveté.

We also have a way of blinding ourselves to the fact that time marches on for our pet movie kids. Judy's the engaging colt in socks and flat heels who lopes after Mickey Rooney. Judy's the symbol of childhood dancing with a scarecrow in the Never Never Land of "The Wizard of Oz." If you'll count the months and the years, Judy is neither. As Mr. Rose points out with weary reasonableness, "How long can you be in 'The Wizard of Oz?'" Mr. Rose is a little sick of "The Wizard of Oz."

Judy may have looked thirteen two or three years ago. She may look sixteen now. But the girl's nineteen this month. In any language nineteen is marriageable, and a nineteen-year-old who hasn't fallen in love should have her complexes examined. Dave Rose is in his early thirties. There's no such formidable disparity in their ages. They're not married yet, nor formally engaged, but if they were, it would still be no May and December union. If Judy weren't a movie star, the chances are that not a voice would be raised nor a finger lifted. Because they're of Hollywood where a broken toenail is news, alarms and excursions become the order of the day.

So Dave Rose had been divorced. We Americans who troop so readily to the divorce courts are equally ready with easy condemnation. Rose and Martha Raye made a mistake and had the good sense to rectify it. One out of five in our broad land does the same. That doesn't make Mr. Rose a hard-boiled egg any more than it does Clark Gable or Margaret Sullavan or your next-door neighbor. Hard-boiled is what the gentleman's anything but. In a business where temper and temperament are taken for granted, he's endeared himself through unfailing kindliness. Under trying circumstances, he's never been known to fly off the handle. Unassuming, soft-spoken, he keeps not only himself but his men good-humored.

I watched him direct a rehearsal for "Adventures in Rhythm." He sat on a high stool, one tawny forelock falling over his bronzed forehead, his boyish-looking face quietly intent.

"Davy," protested one of the trumpets, "the woodwinds have an E-flat there and I have a D."

"That's the new harmony," Davy explained.

The trumpet frowned. "What'll they think up next?"

"They'll think up a C-major chord," said the boss dryly, "and astonish the world." Which certainly left everybody happy. (Cont'd on page 86)

Judy not only wears her first Adrian-designed wardrobe in "Ziegfeld Girl," but a coiffure created by Hedy Lamarr.

PRIVATE JAMES STEWART, U. S. A.

BY JOHN FRANCHEY

No truth to that rumor that Jimmy gets $1,000 weekly from Metro. On Olivia's 2 visits to camp, he's treated her to nickel Pepsies!

FROM STAR TO ROOKIE: A PEEK AT THE "PRIVATE" LIFE OF AMERICA'S MOST BELOVED DRAFTEE!

On the afternoon of March 8, somewhere in the neighborhood of two o'clock, a tall, lean man with a sheepish grin anxiously poked his way toward a pair of white scales, mounted them and watched the indicator lurch forward and waver back and forth. All of a sudden the look of anxiety departed. He was all grin.

"Well, I did it, Doc," he announced triumphantly.

The medicine man peered through his glasses.

"Hmmmmm," he said, "so you did." He turned to an orderly who jotted down the data on a big white card. "Weight 158 pounds and one-half," the doctor relayed. "Subject qualified for service."

And James Maitland Stewart, whose profession on that big white card was listed as actor, had become Private J. M. Stewart, U. S. A.

The first thing he did was to ring up Burgess Meredith on the set of "Tom, Dick and Harry."

"I've done it, Buzz," he shouted with the air of a man who has just vindicated himself. "I'm in the army at last." He didn't wait for the inevitable question. "Weighed in at 158½."

Last fall when President Roosevelt reached down in a huge drum and pulled out number 158 which set in motion the first peace-time conscription in the country's history, Jimmy was making love to Hedy Lamarr on the set of "Come Live With Me." When a Metro hired hand arrived and broke the news, Jimmy took it all very nonchalantly. Especially all the ribbing that was suddenly directed at him by everyone on the set. He made no statement. He did not feel that there was any occasion for a statement.

A month or so later he received the questionnaire which is sent those immediately in line for induction into the army. He made it out, claimed no grounds for deferment and waited to be called up for examination. In a few days, the call came. Jimmy showed up, was duly gone over by the medical board and turned down as being underweight. He tipped the scales, six-feet-three Jimmy, at a mere 148. The minimum requirement was 157 and not an ounce less. The inevitable happened: Jimmy was put in class 1-B subject to re-examination at the discretion of the local board at "some future date."

The deferment of Jimmy Stewart had an unhappy aftermath. Guilty of nothing more than being a willy-nilly thin man, he suddenly became the object of sneers and leering remarks. Curious coincidence, certain columnists observed, that $1500-a-week Jimmy had received a deferment when shipping clerks and Fuller brush salesmen, cops and firemen, cab drivers and street cleaners, who filled out their questionnaires on the same day, had already been inducted. Could there be any connection between the deferment and two pictures Jimmy had on the fire, "Pot O' Gold" and "Ziegfeld Girl?" Did the studio have Jimmy deferred on the grounds that he was part of a cog in the wheel of a vital industry? Would the deferment be permanent?

Jimmy Stewart heard the rumblings and said nothing. He did his job at the studio and kept his silence. But all this time he was doing plenty!

The first action Jimmy took on being rejected was to

Son of a World War I AEF-er, Jimmy's had a yen to fly ever since he was 14. He's loaning his plane to Olivia de Havilland for the duration; is keeping his convertible roadster for occasional furloughs.

Jimmy's favorite sport during recreation period is volley ball. It's a cinch for him to win 'cause he's so tall. His legs are 5" too long for his dungarees!

go into conference with Donald Loomis, the body-conditioner at Metro.

"I've got to get built up and toughened up—quick," he told Loomis.

Mr. Loomis prescribed two items, diet and exercise.

Concerning matters of diet, Malcolm, the Stewart colored house-boy extraordinary, received his instructions.

"From now on dinners in this house are going to feature pork chops, sweet potatoes, plenty of bread and butter and bananas and cream for dessert," Jimmy informed his man Friday. "Breakfasts will be correspondingly nourishing."

Malcolm, who is studying to be an "assistant surgeon" and consequently knows all about the body processes, looked on aghast.

"What about salads and fruit juices?" he wanted to know.

"They're out. Especially grapefruit juice. Fats and starches, that's the ticket."

For thirteen weeks the program ran its course. Morning, noon and night Jimmy would pack the calories away. Evenings he would go through a gruelling two-hour regimen prescribed by Mr. Loomis. The sight of bean-pole Jimmy wrestling with the rugged Loomis gentleman and nonchalantly hoisting weights of 150 pounds over his head had Malcolm worried for fair.

"Aren't you overdoing it a bit?" Malcolm used to say after the body-builder had gone home. "One should make haste slowly, it is written somewhere in Greek literature."

Jimmy would only laugh, drive over to Chasen's to meet the boys and gobble a strawberry sundae with whipped cream.

At the end of the thirteen weeks Jimmy made a sensational move. Without a word to anybody he paid a visit to his local draft board headquarters and asked to be re-examined. The thing to remember is that no one sent for him. No one on his local board of West Los Angeles had the faintest dream that in less than four months Jimmy Stewart, who had been called "Skinny" back in Pennsylvania, would be anywhere near the minimum weight requirement. Yet here he was on the afternoon of March 8 demanding that he be reconsidered.

He was and he made the weight. Jimmy was a soldier!

A week later Burgess Meredith tossed a "shower" for his "room-mate." All the boys in the Stewart-Meredith gang dropped by, Franchot Tone, Bill Grady (the Metro talent chief), Henry Fonda, Pat DeCicco, etc. They had a rousing time, quaffing Jimmy's health, speech-making and the rest. It wasn't one of these all-night affairs, because Stewart had to get his sleep.

At the crack of dawn a sleepy-eyed Burgess Meredith and a sober-looking Bill Grady piled into the car with Jimmy and were driven to the induction station by Malcolm. No one did much talking except Malcolm, who quoted Latin proverbs, including one that goes:

"It is just and fitting to die for one's country."

"What kind of talk is that, Malcolm, on an occasion like this?" Meredith demanded.

CAMERA SHY . . . . . BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

The pint-sized girl with the big eyes sank down on the London street curb and shook with sobs. She'd lost her purse and she'd missed her bus and—what was a darned sight worse—she just knew she'd blown the biggest chance of her young life higher than the Tower of London.

Miss Ida Ray was only fifteen. Already she'd had two years as an extra in London studios, two years of begging producers for breaks. Inside her the fires of ambition had burned fiercely. But now they were black ashes of despair. By the greatest good luck, at last a Hollywood director had seen her in an agent's office and offered a screen test. She'd just taken the test, and—

"Oh, I was awful, horrible, miserable, terrible!" Miss Ida Ray moaned to herself. "I'm through forever! I'll never get another chance! I might as well run down to the river and drown myself!"

Fortunately, Allan Dwan, the Hollywood fellow, came along about then, said "Here, here—what's this?" and trotted her off for a cup of tea to cheat the Thames of a fair white floating body. Ten days later he gave her the part in "Her First Affair," which started Ida Ray off to the races. He did it because he thought her test unusually good and knew she'd captivate audiences.

That was all some eight or nine years ago, and since then Miss Ida Ray has reverted to her legitimate name of Ida Lupino. She has also gained some renown as a dramatic actress in Hollywood comparable to Bette Davis. She's acquired a home, a husband, a bit of a fortune and currently many more starring plums than she can possibly handle.

But in one way Miss Ida hasn't changed a bit. She's still ready to dive into any convenient creek and end it all practically every time she does anything which everyone else thinks is simply wonderful. She still weeps in misery and wallows in despair before, during and after every picture she makes. She has a futility fixation that's a darb and an inferiority complex built for a troupe of midgets.

Right now, for instance, when any normal star would be heaving a happy sigh and rolling over easy, so to speak, to relax after making one of those darned near impossible comebacks in Hollywood, Ida Lupino is losing pounds and having nervous indigestion and the hots and colds. She's miserable—even though all her pictures are solid hits and movie producers are elbowing each other in line to get her for big league stuff like "Ladies in Retirement," "The Corn Is (Continued on page 88)

While working with John Garfield in "Gentle People," Ida smoked one and a quarter packs of cigarettes a day, cluttered her room with five alarm clocks to wake her up.

She and her spouse Louis Hayward, 33, were engaged for three years. They've been married since 1938. She nick-names him the Old Boy, gets called Poppet in return!

26-year-old Lupino isn't satisfied with her looks, thinks she's much too pixie-like. Off-screen she scurries around her house in bare feet, scrubs her nails at least 30 times a day. She's won prizes for her painting, had her "Aladdin's Suite" played over a nation-wide hookup.

Time was when eligible bachelors were the only matinée idols, marriages were hushed up and babies were taboo. No more! A quick check-up shows that approximately 75% of Hollywood males are currently wed, and of these 68% are fathers!

Tarzan, Jr. (his real name is John Scott Weissmuller), is a chip off the old block. At 10 months he can actually swim! Small wonder a couple of studios are dickering for his services.

Joan Naomi Benny is 7 and a slave driver. Insists that her adopted papa, Jack, give her and Oscar the Ape "one good long ride" every day. Mary Livingstone calls Joanie "Doll Face."

John Hubbard swears his daughter, Lois Maryan, sings—at five months! Could be, for her mamma, Lois, Sr., has a grand opera-ish voice, and her dad's something of a bathtub baritone.

Roy Rogers' 1-year-old has one toot in the movies if there's anything in a name. She's Cheryl Darlene of Texas. Was adopted last year and partially christened after her mother, Arlene.

Norman Scott Powell is 6. Has been Dick's legally adopted son since January, 1938, when George Barnes (Joan's first husband and a good pal of Dick's) relinquished all claim to him.

Andy Devine's sons, Dennis, 2, and Tad, 6, copy their dad's voice and hair-do. Tad (short for Timothy Andrew Devine) has a crush on his dad's best friend's wife—Carole Lombard.

Tim Holt is Hollywood's youngest father. (He's 22, his wife is 20.) Claims son Lance, who is going on 2, is a prodigy. He can walk, talk and ride horseback. This is his first grown-up haircut.

Fred Astaire's 5-year-old son Fred, Jr., is Hollywood's least photographed child. He can't dance, but knows lots of jokes picked up from his crony Ronnie Burns—George and Gracie's son Brent adores trans-Atlantic telephoning Once called Greta Garbo in Sweden, and equently phones his cousins in Ireland.

LOVE this thing called

THAT HECTIC AND LIGHT-HEARTED BRENT-SHERIDAN ROMANCE!

"I've tried to lead a good life," Ann Sheridan told herself. "Why—why—do things like this happen to me?"

George Brent, the cause of it all, seated Ann and took his place beside her. He wasn't any too pleased with the seating arrangements either.

Unfortunately, each knew what the other thought of him. "A stuffed shirt who's never learned to relax and have fun." A dozen people on the Warner lot, where George and Ann work, had told him this was what she said about him. And, from the same sources, she'd been advised of his sentiments: "A dumb girl who hasn't brains enough to know you're bound to get hurt when you're friendly with everybody—and it serves you right!"

Down the center of the long table at which they sat there was a colorful swath of fruit and flowers. Great logs burned in a fireplace imported from an Italian palace. And the hands of the gold sunburst clock imbedded in the wall began their next to the last round before midnight would strike. Midnight—when horns would blow and voices rise to greet 1940 and another year.

George, looking at Ann obliquely, discovered, to his surprise, that her mouth was as gentle as it was bright and that her eyes, discovering him discovering her, were gaily mocking.

He grinned and offered his hand. "Hello, Texas," he said.

Her grip was lean and firm. "Hello yourself, Brent," she answered, laughing. That was their armistice.

Midnight found them dancing. Ann, in a white gown simple enough to be sophisticated, constantly grew more beautiful. Possibly it was nothing more than the confetti in her hair.

She wasn't too surprised the next day when George telephoned.

"Let's have dinner at Harry's Steak House one night next week," he suggested. "Tuesday, say, if neither of us works late. I'll check with you Monday."

"Swell!" Ann said. And she meant it. Most men who invited her to dinner suggested Ciro's or Victor Hugo's. And more than once, because she'd said point-blank that she'd rather have a double hamburger at a local Drive-In, if they didn't mind, she'd been accused of having a terrific social inferiority complex.

Monday morning George wandered over to the stage where Ann was working. She could only wave. She was waiting to do a retake. Thereupon George made elaborate motions of eating, and she nodded agreement.

As soon as the luncheon recess was called Ann hurried over to the Green Room. To her surprise, George wasn't there. She sat down with Don Turner, his pal, and waited. And waited. Finally she ordered lunch.

"Nice going," she said to Turner. "Brent stands me up on our first date."

That same evening her telephone was ringing insistently as she was about to open the front door.

"Brenty" and "Red" have gone around together since Jan. 1940. Agree on everything but food: he likes one meal a day, she likes four. Her hobby is collecting perfume (she has 200 kinds), his are sailing and playing the piano.

"It's Brent again, no doubt," said Gwen Woodford, Ann's friend and companion. "He's only called three times in the last hour—and every time I've assured him you'd call back the minute you got in . . ."

It was George. "Ann," he said "I wasn't asking you to lunch. I was confirming our dinner date for tomorrow. I'm terribly sorry."

"Always the optimist," Ann said, laughing, "I figured you were buying me lunch too!"

If George had needed anything more to endear Ann to him this would have been it.

"Can you imagine," he went around asking his friends, "the act practically every other girl in this town would have put on under those circumstances? Can you imagine?"

The Hollywood cynics were cynical. "It's another romance dreamed up by the press department," they said, "and George and Annie aren't even cooperating too well. Nobody ever sees them out together."

All of which was fine with George and Ann who went right on having fun their way.

In the Valley they found a little stand where the chili was marvelous, and they went back again and again. George took her to a little English cottage back of a box hedge down Santa Monica way where, to quote him, "They serve crumpets that are crumpets." On Thursday nights when the servants were out they often cooked dinner themselves. And once, after driving almost a hundred miles to a poultry farm to select a turkey broiler, they let it burn to a crisp while they danced and (Continued on page 76)

MOTH-EATEN SUITS AND HANDLEBAR MOUSTACHIOS RAN RAMPANT AT MILTON BERLE'S 1900 BATHING PARTY!

Cobina Wright's suit was positively immodest compared to the 40-year-old togs of Bob Sterling, Geo. Montgomery and Sheila Ryan! Outing was held at Beverly Hills Hotel pool.

Comedian Billy Gilbert's still up to his old vaudeville tricks. His 125-pound wife (Ella McKenzie) was original fat girl in Our Gang Comedies, tipped the scales at 270!

Bonita and Jackie may take the plunge—but literally—before long. They're too young to wed without parental consent, but it's said both families are thinking it over.

Gigantic Laird Cregar and diminutive Sybil Hawkins were party's fair-haired children. Laird, who's 6'4" tall, lost forty of his 340 pounds during a recent case of measles!

The party—in honor of Mack Sennett, the father of slapstick comedy—featured pie-throwing by Gilbert and Berle, plus dozens of beauty contests, acrobatics and magic.

Burgess Meredith gets a load of starlet Frances Neal. Invitations specified old-fashioned bathing suits, and the men were required to hide behind handlebar moustaches!

Tom Brown, in a striped lifeguard suit with built-in muscles, monopolized Glenn Ford's love, Patti McCarty. She used to be Lamour's $25-a-week secretary, is now in the movies!

Buster Keaton, who hasn't gone to a party in years, was the life of this one. Hit a home run in the ball game and had both Marie Wilson and Judy Garland "My hero"-ing him!

CLOWN PRINCES OF COMEDY

Costello fattens Abbott up on corn. His appetite's been boundless ever since his first job in a candy store.

THE SAGA OF ABBOTT AND COSTELLO—TWO NOBODIES FROM NOWHERE WHO LIVED FOR LAUGHS AND ARE NOW ABLE TO LIVE BY LAUGHS!

They were joined for better or for worse, for richer or for poorer, on a slightly hysterical night ten years ago in a shabby Brooklyn burlesque house.

Bud Abbott, the tall, thin partner, was the box-office cashier of the burlesque house. He called himself, with dignity, the "treasurer." Lou Costello, the short fat partner, was a lowdown loud comedian on the strip-tease stage.

And while I don't know how it happened with other great combines like Gilbert and Sullivan or Beaumont and Fletcher or Gallagher and Sheen, I do know how it happened with Mr. Abbott and Mr. Costello.

It was time for the curtain to go up on the act. The leading lady had just discarded her modesty. And now it was time for the comedy.

Lou Costello was waiting for his straight man, his other half, his joke feeder. Then at the last moment, word came through that the straight man was ill with a mild case of leprosy or hydrophobia. The boys don't remember today which it was. But here was the curtain going up, and here was Lou Costello without a partner. Then the inspiration was born. He remembered playing rummy—six card knock rummy—with the dour theatre cashier, that guy, Bud Abbott. They'd always fought. Always tiffed. Good-naturedly, of course, but everyone thought it was funny.

Lou Costello sent an S.O.S.—Save Our Show—to Bud Abbott. And, in answer, Bud Abbott left his box office forever, went on the stage with Costello and, without a line rehearsed, rolled the audience in the aisles and draped them over the seats.

And so, after the show the manager came up to the two of them, and he said, in the words of the Good Book:

"Mr. Abbott. Mr. Costello. What God hath joined together, let no man tear asunder . . . I now pronounce you clown and straight man!"

And they have been a team ever since!

Of course, after ten minutes with them it's difficult to understand how they ever remained a team. Because there isn't a minute when the all-clear siren can possibly sound. They are always arguing, word-baiting, scrapping. Maybe, underneath it all, that's their secret. Their funny disagreements. You see, for them, like for married couples, argument is perhaps the splice of life. Rub two pieces of flint together and you get fire. But rub two comedians together and you get—laughs.

While on the set of their latest epic, something history-making labeled "In The Navy," wherein chubby Lou Costello, playing the chef's assistant, accidentally dopes the warship's captain and is forced to take over the boat himself and steer it zigzag through crucial manuevers—well, while on the set of that half million dollar opus, I asked chubby Lou Costello about his partnership with Bud Abbott.

"What do you think of Abbott?" I inquired.

"Bud Abbott?" flared Costello. "Listen, that guy's so tight that every time he takes a nickel out of his pocket the buffalo is blinded by the light. In fact, he makes the nickel go so far, that same buffalo gets sore feet! Abbott wouldn't even give a beggar a bite if he owned Sandwich Islands! His favorite household pet is the moth because it eats nothing but holes! I feel Abbott is one guy who proves all cheap skates aren't hockey players!"

In another corner of the crowded set was Bud Abbott. I asked him about his partner.

"Lou Costello? That roly-poly fat boy? Why, he's such an out-and-out liar he doesn't even believe himself! I admit he's a tough guy. In fact he's so tough even his meals are afraid to disagree with him. But I'm tougher, see. I eat sardines without removing the cans! And I'm smarter than that little runt. He's really a dummy. He used to think the American quarter in Paris was the first seven rows at the Folies Bergere! He went to college. Sure. But all he got out of it was himself!"

However, what Abbott and Costello spout against each other is jest for fun. Tongue-in-the-cheek. Because certainly there is method in their being mad. It's their forte. Their stock in trade. It made them sensational on the Broadway stage, on the radio, and it made them rich and

They celebrated their tenth anniversary as partners with their wives and a big birthday cake. Costello's first role was doubling for Dolores Del Rio in a can-can skirt.

Abbott (left) prefers Monopoly to poker! Thus far in his ten-year game with Costello he's run up a debt that's conservatively estimated in the neighborhood of $3,000.

famous in Universal's screwy picture, "Buck Privates."

Fundamentally their arguments are purely professional. When they did their first picture, "Moonlight In The Tropics," with Nancy Kelly and Allan Jones, they were able to reel off nine pages of dialogue—which ordinarily takes three or four days to shoot—in 2 minutes 24 seconds. They simply got up before the camera and began disagreeing.

"We don't like the studio to write too much for us," Lou Costello explained. "We can't get the feel of printed routines. We just have them tell us an idea, and we get in front of the camera, begin wrangling about it and cook up the words as we go along."

"Yup, that's the way we do it," Bud Abbott added. "The whole trick of our teamwork, ever since we started in burlesque, is to burn each other up. It makes people laugh. And so, to keep in practice we fight in real life, too. For example, currently our biggest argument is over our new homes. I think I have a better home than Costello. He thinks he has a better one than I have. He belittles mine. I belittle his. I say to him, 'Lou, you've got a nice little place, you must bring it down sometime, and I'll put it in my icebox!' Then he snaps, 'Yeah? Well, when you have two or three days off, come around, and I'll show you my kitchen!' So I answer, 'Listen, you jerk, I got a well on my property. Four days ago a man fell in that well, and yesterday when I was passing by I heard the splash!' And so on. We argue like that over rummy. It keeps us on our toes!"

I learned, though, that in important matters like comedy routines or billing or getting along together as friends, they never disagree.

Behind the success of these clown princes of comedy, behind their sensationally funny friction gags, runs the story of two chaps who found a way to make a sense of humor pay.

William "Bud" Abbott was born under the big top. And that's not dreamed up biography. His father was a cracker-jack Ringling Circus publicist. His mother was an attractive carnival bareback rider. When he grew up, he became a sign painter and a cashier in (Continued on page 79)

With Gayle Mallott in "In the Navy" Bud and Lou do a sequel to "Buck Privates." Costello's wanted to don a uniform for 20 years; nowadays is too fat to look glamorous!

ON THE SET WITH

"TOM, DICK and HARRY"

Drawings from which "fantasy" sets for RKO's "Tom, Dick and Harry" were designed.

THREE-TIMING GINGER ROGERS AND HER "APPLE-POLISHING" SUITORS RAISE THE ROOF

Top dancers Ginger and George josh in her satin-padded dressing-room. They dance at least an hour a day to the tune of her portable radio. Favorite piece is "Java Jive."

In the old days, Ginger used to knit between scenes—now clowns with Buzz or gorges on ice cream. Always keeps cast and crew supplied with it while her films are in production.

An ancient wheeze tells us that Samuel Goldwyn once called a writer on the carpet because the writer had named his principal character Bill. "Change it!" Goldwyn roared. "It's not original! Every Tom, Dick and Harry is named Bill!"

Mr. Goldwyn was wrong. Over at RKO, Tom, Dick and Harry are not named Bill. They are named George Murphy, Alan Marshal and Burgess Meredith, respectively. And they're all vying for Ginger Rogers' love in a frisky film which, even Goldwyn will admit, cops the cake for originality.

"Tom, Dick and Harry" is the story of a little telephone operator tagged Janie who finds herself engaged to three men at the same time—Tom, a peppy, pushy automobile salesman, Dick, a stunning Mr. Moneybags, and Harry an amiable loafer whose idea of success consists of fishing by day and smooching by night. Janie would like to marry all three but realizes that would be impractical. So, before making her final decision, she stretches out in bed and imagines what life would be like with each.

That's where the originality comes in. For Janie's imaginings are not those of an ordinary girl. They are those of writer Paul Jarrico who got $20,000 of the $800,000 the picture will cost, just for doping them out. Jarrico takes his heroine into three lands of make-believe —one for each husband. And Janie's flights into fantasy are not to be dusted off lightly. They're too amazing, too Hollywoodish.

As Mrs. Tom, Janie sees herself the perfect middle-class wife. She wears dresses to match her kitchen curtains. She bakes biscuits so light they float in air. She cultivates the right people by watering them with a sprinkling can. And she makes a good impression on her husband's boss by pressing her thumb into his bald pate! Eventually, the go-getting Tom becomes President of the United States, and Janie is aghast as three little boys, looking exactly like Murph, shout "Bravo, Pop!" from high-chairs. (To achieve this last effect, a chair, ten feet high was wheeled on the set, and Murphy, dressed in a long, white baby dress and bonnet, crawled into it. The entire scene will be reduced for the screen, and what the audience will see will be a lustily cooing George at the adorable age of one!)

As Dick's wife, Ginger muses, she will be quite the grand lady. She will spout double-talk French and wear orchids in bed. Her floors will be ermine-covered and her gowns so dazzling, onlookers will don dark-tinted glasses to avoid being blinded by her brilliance! And again she will be the mother of three boys. Only this time they will be nattily garbed in polo clothes—and dead ringers for Alan Marshal!

Janie's day dream of marriage to happy-go-lucky Harry is somewhat less lush but still very charming. She visualizes dwelling in a tumbledown shack, chatting with a talking fish, owning a wardrobe of well-cut rags and driving about in the 1921 Chevrolet Director Garson Kanin sentimentally works into all his pictures. Janie thinks being a lazy man's wife might be fun until her three sons (perfect carbons of Meredith) reveal that, taking after their pop, they'd rather fish than go to school. And when Harry won't even bother to accept the $10,000 he wins on the Pile O'Dough radio program, Janie passes out cold!

Ginger's romantic woes take her through 90 scenes of reverie and realism before her hand is at last bestowed. Her costume changes number 45, which is more than any actress has had since the birth of pictures. Ginger doesn't mind 45 changes, but she does object to the number of fittings they involve. So, for the first time in cinema history, a costume stand-in has been put on a studio payroll. She's Geraldine Grey, trig, dark-eyed model chosen from 55 girls tested for the job. Geraldine's measurements exactly duplicate Ginger's, and all Ginger's costumes, from the honest-to-goodness flour sacks in which she altar-treks with Harry, to the pearl-caked gown (Continued on page 97)

ON THE SET OF "TOM, DICK AND HARRY"—RKO'S ROLLICKING NEW ROMANTIC COMEDY

George doesn't dance in this film, and Ginger's one brief two-step is with chronic dance-sitter-outer Meredith.

WHO IS THIS Great Lover?

BY GEORGE BENJAMIN

First thing Gabin did when he hit Hollywood was to pick up turtle neck sweaters, roguish caps and a brakeless racing bike!

HE'S JEAN GABIN, WHO'S BROUGHT A

If Hollywood's male charm contingent appears a trifle nervous these days, we can assure you it is not because of overwork or income tax or indigestion. The reason? A stocky, rugged, blue-eyed son of the soil, a 36-year-old Frenchman who looks like an apache, plays an accordion, has made sizzling cinema love to Simone Simon, Annabella, Michele Morgan, and whose name is—

Jean Gabin!

He has finally arrived in Hollywood, preceded by his legend of amours—the wicked old continent's leading contender for that important title—Great Lover.

Already, Jean Gabin has specifically challenged Charles Boyer's reputation!

Six years ago, a French company planned to make a picture called "Pepe Le Moko." They wanted Boyer to return to France and play the lead. Boyer read the script and refused. "The hero is too rough and too cruel," he said. In his stead Jean Gabin was hired to play the hero. The resulting film was so hot, that American theatres were forced to shelve it until they installed asbestos curtains and special fire extinguishers.

Then, Walter Wanger in Hollywood decided to make an American version of this same movie. He named it "Algiers," and he cabled France and asked Jean Gabin to come on over and do the American version. This time it was Gabin who refused. He said, "I have already done the role, and America is too far away." So Wanger talked to Boyer about the part, and Boyer consented, providing the hero was tamed down a trifle.

The result? Well, in the local version Boyer was really good, and he packed plenty of oomph. His love-making with Hedy Lamarr was the talk of the nation. But—today, at long last—Jean Gabin's French edition of the same story has been released. And the answer is in the box-office. In Hollywood's Esquire Theatre alone, women have been lined up for two blocks attempting to get inside to view Gabin and to swoon in ecstasy.

The decision? How do Jean Gabin, the challenger,

In 4-starred "Pepe Le Moko" Jean Gabin (pronounced Jon Gah-ban) plays opposite French siren Mireille Valin.

Was in love with Simone Simon for a while. His "Grand Illusion" was called the world's finest film in 1938.

NEW BRAND OF OOMPH TO HOLLYWOOD!

and Charles Boyer, the champ, playing the same romantic role, compare as great lovers?

One New York critic, after seeing both films, gave her answer. She wrote: "Gabin is a man of action compared to Boyer."

After ten years as France's greatest star, working at a salary which would be equal to $6,000 a week in America, Gabin last year forgot about his career and joined the navy when the All Out War began. He served as an ordinary sailor on a mine sweeper—one of the most dangerous jobs in the service—and when France was defeated, Gabin was demobilized. In the face of hell on the ocean his hair had turned from ash blond to silver gray. He went to the new French home he had built and planned to rest. He was in it only two weeks when the Nazis came and demanded that he act in their propaganda pictures. He refused. So the Nazis burned his home to the ground. He promptly accepted a contract from Twentieth Century-Fox, left Paris—and reached Lisbon with no money, one shirt, a promise to join his country's forces again in the event of renewed war, and a vow to make American film fans love him as much as those of his own country did.

Jean Gabin reached Hollywood a complete foreigner. He could speak only four words in English—"Get the hell out"—taught him by hard-boiled Manhattan reporters. In an effort to groom him for his first American flicker, "Moon Tide," in which he would portray a rakish Swedish fisherman and make love to one of Hollywood's glamour girls, Zanuck decided his import must learn English.

Gabin was immediately entrenched in a wooden cottage behind the Beverly Hills Hotel to spend three months learning to speak English—not Oxford style, but rough and ready American lingo. Upon learning to speak the local tongue, Zanuck asked Gabin to spend three more months learning to think in English, a thing Hedy Lamarr originally failed to do and which caused her endless grief.

When he arrived, Gabin objected to the nearness of the hotel to his bungalow. (Continued on page 73)

20th Century-Fox studio teacher, Dr. S. R. Mitchneck, spends hours teaching Gabin man-in-the-street English.

Spencer Tracy was one of Gabin's first welcomers. They knew each other in Paris; each thinks the other's tops.

"I'M NO MALE GARBO"

SOME PEOPLE ENJOY TALKING ABOUT THEMSELVES AND OTHERS DO SO PAINFULLY. RONNIE COLMAN IS OF THE SECOND CLASS

"He ought to be here in approximately a minute," the studio representative said with authority, glancing at his wrist. "Ronald Colman is always on time. You can practically set your watch by him."

We fingered our notebook nervously, looked to our three pencils. Over in the northwest corner of the "My Life With Caroline" set, Charles Winninger was cutting up, totally unmindful of the fact that the man Hollywood knows as "the male Garbo" was about to give one of his rare interviews.

At exactly two o'clock a gentleman in brown tweed coat, gray trousers and an Ascot tie came into view. The studio man got up. It was Mr. Colman all right.

The interviewer's young sister had made him promise to bring back a picture of the man in close-up.

"If I'm going to have a prince charming, I want to know what he's really like," she had proclaimed in the manner of an ultimatum. Which explains how come the reporter was eying the gentleman those first few moments as if he were inspecting a ten-dollar bill during a counterfeit-money epidemic.

Well, Mary, Mr. Colman looks just the same as he has for the last twenty years, ever since he became the nation's Feminine Sleep Disturber Number One in "The White Sister."

His eyes are big, brown and luminous. They seem to have the same faraway glance as that of a man peering into Never Never Land. They look this way even when he smiles one of his two smiles; the half-sad, half-amused one and the half-arch, half-cynical model. He speaks in a low, crisp voice that stays on an even keel. Forty words or so is his absolute tops for continuous speech. Then you have to prod him again. He hates dull people and is so afraid of being a bore that he's economical with his speech.

His face is brown, and his general appearance lithe and rugged. He has a good head of hair. His moustache is kept carefully clipped. His teeth are a dental ode to beauty.

After settling down, Mr. Colman lit a cigarette.

"I notice you're wearing your 'how-to-meet-a-legend' look," he smiled. "And I'm just in the mood to explode a legend, especially if I'm the subject of it.

"Wherever did they get this silly tag-line about 'the man in the iron mask?'" he asked, casting an accusing glance at this reporter. "My life is an open book—a very dull one, I might add. Where shall we begin?"

There is no point in trying to make you believe that from this point on the reporter and Ronald Colman put aside all formalities, retired to a pub and spent the rest of the afternoon and night discussing the gentleman's personal history. What we did do, actually, was to spend a good hour playing a game called questions and answers, results of which are set down for you forthwith:

He is an actor "partly by choice and partly by circumstance." Swamped by the backwash of the post-war slump of World War Number 1, he cast around for some sort of "suitable" employment and was stymied. Grasping at a straw, he chose the stage as a possible lead into movies, his secret ambition.

After nearly starving in New York, he was ultimately given a part in "La Tendresse" with Ruth Chatterton and Henry Miller. A role in the stage play "East is West" brought him to Hollywood where every studio passed him up on the spot. It took a couple of pictures made in Italy—"Romola" and "The White Sister"—to turn him into a national cinema hero almost overnight, whereupon Hollywood clamored for him.

His first American picture was something called "Tarnish" with May McAvoy. He thinks he was "quite mediocre" in it.

He likes Hollywood very much, loves pictures even more. He resents the "male Garbo" reference, because he swears it's untrue. As he explains:

"I'll pose for the photographers, see any intelligent

Colman's just planked down $15,000 for the rights to Alice Duer Miller's "White Cliffs of Dover," in which he'll star. Proceeds will go to British War Relief.

By James Carson

writer and cooperate generally, provided that it has a direct bearing on my work. My private life I regard as my own."

He vehemently disclaims being a hermit.

"I used to be one of the most active bachelors in Hollywood, parties and all that sort of thing."

"What happened?" the reporter wanted to know.

"I got married, and I changed my technique somewhat."

He still gets around a good deal, but without display. Now and then he'll go to the fights. Occasionally he'll visit Ciro's or the Brown Derby with his wife, Benita Hume, who loves to dance as much as he does. He detests the tango. She likes the rumba. He's tried it, but says it's too much for him.

The Colmans are sociable, not social, people. Because he's English, he naturally has a few British friends like Clive Brook, Ralph Forbes and Herbert Marshall. But his American friends are even more numerous and include William Powell, Richard Barthelmess, Warner Baxter, Tim McCoy and Jack Benny, his next-door neighbor. They play tennis, singly and together, take long bike rides and have frequent dinners with long sieges of conversation afterward.

He thinks one picture a year is the ideal way to prevent the public from getting tired of his face. If he does what he thinks is a bad picture, he'll hurry up and get another one going so as to recover what he thinks is lost ground. Actually every Colman picture has made a bag of money.

He has lived in his present rather modest home for five years. There are less than ten rooms, millionaire though Mr. Colman is. He hates ostentation and walks about in odd jackets and slacks. He can't stand this business of wearing sun glasses to hide one's identity.

"What identity?" He'd like to know.

He's hepped up about fishing. Once he caught a 27-pound marlin and has never forgotten it. Nor will he let his friends forget it. The dead fish gets a funeral oration every time a fisherman shows up at the Colmans' house.

It's not been publicized too much, but Mr. Colman is chairman of the board of the United Producing Corp. which is backing "My Life With Caroline." He's trying to demonstrate one of his favorite theories: you don't need to have fabulous sets in order to make a good picture.

You'd expect him to be a pipe smoker and to have been born with that moustache of his. Actually neither is true. He confesses that the moustache was dreamed up by the same Henry King who picked him for "The White Sister." He had been given a test which didn't quite jell. King in a fit of inspiration drew a moustache on Colman's lip. It gave him something—that distinguished look, plus. It went with his eyes. Another test was made, and Colman was hired.

He'll tell you wistfully that maybe he ought to have followed his first ambition and become a writer. The only thing that prevented him, so he told us waggishly, is "a lack of any particular talent for that career."

He and Benita Hume have been wed for 3 years. When they met, she was engaged to another man, and he was bitterly disillusioned over his first unsuccessful marriage!

He loves to eat. French and Italian cooking are his favorites. He has little truck with calory-counting, and his weight hasn't varied five pounds in the last twenty years.

Humor, especially the clever gag or even broad burlesque, is right down his alley. So are bicycling and tennis, which he plays in Ascot tie and high-ankled shoes. In books, give him Shakespeare; in sports (as a spectator), football; in dogs, wire-haired terriers. Shopping trips with his wife, golf, jewelry, hats and Tommy Dorsey records all leave him cold.

It will bowl you over, but he's proudest of himself as a comedian. Wait until you see him in "My Life With Caroline." He's an understanding husband married to an amorous and roving wife, with a yen for slick Latins.

How Ronnie goes about baffling her periodic backsliding and winning her back is something that will affect you like a cool breeze in mid-July. Mr. Colman is really delightful.

Interviews he tolerates as a part of his job.

He doesn't carry a cane. He isn't a bridge addict. In his youth he used to develop crushes on great ladies of the stage. He'd write them letters but never post them. All of which makes it easy for him to understand fans. He only wishes that they would try harder to understand him.

Remember the child in "Little Women" who comes out with:

"I have an infirmity. I'm shy."

She was speaking for Ronald Colman.

CLOSE-UP OF

Paulette, who will be thirty on June 3, cannot stand perfume or the color blue. She loves kids and is always championing Chaplin's more devilish son, Sydney.

UNDERSTAND HER OR NOT—YOU JUST CAN'T IGNORE HER. SHE'S THE MOST DARING, MOST EXCITING WOMAN IN HOLLYWOOD!

Paulette Goddard has beauty, grace and talent. So have other girls who get nowhere. Nature has endowed her with rarer qualities—an eagerly questing brain, tireless vitality, a joyous zest for life. These she'll still have when (and if) she's eighty. They give her personality its vivid and arresting color.

She has an independent mind and the courage of her convictions. Persuaded that a course is right for her, she takes it with an attitude of complete detachment from what "they say." By the same token, she believes in letting others live. She has more of that large tolerance with which men are generally credited, than of feminine malice. For Paulette, people are divided into two groups—those who stimulate and those who bore her. Wherever she finds them, she cultivates the former. Her acquaintance ranges from the Max Eastmans to Mrs. Harrison Williams.

She and Chaplin have drawn their own design for living. Whatever rumors you may hear to the contrary,

The Chaplins have reached this understanding: they may date anyone they want, but neither will consider these dates grounds for divorce.

PAULETTE

BY JEANNE KARR

they're not divorced or divorcing. When Charlie's on the coast, they live under the same roof. They enjoy each other's society. Either is free to date whom he or she pleases. Charlie doesn't care for night life or dancing. Paulette does. She'd rather tango than eat. Dancing both relaxes and exhilarates her. She doesn't concentrate on any one partner. This week she may go out with Jock Whitney, next week with Alfred Vanderbilt, Gene Markey or Tim Durant. She feels so strongly that dancing should be a part of every child's background that she arranged for a group of orphans in whom she's interested to be given ballet lessons. "But that sounds so unnecessary," a friend protested. "I want them to have something unnecessary," said Paulette.

She likes barbaric colors—red, yellow, purple—and guesses it's the gypsy in her. They go well with her olive skin, dark hair and eyes that change with the changing light from blue to green to gray. For the evening she prefers gold or white with bright accessories. To set off their striking color, her clothes are always simple in line.

Franker than most glamour gals, she blithely declares that costume jewelry doesn't interest her except in design. She likes real gold so heavy that it looks like costume jewelry. A pet necklace and bracelet, for example, are fashioned in a thick flexible double rope of red and yellow gold. If she has a favorite stone, it's the diamond, though left to choose between stones and gold, she'll take the latter.

She has definite ideas about conventions in fashion, the most definite being that she doesn't believe in them and can't see why women should meekly turn themselves into figures of fun at fashion's behest. Her single rule is, if it suits you, wear it. She for one can't stand stylish hats. She hates fussing with them till they're tilted at the one inevitable angle where they look right. Besides, she never wears hats, crazy or otherwise. She buys them to match her costumes on the theory that some day she may have to put one on. Meantime they dangle, blobs of color, from her hand. She used to wear slacks, but, concluding after due observation that skirts were more becoming, she gave them up. The moment she gets home from the studio, shoes and stockings come off so that she can walk barefooted. She finds it relaxing.

She lives at the beach in a white house and spends as much time as possible in the sun on the principle that sunlight's a cure for most ills and depressions, mental and physical. When she's not working, she goes without make-up two days a week to give her skin a rest, using only lipstick and a light oil. Incidentally, she's discovered another make-up (Continued on page 75)

Most publicized Goddard romance was the one with Anatole Litvak. Now Paulette (who was once married briefly to a lumberjack) is being seen around with Gene Markey.

Paulette has the world's loveliest figure according to 6 artists. Keeps it that way motor-biking, but is grounded while "Hold Back the Dawn" (with Boyer) is in production.

Bob has a fabulous memory, but says there are two things he'd love to forget—that he's an ex-boy soprano and that his real name is Lester.

Hope gets $3,000 a week for his radio show with Cobina, Brenda and Jerry Colonna. Has never had mike fright in his life. Says he wards it off with a quick prayer just before he goes on the air.

FROM Gags TO RICHES

In 1938 was voted one of the 10 best male singers in the country. Has 2 ambitions: to beat Bing Crosby at golf and to play one dramatic role.

Next to heckling Dottie Lamour, Hope's favorite fun is entertaining at benefits. He's appeared at over 1,000. Gets a huge kick out of doing it.

Bob and Dolores Reade have been married six years. Have two adopted kids—Linda, 2, and Tony, 1. Plan to adopt at least three more.

Bob's devoid of conceit. Has never asked to have a picture sitting killed. Currently gets more fan mail than Clark Gable or Tyrone Power.

BOB HOPE'S SUCCESS HAS BEEN DEPENDENT UPON HIS ONE DEFORMITY—AN OVER-DEVELOPED FUNNYBONE!

BY IRVING WALLACE

Examine yourself carefully. Stick out your tongue. Say "ahh." Inhale. Exhale. Feel your pulse. Flex your right knee. All right. Now compare the results of your symptom-hunt to the following expert and official diagnosis:

"Quick convulsive breathing with violent sounds and facial expressions indicative of mirth."

If that's exactly how you're suffering, don't worry. There are thousands upon thousands of slap-happy patients just like you. Because the preceding symptoms, to be found in Dr. Vizetelly's Handy Standard Dictionary, are of a very common and catching malady known as —laughter.

And while there have been rare cases of persons who've caught this malady from being mildly tickled by a feather or playfully massaged in the ribs, the most ordinary cases have caught their laughter from the original germ-spreader—Bob Hope.

Lots of persons, of all types and sorts, have caught laughter from Bob Hope. His wife has. His six brothers. His eleven gag writers. And his forty million fans. The malady has been contagious, spreading rapidly from coast to coast. People, en masse, have caught it mostly in crowded theatres and near blaring radios. In fact, according to NBC and Paramount Studios, there have even been some bad cases of the disease. There have been those who've convulsively "rolled in the aisles." Others, more dangerously attacked, have had their "sides split." And the worst cases have "died laughing." The germ has become a major and national epidemic.

Fortunately, after intensive research for MODERN SCREEN, we have diagnosed the nature of the epidemic and are here to report that it is not "serious." In fact, to the contrary, it is very, very funny.

We have spent an endless amount of time with Bob Hope, have analyzed his every twitch. We should be happy to insist that he is Hollywood's super-zany, a screwball, a daffy-dilly, a clown prince and sixteen-cylinder jester. But that would not be true.

Rather than something super-super, Bob Hope's style is easily identified. He is your punning brother-in-law. He is your good-natured boyfriend. He is the wise-cracking clerk at the corner grocery store. You recognize him immediately (Continued on page 70)

Ann keeps all her jewelry in stocking boxes. Most valuable piece is a real pearl ring.

Buys her furs with the overtime money paid by M-G-M. She's now saving for a lynx jacket.

NO SKELETONS IN ANN RUTHERFORD'S CLOSETS—JUST A CAREER GIRL'S WARDROBE, HOLLYWOOD STYLE!

JEWELRY: 10 bracelet and necklace sets, 12 lapel gadgets, 2 lapel watches, 4 pairs of earrings, 7 compacts. She carries her compacts in their little flannel jackets even when she goes out. PERFUMES: Several bottles each of Chanel, Schiaparelli, Lentheric, Elizabeth Arden, Helena Rubenstein, Coty, Yardley and Matchabelli. HATS: Owns 24. Makes them over when they've been photographed too many times. FURS: 1 mink coat (full length), 1 silver fox jacket, 1 pair silver foxes, 1 Russian ermine coat (full length). LINGERIE: 10 nightgowns, 1 pair pajamas (she wears these when she goes down to the boat Chuck Isaacs left her when he joined the army), 4 bed jackets (she usually breakfasts in bed), 5 robes, 2 negligees, 10 slips (all ruffled), 1 pinch-waist corset.

Keeps dabbing on cologne all day when she's at home. Uses perfume only in the evening.

Has boxes for her favorite hats; the others are on shelves. Makes most of her own headgear and can duplicate $65 originals for $2.50.

Scatters Schiaparelli's scented face cloth tablets and gardenia corsages among her lingerie.

Makes her own hair ribbons, mostly from velvet or flowered taffeta. Hugest bows are for pompadour hair-do. They're ten inches wide.

HAIR RIBBONS: About 35. CLOTHES: 5 suits (3 dressy, 2 sports), few street dresses (those she has are basic ones which can be given different appearances with various accessories), 13 evening gowns, 5 slack suits, 4 pairs of slacks, 23 blouses, 14 bathing suits, 8 sweaters, 3 terry cloth beach jackets, 6 wool jackets (worn over slacks). HOSE: 2 dozen pairs. She must wear her own for pictures. When her stockings rip, she waits until she has four or five damaged pairs, then takes them to the dime store, where runs are fixed for 10 or 15 cents, depending on their length. She has snags repaired for 5 cents. SHOES: 19 pairs sports shoes, 18 pairs dress, 7 pairs evening slippers—to say nothing of several pairs of skating shoes, riding boots and galoshes. PURSES: She has 13 of them.

Couldn't resist buying this little pinch-waist corset, but has never worn it. Is saving it for a tight-in-the-middle evening gown.

She insists she has no glamour, but you ought to see her in these. They're her two pet formals, both chiffon.

Has bathing suits in every color but yellow, which she hates. Cannot stand midriff swim suits or evening gowns.

Keeps her slacks on a men's trouser rack. Wears sports things at home, but changes into something more elegant before dinner.

Owns nothing initialed but 2 hankies. This one has an "R." Ordered the other marked "Ann"; got "N" by mistake.

She wears her own 5½A's in pictures. Brushes them the minute she takes them off, and keeps tissue paper in their toes. Like her hats and purses, they usually last about 3 years.

Knits like a fury every spare second—even at the movies. Makes all her sweaters and sports blouses. Her hobby is designing clothes. Favorite designer is Nettie Rosenstein.

BY CAROL CARTER

Did you ever stand on a street corner and try to guess people's ages by the way they walk? You can learn a lot that way. Young girls, for example, walk by with a light, airy, springy step, keeping their heads high and their shoulders straight. Middle-aged women, nine times out of ten, either bounce, mince or lope as they walk. What a giveaway! Elderly people often step with uncertainty. And there you have three ages of women.

But could you discover the ages of cinema stars so easily? Not much! Norma Shearer, Greta Garbo, Kay Francis, Janet Gaynor, Madeleine Carroll or Marlene Dietrich have every bit as much spring and grace in their footsteps as have Jean Parker, Olivia de Havilland, Brenda Joyce or Susan Hayward. And even the out-and-out old-timers in Hollywood have an airy rhythm that many a younger woman might copy with profit. You never noticed anything mincing, loping or wobbly about the footsteps of Spring Byington or Gladys George, did you?

Those girls and women realize that many a strained face, tart disposition, frazzled nerve and obscure physical illness can be directly traced to tired, neglected or overworked feet. So they have adopted simple little home routines to keep their feet young, strong and happy.

Most people were born with perfectly normal, healthy feet, but somewhere (Continued on page 83)

IT'S FUN TO BE WELL-GROOMED

When you are just about to collapse after a long day's work and settle down for a restful evening at home, did your phone ever ring and the light of your life announce nonchalantly from the other end of the wire that he had just fallen heir to two tickets in the third row and reservations at your favorite restaurant afterwards—and would you please be ready to start in forty-five minutes? Oh, chills and thrills! How can you do it—but you know very well you wouldn't refuse for a million—isn't this the date you've been waiting to have for weeks? What to do! Where to begin! You now have just about forty minutes to change into the gorgeous creature that he thinks you are.

Off with your clothes and into your negligée! On the way to your bath or shower, catch up those stray straight locks in bob pins or curlers, so that they'll be working for you while you're washing your cares and troubles down the drain. There are grand little curling gadgets that can be whisked into place in a minute, and no girl should be without them, either for regular use or special occasions like this.

Also, on your way to the tub, lay out a set of fresh, cool, clean lingerie, your most becoming dress and all the accessories to go with it. And don't forget to set out your Sunday-best set of purse-sized beauty gadgets to nestle daintily in your prettiest evening bag. This is also the best time to remove all old or soiled nail polish with a bit of cotton and an oily remover and to set out the polish which best harmonizes with the dress you plan to wear.

Maria Montez, delightful Universal starlet

Lotions soothe, smooth and protect against summer sun, wind and water and keep skin lovely.

WHEN YOU FOLLOW THIS PLAN

Now slather onto your face, neck and arms a thick coat of cleansing cream. If your things are all in their proper drawers and boxes, so that you can find them in a jiffy, all this can be done in about five minutes.

To keep your lingerie always fresh and dainty requires but a few minutes each evening, and there are such grand, safe, mild soaps to use on them these days that it is actually fun and a great satisfaction to do your own under-pretties just to see how lovely they can look. So, if you've kept all of your clothes fresh, clean and in good condition, as you should have, you'll have no last-minute nerve frazzles over them just when you most want to look and feel your best.

Now for a good, luxurious, stimulating tub or shower bath. If everything is in apple-pie order, and you have enough time, treat yourself to a restful, relaxing tub with bath salts, cologne and your very favorite cake of clean-scented, free-lathering soap. If you prefer the pepping-up tingle of a brisk, rapid shower, that is all right, too. Whichever one you take, be sure to use a new, easy-to-get-hold-of cake of soap, a bottle of light, fresh-scented cologne, an after-bath rub and a generous sprinkling of cooling talcum or dusting powder.

Of course, you'll use a clean, thick turkish towel for drying. Remember that the towel rub-down not only dries, but stimulates and relaxes you, so it is an important part of your beauty ritual. Right here is the time to apply a good, effective deodorant, cream, powder or liquid, underarms, on your back (Continued on page 81)

Deodorant and a fresh-scented talcum or dusting powder should follow every bath the year 'round.

Creams of all kinds should be used lavishly this time of year if skin is not to suffer.

A refreshing foot powder is a beauty treatment whose soothing effects reflect in feet and face.

GROOMED FOR GLAMOUR . . .

BY KATHRYN GRAYSON as told to Gladys Hall

All work and very little play made cute Kathryn Grayson a star!

"You want me to tell girls just what a major studio does to and for a girl when it is grooming her for stardom, isn't that it?" Hazel-eyed, dark-haired, nineteen-year-old Kathryn Grayson, wearing a powder blue sweater suit and just the right amount of make-up, took a deep breath and said, "Well, here we go!

"I get up at seven in the morning, which is none too early considering how much there is to do. I have eight lessons every day! First my dancing lessons, ballroom and ballet, alternately—for a half-hour period. Then I have my voice exercises with Mrs. Minna Letha White. My body is alive from the dancing, and the vocal exercises make my voice alive. After that there are dramatic lessons with Mrs. Lillian Burns. Then to Mr. Gelman for piano lessons and after that opera scores with Mr. Rosenstein. Then I have two lunch hours, and I'm always simply starving. Afterwards I'm off to Earl Brent for light opera coaching. Then to Mr. Zador for counterpoint, theory and harmony. Back to Mrs. White again for repertoire, arias and concert pieces. Then home to a huge dinner and bed—until seven the next morning, when it begins all over again.

"But let me tell you what they did to me before I even saw a camera. I had a space between my two middle front teeth, so they sent me to a dentist. He fixed that. I was a bulgy little brat two years ago, but that was fixed up too—not by diet, need I add. They don't believe in girls dieting. I don't take any special exercises, either. Wouldn't have the time or patience. I just walk a lot, play some golf and get pounded by a masseuse. I am now down to the approved measurements for my height—bust, 35½ inches, and hips, 33. I wear a size 6 glove and a 4½ or 5 shoe.

"They didn't make me do anything about my hair. When you think of a studio trying to "glamourize" a girl, you probably think they try to doll them up. Not any more! The whole trend now is toward naturalness.

"They left my clothes alone, too. I love clothes in spells, and I go for variety. I adore hats. Sometimes I fall for a really dizzy one, and then the kids (my sister and brothers) will say, 'Oh, glamour girl!' and I'll never wear it again. It's not that I do or don't want to be a glamour girl. It's just that I couldn't. I'm not the breed. I usually wear plain navy dresses with white collars and cuffs. I wear lots of sweaters, too, because they're so practical.

"The studio didn't suggest that I live any differently, either. We still live in our same house, daddy and mother, my unmarried brother Michael and my sister Francie, who is sixteen,—just as we did before I came to M-G-M. I have no car. Daddy drives me to the studio and picks me up again in the evening when I'm through.

"Our home life is probably the only one of its kind in Hollywood! Radios going, dogs barking, birds singing, babies raising Cain (my oldest brother has three little girls). If any girl could go temperamental or glamourous at my house she'd be entitled to it! If I ever started anything like that, they'd give me the 'Ha, look at the Duchess!' routine until I ate humble pie on my bended knee!

"To get back to grooming. I use soap and water and some good creams. I usually wear low-heeled shoes, because they keep my whole body comfortable. Sometimes I go around the house and garden bare-footed. I take a warm bath with jasmine bath salts every night, and during the day I use carnation and jasmine toilet water—a splash of one and a splash of the other. The combination gives you a nice, fresh, spicy smell. If I'm especially tired at night, I put pads soaked in warm water and witch hazel on my eyes. The studio doesn't advise me to do any of these things. I do them because I want to.

"I'd like to say something to girls who want to be screen stars. If it's excitement and hey-hey you're after, you'd better stay right in high school. Being groomed by a Hollywood studio isn't what you imagine at all. It's just like being in a school with a very stiff curriculum. I have my eight lessons a day, eat lunch with one of my teachers and go home. Why, I didn't even meet a single movie star the whole first year I was here. No one paid any attention to me.

"After I'd been here a year, I did meet Nelson Eddy at a small party at Mrs. Ida Koverman's house. He was interested in my voice and suggested that I visit him and Jeanette MacDonald on the set. I did, and Mr. Eddy was swell to me. He pointed out how perfectly Miss MacDonald knows camera angles and how wonderfully she places her voice. Now, Mr. Eddy and I sing duets occasionally for our own amusement.

"The funny thing about my case is that I didn't really want to be a movie star. It just happened! I was born in North Carolina and was raised in St. Louis. We came here because Daddy had a real estate deal pending. It never occurred to any of us that I might land in the movies! I'd taken a few intermittent vocal lessons but had never found the right teacher. I'd always wanted to be an opera singer, and I still want to be one more than anything else in the world. (Continued on page 95)

Kathryn's real name is Zelma Hedrick. (Kathryn's her middle name, Grayson's her mother's maiden name.) She's 5'3", but would love to be tall. Is begging the studio to dye her hair blonde.

MOTHERHOOD FOR DEANNA?

It happened at Deanna Durbin's wedding. A group of guests huddled in a corner for a buzzing session. Glancing toward the beaming bride and groom, one of the guests shook his head slowly. "I give her a year," he whispered. "I'm not so sure about that," said another. "I'd say two years myself." There it goes, we thought. Drawing up the divorce papers already. Just like Hollywood. In a few moments we were eating our words. For in a precedent-shattering gesture, the group was speculating not on how long Deanna would remain Mrs. Paul, but on how long it would be before she had a baby Paul! And do you know what the consensus of opinion was? That Deanna will become a mother in a year! Deanna and Vaughn love children, and their intimates believe that unless someone can advance a good reason why they shouldn't, the Pauls will be three in '42.

Jimmy Stewart isn't sticking his neck out. It's just been revealed that when Uncle Sam's draft board tapped Jimmy on the shoulder, Jimmy promptly shed his movie star trappings and became one of the boys. Fearful of being tagged a Hollywood "swell," he tucked his expensive luggage into a dim dark corner of his Movietown manse and shuffled off to camp with the cheapest, plainest set of bags money could buy. Actually, Jimmy didn't give a darn whether shirts and undies were encased in genuine cowhide or cardboard. But what did upset him was the matter of a certain pair of solid silver military brushes of which he's long been proud. When he packed to leave, Jimmy looked at them longingly, decided they weren't appropriate for an army tent—and for the next twelve months, the Stewart tresses will be patted into place with an unimpressive pair of recently-acquired wooden hair caressers!

CLOSED CORPORATION

That wonder boy of the cinema, that tonload of talent, "Magnificent Mischa" Auer, has discovered a new outlet for his genius. Dissatisfied with merely acting, Mischa has formed his own producing company—the president, vice-president, vice-vice-president, director and cameraman of which are all . . . Mischa Auer. Mischa films his epics with an 8 millimeter movie camera and releases them in his own living room. "Miracle Productions, I call them," boasts Mischa. "And my slogan? Just this—'If It's a Picture, It's a Miracle!' "

DOUBLE FEATURES

Funny, the things that will block a romance. Frances Farmer, back in Hollywood for "World Premiere," met Stirling Hayden on the Paramount lot. It was a case of instant attraction, and the shy Hayden stuttered out an invitation for a date. "Sorry," said Frances ruefully, "I'd love to accept but if I do, everyone will say it's because you look like my ex-husband, Leif Erikson. They'll swear I'm carrying a torch!" So be it, we say. But that doesn't explain why the "disinterested" Frances pays daily visits to Leif, now working in the hilarious comedy, "Nothing But the Truth," at Paramount. The reason may be due to the fact that her former spouse reminds her of Hayden!

Willis Hunt and Martha O'Driscoll added a dash of Horse and Buggy romance to Barbara Jo Allen's party. They're the real McCoy; will wed when he gets his divorce from Carole Landis.

Most everyone at the old-fashioned ice cream party wore their Sunday go-to-meetin' finery. Exception was Annabella, who watched ex-soda jerker Ty Power display his technique!

COVERING UP FOR KATHRYN

Too bad. Too bad. M-G-M is turning thumbs down on "cheesecake" art for Kathryn Grayson. Though Kathryn is just a youngster, and an extremely shapely one at that, the studio has ordained that absolutely no publicity pictures are to be shot of her in a bathing suit or shorts! M-G-M has had too many bitter lessons with art of this type. Giggle-getting snaps, taken of Myrna Loy and Joan Crawford in their pre-great days and showing those ladies clad in nothing more confining than a veil and a few beads, are constantly cropping up to haunt them. Metro expects Kathryn to become the biggest star in Hollywood. When that day dawns, they don't want any tintypes that are not the strictest models of dignity and propriety putting in an appearance. Oh, well. It's our loss!

LEADEN LADY

Hot news around the hot spots is the full-blown feud rumored to have sprung up between Marlene Dietrich and Bruce Cabot. The trouble, it is said, dates back to the time Marlene and Cabot were parading their talents on "The Flame of New Orleans" set. One scene called for Bruce to literally sweep Marlene off her feet and carry her across the room. As the cameras stood ready to turn and Marlene stood ready to be swept, Cabot balked. He fixed his eyes on the Dietrich countenance. "I can't carry her," he said, according to reports. "She's too heavy. Will you get me a double instead?" We are told the astonished Marlene flounced away in a huff. She weighs little more than 100 pounds, and Bruce is almost a 200-pounder. He could have lifted her as easily as he could a cup of tea! Marlene is still bearing a grudge, and at this writing the only things being lifted are the Dietrich and Cabot noses as they pass in the Ciro's night.

JACK THE COMPLEX-KILLER

Rib-ticklingest sight of the month was Jack Benny ankling into the Brown Derby the other dinner hour. Jack got as far as the pastry case when a mob of waiters tore to his side, nearly knocking him off his pins. It seems each was trying to lure the Benny appetite to his own table! And do you know why the tray-toters were all so eager to serve Jack? Because he's the most generous tipper in Hollywood! And do you know why he's the most generous tipper in Hollywood? Because indirectly his script writers have made him that way! This is how it works. Before his writers turned him into the boastful tightwad every radio fan and moviegoer knows, Jack was just a normal, healthy guy like you and me. But when he began playing America's Number One Skinflint, he developed an inferiority complex about the character! So because he's always subconsciously trying to prove to the world and himself he's not a cheapskate, he's been converted into the most liberal spender this liberal spending town has ever known! In fact if Mrs. B. didn't stand guard, it's a sure bet the Bennys would be receiving their mail at the county poorhouse!

ANYTHING FOR A LAUGH

Speaking of Jack, do you know he's the first comedian in history to employ a stand-in gagman? His regular writers, Bill Morrow and Eddie Beloin, earn $2,500 weekly (actually!) between them. But even at that price, Jack doesn't expect them to work miracles. He realizes they may hit a mental dry spell occasionally and leave him high and dry without a radio script. To guard against such an emergency, he pays another gagster $500 a week just to sit in on the Morrow and Beloin conferences and give the boys a hand if they run into a vacuum! When Morrow and Beloin are in top form, the stand-in doesn't open his mouth. But he collects his check anyway. It's worth that much to Jack to know he's there!

TRUE TO FORM

A charming era in Hollywood history is ended. The omnipotent Hays office has issued another of its tongue-clucking edicts, and with one fell swoop the town's beloved Sweater Set has been swept away. No longer may Lana Turner, Betty Grable and Carole Landis be screened in provocative, form-fitting slipovers. For in a decisive memo to producers, censor man Joe Breen, who's paid to be Hollywood's conscience, dictated as follows: "In recent months we have noticed a marked tendency to inject into motion pictures shots of low-cut dresses which expose women's breasts, as well as 'sweater shots'—shots in which the breasts of women are clearly outlined and emphasized. All such shots are in direct violation of the Production Code, which states clearly that the more intimate parts of the human body must be fully covered at all times, and that they should not be clearly and unmistakably outlined by the garment. . . . In the future any shots in which women's breasts are partially or wholly exposed or any 'sweater shot' in which the breasts are clearly defined will be rejected. . . ." Observed one disgruntled Sweater Set-er: "It would be a bigger favor to the world if they covered up some famous faces."

GRAND DIS-ILLUSION

It was just like telling a child there ain't no Santa Claus. Vic (Adonis) Mature, the most manly man on either side of the Rockies, was recently summoned by a New York draft board. The morning Vic reported for his physical exam, hundreds of women held their breath, awaiting the word that was certain to take their idol from them. At last it came. A sympathetic doctor patted Vic on the arm and broke the news: "Go back to Broadway," he said. "We can't use you. Not with flat feet!"

SHORT SHOTS

Bette Davis's "ex," Harmon Nelson, has gone into khaki . . . It's Virginia Field and Vic Mature in New York . . . Howard Hughes hopes to star old love Katie Hepburn in his next fillum . . . Big problem on the Metro lot is what to do with Andy Hardy. The studio doesn't know whether to send him to work or to college . . . Add ranch owners: Greta Garbo recently purchased 28,000 acres worth of cattle country near Las Vegas . . . An Arkansas theatre manager bills James Cagney as "Jamesie" on his marquee. His wife makes him do it because it's her pet name for Cagney . . . Artie Shaw is putting aside his music to devote his entire energies to a new world peace plan . . . Gene Tierney will lay 20 slaps on Randy Scott's face as "Belle Starr" . . . In music critic Deems Taylor's opinion, Reginald Gardiner knows more about music than anyone in Hollywood . . . Funny folk, the French. Danielle Darrieux's husband, Henri Decoin, will continue as her business manager when their divorce becomes final . . . Virginia Weidler made her flicker bow in the German version of a Wally Beery picture. She was only five at the time, and Mama and Papa Weidler, as well as five other little Weidlers, were in the picture . . . It may be wedding bells, after all these years, for Nick Grinde and Marie Wilson. They were spotted home-hunting . . . Hollywood is asking: why were there tears in Alice Faye's eyes when she won her final divorce decree from Tony Martin?

Frances Neal and her Beau Brummel, Rand Brooks, nibbled a cone with hostess Barbara Jo (left). She's known as Vera Vague on NBC, plays Beth Holly in radio show "One Man's Family."

Guests had a hilarious time playing kid games like Spin the Bottle and Musical Chairs. Mary Brian peeked while Pinning the Tail on the Donkey; was caught by Jack Benny's announcer Don Wilson!

GOOD NEWS

LEVANT-ISM

Mary Martin made a quick trip to New York after completing "Kiss the Boys Goodbye." While in the Big Town, she ran into Oscar Levant, who's also in the picture. "Oscar," she enthused, "I saw 'The Boys' before I left! You were great! Why, you came out really likable!" "My God," groaned Oscar. "I'm ruined." And he immediately went out and insulted four people.

AUTO-SUGGESTIONS

Ladies, don't bounce one off your husband's noggin because he wants to blow your fur coat money on extra-fancy automobile equipment. Your Movietown males are just as gadget crazy. For example: Errol Flynn keeps a dog house in the rear of his car for the comfort of his pet Schnauzer, Arno . . . An exquisite medallion of his daughter Maria is set in Gary Cooper's dashboard . . . William Orr's snowy-white coupé is upholstered in an eye-stopping Scottish plaid . . . a St. Christopher medal protects George Raft when he travels. It's part of his gearshift knob . . . The Clark Gables always toss a pair of sleeping bags in the back of their station wagon when they embark on a trip. If they're stuck for a night's lodging, they roll themselves into the bags, draw the strings up to their noses and go snugly off to the land of movie star's dreams.

LOVER'S LAMENT

Love-struck men, who boast their girl friends are so beautiful they ought to be in pictures, ought to be glad they're not. That's the opinion of 20-year-old, football-playing Bob Waterfield, the U. C. L. A. Junior who last Christmas slipped an engagement ring on Jane Russell's third finger left hand. Bob's been dating Janie for five years, and it's his regret that she said "yes" to a Howard Hughes contract at the same time she said "yes" to a life-long contract with him. It's the publicity and the demands on her time that Bob resents. "Just look at this," moaned he when confronted with a magazine story about Janie entitled "The Return of the American Bosom." "Why couldn't it have happened to somebody else's girl!"

SOUND AND FURY

Don Ameche was reminiscing about his old-time radio-acting days. "Boy, I'll never forget one night when I was doing a show in Chicago. There was a daffy sound effects man on duty, and he kept missing his cues. At one point, I announced I was going to shoot my leading lady on the spot. Then I paused. I waited for the gun report. None came. So I decided to try again. 'You faithless wench,' I shouted. 'I'll kill you right now!' Still no gun. I was frantic. In desperation, I switched the line. I said 'Shooting's too good for you. I'll stab you instead!' My leading lady caught on. She screamed horribly. Then she gasped in agony and let go with a death gurgle. It was a tight spot, but we got out of it—almost. As I opened my mouth to speak my next line—the gun went off!"

Rita Quigley and Bozo the Clown (hired specially) yum-yummed as hostess Jane Withers cut first slice of her birthday (15th) cake. Party, complete with orchestra and ice cream, was thrown in Beverly Hills Hotel's Palm Room.

IN A GILDED CAGE

To at least one Hollywood celebrity, the picture business is a prison, and the sound stage a cell. George Brent, after 12 years of movie work, is like a man who has been interned against his will and prays for the day of deliverance. 150 films have been on George's schedule since the day he signed his first contract. "And I don't even remember the names of five," he'll tell you. Well, George's sentence is nearly over. His current picture pact runs till a year from December. With that out of the way, he'll be free to go as far from Hollywood as he pleases. What we can't understand, though, is how a guy can be so down on a business that gave him a prize package like Texas Annie Sheridan!

THE SCENERY CHANGES

That Greta Garbo is the sly one! Greta still takes her daily setting-up exercises with Dr. Gaylord Hauser, but she's not permitting that little routine to block her romance with Erich Maria Remarque. Ever the domestic soul, Greta is now busily engaged in altering many of the touches in writer Remarque's home (pictures, rugs, and so on) to suit her own taste. A particularly interesting sidelight on the great Garbo's flair for interior decoration is this—all the touches she is altering are those originally installed by Marlene Dietrich!

MATRIMONY AND THE BENNETTS

When Connie Bennett sped to Yuma to become the bride of the Mexican-born Gilbert Roland, she accomplished two things: (a) she took unto herself a man she has long known and admired, and (b) she added another notch to the steadily zooming Bennett family marital score. Including the latest ceremony, the four Bennetts, Connie, Joan, Barbara and their father, Richard, have exactly 10 marriages and 7 divorces among them! Connie, you know, was formerly wed to the Marquis de la Falaise, millionaire Phil Plant and Chicagoan Chester Moorhead. Joan, before becoming Mrs. Walter Wanger, shed Gene Markey and John Fox. And father Richard, with two wives to his credit, lost them both in the divorce court. Barbara, the only Bennett to marry just once, recently sued for her freedom from singer Morton Downey, and by the time you read this, the Bennett divorce record may be upped once again!

PUCK UNDER PUNISHMENT

Burgess Meredith was feeling mighty chipper as he sauntered onto the "Tom, Dick and Harry" set the other A.M. "Hiya, kids!" he greeted the assembled cast and crew. "How're my little playmates this fine cheery morning?" Dead silence. "Didn't ya hear me?" queried Buzz. "I wanna know how you're feeling!" More silence. Buzz began to fidget. "I don't get it fellers," he said. "What's the gag?" Director Garson Kanin stepped forward and slipped a note into his hand. And then Buzz understood. He had reported late, and as punishment for holding up the company his "little playmates" were giving him the silent treatment! And they weren't half-hearted about it, either. For the entire day Ginger Rogers, George Murphy, Kanin and others on the set referred to Burgess, when they had to, as "that fourth character," "that other party," and so on. But not a single word was addressed directly to him. Only once was the silence nearly broken. That was when Buzz stuck his head into Ginger's dressing-room and, grinning puckishly, chirped: "I don't suppose you're interested, but Jimmy Stewart's coming home for the week-end!" Ginger was dying for details, but clamping her lips together, she looked straight through him—and quietly shut the door in his face.

THE GREAT MAN VOTES

John Barrymore is back again with another of those inevitable "ten best" lists—this time with the funniest we've ever encountered. Asked to name the ten greatest profiles in history, he nominated, besides himself, the following: (1) Cyrano de Bergerac. (2) Jumbo, the circus elephant. (3) Gargantua, 1941's most famous bridegroom (unless Barrymore remarries). (4) W. C. Fields. (5) Mussolini. (6) Maxie Rosenbloom. (7) Any Ubangi woman. (8) Cobina of the Brenda and Cobina team and (9) W. C. Fields. Says John: "You'll note that I include my good friend W. C. Fields twice. That is because I believe both sides of his very distinguished nose are worthy of mention!"

Gloria Jean grooms June Carlson's glued-on beard. (It was yanked off at least 4 times during 5½-hour afternoon party.) June copped first prize for most original girl's costume in her circus freak's half-man, half-woman outfit!

MAN BAIT

The U. S. Army has invaded Hollywood! When RKO announced they were placing the newly-wedded Nancy Kelly and Edmond O'Brien in "Parachute Battalion," a story of parachute troopers in training at Ft. Benning, Georgia, the army immediately dispatched a parachute expert to the studio to supervise important scenes. The reason? Today, the American army has only 423 trained parachute jumpers. It needs 2,000 but can't draft the difference, because the service is too perilous. The army's only hope is volunteers. Thus, by aiding RKO to publicize the battalion, the army hopes to attract enough men to fill their quota! We don't know why the army makes things so tough for itself, however. They could probably do much better by simply rounding up a few of those shapely Georgia peaches, putting them in bathing suits and on posters and plastering them over the country à la Hollywood publicity technique. We'll bet a thousand to one Fort Benning would soon be hanging out its S.R.O. sign!

REGINALD THE WRETCHED

Hedy Lamarr and John Howard are worried about their good friend Reginald Gardiner. For the past few weeks Reggie's been going around with a wild look in his eye, murmuring something strange and unintelligible about "chipmunks." Realizing a happy, healthy lad like Reggie never concentrates on four-legged creatures exclusively, we cornered the poor fellow and requested some explanation for his apparent lapse of reason. This is Reggie's story: "Hedy, John and I went to the movies one evening. When we left the theatre, a mob of autograph hounds ganged up on us. I figured they were only interested in Hedy and John so, with typical modesty, I retired to a corner to wait for them to finish. I was getting a little envious, I admit, when I noticed two little old ladies giving me the eye. Like magic, confidence ebbed back into my veins. I flashed them a full-face, double-row-of-teeth smile and urged them to come nearer. They did, obviously flustered at being so close to a celebrity. Then one of them spoke. 'Would it be revealing any secrets,' she whispered, 'if you told us how you draw those cunning little chipmunks, Mr. Disney?'" There it is, Hedy and John. Do you blame your little pal?

BUBBLE TROUBLE

If you want to see a peaceful, quiet man grow wild-eyed, just mention "bubble-bath" to Bill Holden. Bill discovered a jar of the stuff sitting on Brenda Marshall's dressing-table the other evening. Intrigued by the directions on the label, he borrowed a supply for his own use, smuggling it out when Brenda's back was turned. At home he decided to try it immediately. "And what a horrible experience that was!" he told us blushingly. "The stuff foamed up so fast it nearly drowned me! And that's not all! I finally rescued myself, but gosh, did I smell! Like a burlesque cutie on a dime-store spree! Personally, I'm willing to forget the whole darned thing. But not Brenda! She thinks it's funny to call me Daisy!"

YANKEE DOODLER

Ever meet a doodle expert? Probably not. There aren't many around. That's why we were so delighted to discover Miss Dorothy Hoffman holding court at Earl Carroll's restaurant. Miss Hoffman is Hollywood's pet doodle-decipherer. She makes a career of analyzing the wriggles and curlicues left on Mr. Carroll's tablecloths by the town's top-notchers, and some of her reports are fascinating. Here are a few: (a) Clark Gable has intense energy, extreme enthusiasms, and lapses into periods of dark moodiness. He dislikes routine and detail—and has to fight an almost ungovernable trait of jealousy! (b) Dorothy Lamour is strong-willed and wants her own way. She tries, rather unsuccessfully, to keep her heart from running away with her head. She makes an interesting companion because she doesn't know the meaning of the word boredom. (c) Judy Garland is extremely feminine. She loves people and makes strong attachments. She is sensitive, idealistic and a hero-worshipper. (d) Mickey Rooney is going through a formative period—trying to find himself and make adjustments. (e) Jimmy Stewart is high-strung but constantly on guard about expressing his emotions. He detests being handled or influenced and is a bit suspicious of people who show him a great deal of attention. By disposition and temperament he is a cross between a dignified Englishman and a tempestuous Latin!

LOVE MATCH

With the firecracker season approaching, why doesn't someone pull the stunt of the year and set a match to George Raft and Betty Grable? That team is loaded with more combustibles than an RAF raider! And don't think the great American public isn't aware of it! George long ago discovered that the quantity of his fan mail is affected by the intensity of his romances. When he dated Norma Shearer, public reaction to his personal life reached an all time high. Since the start of the Grable bonfire, his letters have nearly doubled.

BARNYARD FOLLY

Jimmy Cagney is the despair of Warner Bros. He hates publicity, believes everything that can be said of him has been said and every picture of him that can be shot has been shot. For years the Warners have coaxed and wept, but Jimmy resolutely has resisted every effort to break down his anti-exploitation attitude. So—imagine the delight of the studio's publicity head when, picking up his phone the other morning, he heard Jimmy's lungs shouting an invitation to come to the Cagney home immediately! "I've got the greatest story of the year for you!" said the lungs. "Hurry! And bring a photographer, too!" The publicity head didn't wait for more. Diving for the door, he grabbed a cameraman en route and ripped over to Jimmy's house. "What is it?" he gasped when he got there. Jimmy winked significantly. "Come with me," he said. Leading the expedition through the house and into his backyard, he marched up to a big red-roofed chicken coop surrounded by a dozen of its clucking tenants. "Look inside," Jimmy commanded. "See that hen,"

Aladdin SAYS Genie's a Genius . . .

You remember Aladdin? The poor tailor's son who found the magic lamp, and every time he rubbed it a Genie appeared and granted Aladdin's every wish.

One day at lunch . . . presto! Genie appeared. "Hey," said Aladdin, "why are you here? I didn't rub the lamp."

"I know it," replied Genie, "but it rubs me the wrong way to see you eating all soft food. Take this Dentyne and chew some often. Its extra chewiness gives your teeth needed exercise and helps protect them from tartar and decay. And that richly satisfying taste is real flavor magic."

"That's fine!" said Aladdin.

"Don't forget," answered Genie. "Dentyne adds lustre to your smile."

"Genie," said Aladdin, "you're really a genius."

Moral: You too should take the Genie's advice. Try Dentyne for distinctive flavor and to help brighten your teeth . . . And don't overlook its handy, flat, flavortite package—so easy to share.

Blondex is absolutely safe, costs but a few pennies to use. May be had at 10c or drug stores. Get a package today.

on screen or radio—though it's your first meeting—and because he is familiar, you become attached to him at once. Then, too, his methods are frank. If he tells a good joke, he laughs himself. If he tells a corny one, well, he groans with you. That's Bob Hope.

His familiar profile, which resembles a warped hockey stick, supports a brain which has a gag in each cell. Everything serious that sifts through his active jumping-bean mind comes out humorous.

He can't even write a straight ordinary letter. While on his last personal appearance tour where he broke Sally Rand's box-office record in Chicago ("And I didn't use fans, either," he says), he tried to write a serious letter to his bosom pal, Bing Crosby. Here is what Hope wrote:

"Dear Bing: At present I'm not only doing six vaudeville performances a day, a couple of benefits every night, a radio preview and regular weekly broadcast—but I also have to get up early every day to rehearse for a nervous breakdown!

THIS train is now going through a tunnel. Must stop writing a moment as I want to use this opportunity to pay my troupe their salaries. I've paid them off in the dark so much lately, they're thinking of asking the Treasury Department to put glow worms instead of eagles on all new money!

"As I write this, Professor Colonna is looking over my shoulder, but you can hardly blame him. This upper berth is so small he and I are sleeping piggy-back!

"Incidentally, the act has been doing swell. Dottie Lamour visited me opening day in Chicago and guested a couple of performances. That night Dottie and I got into a little argument, so I said to her, 'Go! I never want to see your face again—but the rest of you can stay!' A lot of her Chicago fans voted that they would rather not see her in tropical pictures anymore—but outside of her sarong they thought she would be swell!

"I'm really glad, Bing, that I made this personal appearance tour. It gave me a chance to meet my public. Besides, Paramount wanted me to get out of town until my last picture blew over. And my toothpaste sponsors thought a personal appearance tour would be a great thing for me. I went for it and what happened? They not only have me on the stage for six appearances a day, but they have my teeth on display in the lobby!

"Pardon me, the train is pulling into Boston now, and I want to open my golf bag and wake up Skinny Ennis. Keep your stomach in, Bing! Goodnight!"

Which gives you an idea.

Anyway, a lot of people who've been infected by Hope have been anxious to know more about him. But our main trouble is that we can't decide what is plain fact and what is pure funny.

There are a lot of kill-joys, the kind of folks who steal from blind men and scare little children, who say Bob Hope wouldn't be a first-rate comedian without his six brothers and eleven gag-writers. Well, while it's true his half dozen brothers—count 'em—Ivar, James, Fred, Jack, Sidney and George—help him a good deal, and while it's equally true his eleven gagmen furnish him with most of his basic gags—it's not true that he wouldn't be funny without them.

Witness the fact that Bob Hope in real life during impromptu speeches and on the set, reels off a brand of humor that has listeners guffaw-drunk. Witness also that two of his brothers, Jack and George, admit quite frankly that while you can concoct and buy jokes by the hundreds, you can only find one Bob to point them up and socko! deliver 'em.

His gagmen submit 400 jokes a week. Of these Bob weeds out the scream of the crop, dresses them up and uses about 120 in his 22 minutes of radio time. Also, in his movies at Paramount like "Caught In The Draft," Hope, after reading the script, sits down with his gagsters and figures out the funniest draft jests possible and then just talks them into the script. It's a very disconcerting way of working for Paramount—but it gets results.

His brothers explain that Bob himself has invented at least five new humor formulas. For example, when Dot Lamour says to him, "Honey, you get under my skin," Hope will flip back with, "No, Dottie, you get under mine—it stretches!" This type of humor has never been used before, not even by Joseph Miller.

The Paramount jester is a genius at upholstering creaking gags and sifting the corn out of them. For example, once in Chicago he said, "I've got a brother who's darn tough. He once slapped Al Capone in the face!" To which a listener replied, "Gee, is he that tough? I'd like to meet your brother." And Hope replied, "Oh, I can't dig him up just for that!" The city of Chicago—and Capone's henchmen—protested the gag. So Hope dropped it. But recently he made it up-to-the-minute by injecting Joe Louis' name instead of Capone's. Simple?

When it comes to opinions on humor, Bob Hope possesses definite ideas. He thinks most amateur story-tellers—the life-of-the-party variety—spoil their efforts by not having the endings of their jokes clearly in mind. "When a comic forgets the tag of his joke, that's grounds for justifiable homicide," says Hope.

HE feels the radio has helped make the public sophisticated. "They won't eat corn any more," is the way he puts it. "Jokes have to be smart." Hope thinks Bing Crosby, his golf companion, has the best sense of humor in movieland. But he feels W. C. Fields is the best professional comedian in the business. "The old rogue kills me," admits Hope.

Our hero is probably the best liked man in Hollywood. Producers, critics and creditors adore him equally. He gets along with his fellow comics, which is a novelty. Once I was in his dressing-room listening to a rehearsal record of his scheduled broadcast, when Jack Benny wandered in. Jack sat down to listen to it, then suddenly Bob Hope walked in. "Shut off that victrola!" he shouted at me. "And get that pirate Benny out of here before he steals my gags!" Benny, who pays $2,500 a week for gags himself, feigned injury and insult, got up and started walking out in a huff. In an instant Hope made a flying tackle, brought Benny down to the floor. "Where are you going?" inquired Hope. "Aren't my jokes funny enough for you?"

However, at present Bob Hope feuds with only one jokester in the business. That's Milton Berle over at Twentieth Century-Fox. Hope jestingly claims that Berle steals his gags. "In fact," says Hope, "Berle once laughed so hard at one of my shows, he dropped his pencil!"

Bob Hope's private life interests are many. His first, he met and married seven years ago. Hope was appearing in the musical comedy, "Roberta," on Broadway. In a nearby night club a model named Dolores Reade was the singing star of the floor show.

One evening our comedian met Miss Reade, complimented her on her vocals. She inquired politely, "What do you do?" And Hope answered, "Oh, me, I'm just a chorus boy in 'Roberta.' I also carry spears." Miss Reade went to see "Roberta" and saw that Bob Hope carried, not spears, but the entire show. His antics were hilarious. In fact she was still laughing when he proposed to her—laughing so hard that she was unable to refuse. Nowadays, every summer the couple mix business with pleasure by taking a honeymoon combined with a vaudeville tour. Hope jokes. His wife sings.

Another of Hope's personal interests is politics. He doesn't mix in it actively. He just tells what he thinks in humorous form, like revising the old wheeze and stating, "Say, I hear Mussolini went down in a submarine to review his fleet." He also appears on benefits for any worthy cause at any time, in any place, and many of these causes involve war relief. He recently received an Academy Award for his unselfish services to charity. He also likes to kibitz on the subject of local and national politics. When Los Angeles elected a new district attorney, Hope quipped, "This new district attorney was the man who was going to clean up Los Angeles—but Santa Anita beat him to it!" Then he added, "My Democratic friends won so much dough on the election, they're now Republicans!"

His third interest revolves about athletics. His game of golf, at which Crosby always trounces him, is already legend. However, what few people know is that, at one time in his life, he wanted to be a prize-fighter. Honestly! He thought there was big money in it. He was sixteen years old at the time and, since he was fast on his feet, felt no opponent could touch him. His parents were against the idea. So Bob Hope changed his name to Packy East and became a pug. He entered the Ohio State Novice Boxing Championships. He fought for one day, and according to the record books, he (1) won his first fight because the other fighter dropped from exhaustion trying to catch him, (2) drew a bye, (3) met the champion in the semi-finals, and (4) when he woke up in the dressing-room, announced he'd been through the world's first blackout.

"That," recalls Bob Hope, "was the life and death of Packy East."

He was also interested in becoming a baseball star. A short time ago, when Connie Mack, pilot of the Philadelphia Athletics, was in town, he asked Bob if he'd every played baseball.

"Sure," said Hope. "I used to be with the Eagle Rock Beavers."

"Really? What position did you play?"

"Well," explained Hope, "I used to sit on the bench in the dugout a good deal. But this particular season we had pretty tough luck during the big game. Everyone on our nine was being forced out with injuries. Someone was hit by a ball. Another fellow was hurt sliding. And so on. Finally after every substitute had been sent in, and every pinch-hitter, the manager at last turned to me on the bench and said, 'Hope—get up—we're sending in the bench!'"

He told me, also, that he was interested in horse racing. He planned to buy a horse and name it Yehudi so people could shout, "Where's Yehudi?" He almost lost his enthusiasm over the turf last year when he was betting on Crosby's colts. "Once I put a lot of money on a Crosby horse. Well, that horse really ran a fast race, that is, if you care for things like 'Gone With the Wind.' After the race my wife turned to me and said, 'Are you ready to go home yet, Bob?' And I said, 'Yah, roll out the barrel!'"

Bob Hope's other activities and sports, mostly of the indoor variety, consist of consuming endless amounts of herring and garlic, drinking a quart of milk a day, reading Variety in his huge bed which was imported from New York, sleeping six hours at a stretch, playing an excellent game of rotation pool, taking horrible 16 mm-outdoor movies, kidding Dot Lamour till she's half crazy.

His biography, of course, contains the usual ups and downs. He was born in London. Has a grandfather in Surrey today who is 97 years old and rides a bicycle daily. Hope obtained his first job in Cleveland at the Chandler Motor Car Company. Instead of selling cars, he tried out old gags on new customers—was soon being used by the firm as an after-dinner speaker instead of a salesman—and was fired when he used the president's dictophones to practice his monologues.

In his day Bob Hope was hungry. "People used to comment about the ripple on my stomach," he remembers, "not knowing it was my spine."

Today Bob Hope is ranked a shade behind Jack Benny and Edgar Bergen on the radio. However, experts admit that if his program played on Sundays—the best audience day—he would be number one. On the screen no streamlined comedian surpasses him. And on the stage he is absolutely tops.

And that, fans, is the result of our investigation on America's major epidemic—the carrier of the giggle-germ which has affected everyone with laughter.

So, no matter what sorrows beset this battered world, you needn't fear that men will forget to laugh—because there'll always be hope as long as there's Hope!

There were too many people around. He would be unable to stroll about in his swimming trunks.

He learned Marlene Dietrich lived two cottages away from him. Three hours later he was out dining with Marlene, whom he had met once briefly in Paris. No slow worker, that Gabin.

In filmtown, the French idol was welcomed like a continental conqueror—not alone for his fame and reputation as a cinema lover, but for his renown as a superb actor.

Everyone wanted to wish him well. First there was a cable from his best friend—Maurice Chevalier, now singing for charity in unoccupied France—wishing him health and success. Then Edward G. Robinson, who speaks fluent French and who had known Gabin abroad, came to visit and to take him to dinner. Next, Norma Shearer invited him to the Mocambo. He enjoyed Miss Shearer's company but candidly objects to night clubs. He says, "I do not see how people can have pleasure drinking merely for the sake of drinking."

Finally, one evening he ran into Spencer Tracy, whom he had known slightly in Europe. When they met, they embraced heartily and spent the evening in conversation.

"But how did you converse?" we asked Gabin. "You don't speak English. Tracy doesn't speak French."

"Friendship needs no language," replied Gabin softly.

The following day he received a case of champagne from Tracy.

While on the subject, we reminded the invading Great Lover that here in America fans who had seen his foreign-made films called him the Spencer Tracy of France.

Gabin smiled at this. "It is a compliment. . . . But it will amuse you to know that in my native France my people have long called Spencer Tracy the Jean Gabin of America!"

The most frequent question asked by American damsels revolves about his repute as a Casanova. Women have heard the single line spoken about him as Pepe by a French character actor. "When he dies, 3,000 widows will mourn for him." Women have never doubted this but have wondered why members of their sex have raved so about Gabin.

The answer may lie somewhere in his life or in his personality.

GABIN was born in Paris on May 17, 1904. He was named Jean Moncorge. His father was a top-notch stage comedian, and when he wanted Jean to become a comedian, too, the youngster ran away from home. He came back eventually and went to school for a while, but was thrown out because he was a poor student. Then Gabin became a cement mixer; later a prize-fighter. Finally blood began to tell, and he turned to acting. He started as a song and dance man, and to this day can whirl off a mean soft shoe routine. Then he did an unusual thing. Worked in motion pictures by day and in stage plays by night. The youngest of seven children in his family, he soon became the family supporter and the movie idol of the Old World.

When he was twenty-seven, he married. Her name was Doryanne. She was a gorgeous Parisian music hall songstress. They remained man and wife for eight solid years—but last year, for reasons undisclosed, they were divorced. Few persons know about this chapter in Gabin's life. Not that he ever kept it a secret. It's just that no one ever bothered to ask him.

In Paris he was always seen with a different woman. For a while this big-shouldered brooding blond went everywhere with Michele Morgan, now at RKO. Then he was seen with cute Simone Simon. In fact, it is said his dates often caused feuds. There are those who claim he had a good-natured feud with Jean Renoir, the French director now also working at Twentieth. In Paris some years ago, Renoir, while directing Simone Simon, wanted to date her—but Gabin beat him to it. There are those who hope the friendly rivalry is carried over among Hollywood's glamour gals. It would make good copy.

Gabin's most terrifying experience came just before he left his country. Owner of two cars in Europe, a Buick and a Chrysler, he was piloting the latter through the countryside for a relaxing drive, when suddenly out of the clouds a German stuka dive-bomber emerged and began zooming down toward him. "I slammed my car to a stop," Gabin recalled, "jumped out very fast, ran into the meadow and threw myself on my belly." The Nazi plane machine-gunned the car, and then planted a bomb on it, exploding the machine to bits and almost burying Gabin alive.

Today this headstrong foreigner, who once starved for two years rather than make a story he didn't like, faces one worry in Hollywood. He put it this way, "I wonder if the Will Hays office will permit me to act my usual rugged, virile roles. I don't want to be a pretty, polite young man!"

When we interviewed Gabin, we inquired about his own cinema tastes. He always was a great fan, seeing every American picture that came to Paris. He said he liked above all others Spencer Tracy, Clark Gable, Tyrone Power and Gary Cooper. It is interesting to note that all his choices are hair-on-the-chest gentlemen. He remarked that his two favorite actresses were Bette Davis and Margaret Sullavan. "I hope some day I am cast opposite one of them," he said.

He told us he enjoyed wearing turtle-neck sweaters. In Paris they were his trademark, just as Chaplin's baggy suit and cane and big shoes have been his particular trademark. "But here I seldom wear my turtle-neck sweaters," he confessed sadly. "I am afraid people will think I have gone Hollywood!"

Addicted to sleeping naked, to going on long hunting and fishing trips, to climbing mountains like the Alpine crags and peaks, he will do nothing important on Wednesday of any week. "Wednesday is my unlucky day," he explained.

Gabin has long been known as an epicure. A hearty but choosey eater, he has what the French uniquely call—"a discriminating fork." At home Gabin avoided night clubs but visited restaurants for choice dishes. One popular Paris restaurant named a steak after him. This steak, served very rare but seared on both sides, was labeled—"Steak au bleu Jean Gabin." He found his first meals in Hollywood a trial. He went to a café and almost fainted with dismay when they served him coffee instead of wine with his fish!

At present Gabin's desires are twofold. To obtain peace and rest. And to make excellent motion pictures. He wishes to avoid romance—for the time being. He made this one confession, "American women, they are beautiful. But I do not wish a Lady Eve to tempt me yet!"

He told us he had absolutely no further desire to travel. He had seen much and now he wanted to settle down.

"Hollywood is a fine place in which to settle down," the great Gabin admitted. "But, between us—" and then wistfully —"In my France, I was so happy. Some day maybe the world will change. And my France will breathe. And I, Jean Gabin, will return to my fields and hills and men and women. That will be—how do you say?—ah, the happy ending!"

CLOSE-UP OF PAULETTE

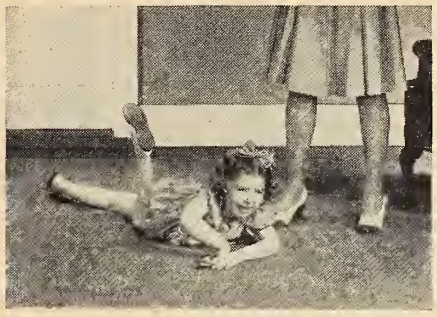
trick which is yours for the taking. At night she mascaras only her upper lashes and draws a white instead of a black pencil line along the lower lid. She says it makes the eyes look larger.

She's active outdoors, walks on the beach, swims, golfs and plays tennis. She loves sports for their own sake and as the ideal outlet for her energy. At tennis she's as good as her partners. How good that is may be judged by the fact that she plays regularly with Jinx Falkenberg and her mother. Doubling with Mrs. Falkenberg at a recent tournament, she walked off with the prize—a set of silver bread and butter dishes. She's also won some cups. Jinx Falkenberg and Mrs. David Selznick are her closest friends.

Her house is a tasteful combination of simplicity and color. She feels what amounts to a phobia about gadgets, whatnots and dust-catchers. The purely ornamental irritates her. It's got to be combined with the practical or out it goes. She loathes clutter and never collects anything. Her instinct, indeed, is to get rid of all but the necessaries—"only," she says with her impish grin, "they've got to be nice, rich necessaries." The dresser and table-tops in her white and yellow bedroom are bare of geegaws, the "nice, rich necessaries" laid away in drawers. She has a fancy for slipper flower-holders. There's something about the combination of natural floral beauty with the artificial elegance of a well-turned heel which tickles her.

THE household is run by Juanita and Gene, who have been with her six years—an eternity in Hollywood and a tribute to Paulette as employer. According to her, the secret of a successful establishment lies in choosing the right people to work for you.

She used to plan the meals and order the food. Now that she's engrossed in her work at the studio, she turns even that branch over to them unless she has a special guest. For herself, she's easily pleased. Her taste in foods is catholic. She laughs when people shudder over the revelation that she learned to enjoy snails in France and eels in Japan. She looks back on her trip to the Orient as on a rich treasure and would like to live for a long while in Singapore, but not now. No matter how many descriptions you hear and read of the place, the reality, she says, is fifty thousand times stranger and more exciting.



Juanita cooks, Gene major-domos and doubles in brass. Sometimes he drives her to and from the studio, more often she drives herself. She owns a black Rolls-Royce and a station wagon, and gets a bigger kick out of the station wagon than the Rolls. Jennie, her personal maid, used to go to the studio with her. What with hairdressers, make-up men and wardrobe girls provided by the bosses, Jennie found she had nothing to do but make coffee for the crew. So Paulette orders the coffee from the commissary and lets Jennie stay home.

She likes to entertain a group of twenty or so at tennis and tea, but when she gives dinner parties, her guests number no more than eight. After dinner they may see a picture, play games—one-minute speeches, for instance—or just talk. Or Paulette may take her guests to Venice to ride the roller-coasters. On such occasions she's simply a sports-spectator, because she can't see the point of suffering for no good reason at all."

"I'm not a bad girl! You're a bad mommy!"

1. "You're a bad mommy!" I could hardly believe my ears! Was this my little girl talking to me! Why, I tried so hard to be a good and wise mother. But here was my little Mary looking at me as if she hated me!

2. It all started when Mary needed a laxative. She hates it, and this time she simply refused to take it. I tried to force it down her and she sputtered it all over the carpet. So I slapped her and said she was a bad girl. Then came the tantrum!

3. Well, I'd seen those laxative tantrums before, but this time it upset me more than ever. I was moping on the porch when I saw the school nurse passing by. So I called to her and asked her advice. (She knows so much about children.)

4. "All mothers should think more about the laxative they give their children," the nurse said. "Forcing a child to take a bad-tasting laxative can shock her delicate nervous system. And it's so unnecessary. Why don't you try Fletcher's Castoria?"

5. "Mary will love the taste of Fletcher's Castoria. And you can be sure it's thorough—but always mild and safe. It's made especially for children and there isn't a single harsh drug in it. I'm positive it will solve your problem."

6. Well, I got a bottle of Fletcher's Castoria and made the big test. Mary took a spoonful and loved it! She hugged me and said I was the best mommy in the world! Fletcher's Castoria has solved Mary's laxative problem ever since!

Chief ingredient of Fletcher's Castoria is senna.

Medical literature says: (1) In most cases, senna does not disturb the appetite and digestion or cause nausea . . . (2) Senna works primarily in the lower bowel . . . (3) In regulated dosages it produces easy elimination and has little tendency to cause irritation or constipation after use.

Senna is especially processed in Fletcher's Castoria to eliminate griping and thus allow gentle laxative action.

Why I switched to Meds

—by a dancer

Like lots of girls who are plenty active, I'm keen about internal sanitary protection and I'm always on the lookout for any improvements. So the minute I heard Modess had brought out Meds —a new and improved tampon—I got some quick. And am I glad! Meds give me wonderful protection for they're the only tampons with the "Safety Center." As for comfort, I hardly know I'm wearing Meds. And imagine! Meds cost only 20¢ a box of ten—they're the only tampons in individual applicators that cost so little!

Violence in any form terrifies her. She turns tense with fear at the sight or sound of fire-engines, which seem to her insane. She used to love newsreels. Now with doom and destruction rampant, you couldn't drag her through the doors of a newsreel theatre. Nothing else scares her —except radio appearances. Her first with Bob Hope was a blackout. She wasn't there. They told her she was, but she knows better. Bob had to nudge her to wait for laughs. All she remembers are the nudges.

The Chaplin boys dote on her, and she returns the compliment. They arrive for the holidays, and their idea of a pleasant day is one spent with Paulette at no matter what. Whether she runs them ragged or they her remains a toss-up, but there are no complaints from either side and never a dull moment. Charlie, fourteen, is sensitive, thoughtful, a passionate music-lover. Thirteen-year-old Sidney's a roisterer and scamp with a gift for mimicry which he uses impartially on such notables as Louella Parsons, President Roosevelt and his father.

While under exclusive contract to the Chaplin studios, Paulette found more time and energy on her hands than were consumed by social, domestic and professional chores. Enrolling at UCLA, she attended classes for two and a half years in psychology, English literature, history, rhetoric—not to acquire a synthetic culture but to satisfy an inquiring mind. For the rest, she's self-educated and has done a better job than many professional teachers do. When H. G. Wells was in Hollywood, he spent as much time as he could with Paulette. Mr. Wells isn't one to waste himself on lamebrains.

She keeps several books going at a time to suit varying moods, prefers travel and biography to fiction, and doesn't mind lending her books, though when lending them, she makes it a point to say with a certain wistfulness: "I love this book." If the hint isn't taken and the book fails to come back, she remains philosophical and just replaces it.

Unlike Chaplin, she's not satisfied to make a picture every five years, and when her contract with him ran out, she signed with Paramount, binding herself at the same time to do one picture a year for Charlie when, as and if he needed her. She's been working steadily for a year now and asks nothing better than to go on working. Her driving ambition is to be a good actress, so she's hurling herself at the job with characteristic intensity. Among her screen colleagues, she feels the greatest admiration for Vivien Leigh, but if she has an idol, it's Miss Fontanne of the stage. "She sums it all up," says Paulette.

She knits between scenes to relax her nerves, which need relaxation. Determined to reach the top, she's aware that a pretty face and a radiant personality won't suffice to get her there. As the woman of Boyer's past in "Hold Back the Dawn," she's copped a part with dramatic meat on its bones and is making the most of it. Her scenes aren't the kind through which she can walk and emerge with a smile. She comes out exhausted.

Woman of the world though she is, she can act like a child. A cocoon in her portable dressing-room gave birth one day to a brown and yellow butterfly. Paulette was enchanted. She ordered sugared water and a daily bowl of fresh gardenias for the visitor. She succeeded in coaxing it to light on her hand and wrist—a very pretty sight. When the company moved to another set, she left instructions for the butterfly's care and comfort. But one morning the butterfly was gone. She's not sure whether it appealed most to her aesthetic, dramatic or maternal instinct.

There was also the star system. Anything that can be put off, she's inclined to put off—either because she's tired or simply in self-compensation. To cajole her into being a good girl, the assistant director on "Hold Back the Dawn" reached back to his school days—and hers. She got a blue star when she came in early. She got a red star when she kept a date without postponing it three times. At the end of the week, a given number of red and blue stars earned her a gold star. Paulette took it big. She sweated for her rewards. She dragged visitors in to show them her star-spangled dressing-room.

Director of the picture, Mitch Leisen, not given to overstatement, says that when "Hold Back the Dawn" is released, Paulette will be hailed as a goldstar actress.

THIS THING CALLED LOVE

listened to the new records George had brought over.

Then unexpectedly, George sailed for Honolulu.

"A fine romance," said the Town Criers. But George's few close friends took the opposite view. "He's going away to find out if 'Red's' as all-important to him as he thinks now," they said.

They knew what they were talking about apparently. For when George returned he moved into his house at Toluca Lake, just around the corner from Ann. And they were together constantly.

Newspapers and magazines, deciding this was a bona fide romance, sent reporters to see them.

"We have fun together," they told their interviewers. "We have lots of laughs." All of which undoubtedly was the truth but not the whole truth. For neither Ann nor George, alike in many ways, are the kind to talk about anything that's really important to them.

Early on the morning of February twenty-first, Ann's birthday, her phone rang. To her surprise it was George. She hadn't expected to see him or hear from him until dinner-time. Faced with a heavy day's shooting at the studio, he had given her her present—a gold lipstick with an amethyst clasp to complement a compact he had given her at Christmas—the night before as her clock had struck twelve and her birthday, technically, had begun.

"Be a pal," he said, "and see if I left my pipe over there. It may have slipped under the cushion of that big chair by the fireplace. I may have left it on the table in the hall . . . Or it's just possible I dropped it in the closet as I was getting into my pocket."

"Okay," Ann said, "I'll call you back the minute I finish my Grand Tour."

She looked everywhere he had specified, and everywhere she looked she found another present. They weren't all from George. He had arranged for her friends to contribute their gifts to this treasure hunt, too.

At last, flushed and breathless and near tears, she sank into a chair.

"He knew I was beginning to get restless because I haven't been working," she said softly to Gwen. (Her birthday came during the time she was suspended from the studio.) "He knew on a sentimental day like this I'd be likely to take everything harder. Not to mention the rainy season outdoing itself."

As if her words were a cue, Gwen went to the closet for an umbrella. "I've been asked to guide you to the garage, too," she said.

The rain lashed about them. They had difficulty with the garage doors but finally got them open. And Ann beheld a special body Cadillac tied with enormous red satin bows.

"Just a little extra present," Ann said, trying to be funny so she wouldn't cry.

That Cadillac stopped the most cynical cynics. Which, among other things, was probably what George intended. For although he's long been rated one of the most charming gentlemen in the film colony, he's never been one to make headlines by courting girls with star sapphires the size of duck's eggs or anything of the kind.

There's a café in Hollywood where it's always twilight. "Don, the Beachcomber's," it's called. The most desirable table stands in a little bamboo hut situated and lighted so those who occupy it see all and know all but remain practically invisible. They call it "Brent's Hut" now, for he and Ann dine there frequently.

ONE night not long ago, Ann and George were having supper in the hut. All day George had been working on his sloop "South Wind." And Ann, inspired by a new interest in the sea and ships, wore dark blue slacks and a blouse that, sailor fashion, had white braid and stars on a square collar.

"I figure," said George, talking about the Fourth of July Honolulu race which he's entered, "that I'll have a fine chance with 'South Wind.'"

"Don't be crazy," Ann told him, laughing. "I can swim faster than you can make it in that boat."

"Red," he said, "be serious for a minute . . . What are you going to do while I'm away. After all the Fourth is a holiday."

"Don't you worry about me," she said. "I'll be scared I suppose—but there'll be lots to see . . ."

"Do you feel all right?" he asked, puzzled.

"I'll be scared, but there'll be lots to see if I take the Clipper," she explained. Suddenly she was shy—strange business for Sheridan. "You see, I thought maybe if I can get away, I'd fly over . . . be at the pier to hold back all those pretty brown girls when you come in the winner!"

"You're something!" George said softly. "You really are!"

They've come a long way, the Dublin adventurer who played his reckless part in the Irish Rebellion and the girl from the Texas range who thought she was going to be a school-teacher. And it hasn't been an easy way, for the most part, for either of them. But now that it's brought them together there's no doubting it was all worth while.

the circus. Later he graduated to burlesque. He listened to corny gags from the stage, watched beautiful girls in a state of undress and took in money at the box office. It was on a job like this that he met Lou Costello, became Costello's foil and turned into a comedian.

As for Louis Cristello, who is now Lou Costello, he was born a natural laugh-winner. As a youngster in school he shot paper wads drenched in ink at little freckled girls. You know the type. As a youngster, still, he once saw a one-reeler called "The Skating Rink," which starred Charlie Chaplin. He saw it again and again and learned that much humor springs from being in trouble and getting out of it. At the age of fourteen he pulled his first gag. His brother had an orchestra. Lou handled the baggage. Once he sent the instrument cases to the next scheduled stop—but without the instruments. It was very funny, but not to his brother. Costello was fired. He told the gag to a theatre manager, and the manager laughed so hard he put Costello on a stage to tell it to audiences.

TOGETHER the duo went up the hard way. Their first break was a big one. It lifted them from the cheap one night stands to the bright lights. For information on that first break, I sought out John Grant, their middle-aged gagman.

"We had all been actors together. I produced and wrote the sketches Abbott and Costello did for vaudeville. Then I left them for a spell. I was in Toronto. Had a swell job. One night the phone rang. It was Abbott and Costello calling from New York. They had a chance to appear on the renowned Kate Smith hour. They wanted me to come to New York immediately and write their gags. I didn't believe them at first. It was hard to realize they'd gotten their big chance. But when I learned it was true, I gave up my job and decided to gamble with the boys. In fact my wife even went to a numerologist, who described me, described Abbott and Costello and predicted the combination of the three of us would be very successful. Well, I did the script and they went on the Kate Smith hour. They went over big and continued on the show. Finally they were spotted by the Schubert brothers . . ."

The Schubert brothers and their partner, Harry Kaufman, top-notch musical comedy producers, wanted Abbott and Costello to inject a dose of mirth in a new musical called "The Streets of Paris." This, incidentally, was the show that spun unknown Carmen Miranda into fame.

Abbott and Costello were doing well on radio, and they were afraid to switch to Broadway, afraid the musical might be a flop. So the two of them schemed and planned and determined to ease out of signing with the Schuberts by presenting an endless series of demands.

They kept their appointment with Harry Kaufman and were handed a contract. They said they couldn't sign. Abbott demanded a $1,000 raise. It was promptly okayed. He demanded equal billing with the popular Bobby Clark. It was immediately granted. He insisted on an unheard-of non-optional clause. It was agreed upon. Nothing seemed to work. Finally Abbott gave his pudgy partner the cue. As prearranged Costello was to jump up and relate that they owned property in Hollywood and had 919 COLLEGE STUDENTS QUIZZED!

3 out of 5 prefer the flavor of Beech-Nut Gum

567 out of 919 College Students prefer the delicious flavor of Beech-Nut Gum. This is what an independent fact-finding organization found in a recent test with 919 college students throughout the country.

For the test, various brands of peppermint chewing gum were bought in local stores and identifying wrappers were removed. Students were given two different brands (Beech-Nut and one other, both unidentified) and were asked to report which stick they preferred. 3 out of 5 students said they preferred the flavor of Beech-Nut to that of the other brands.

Enjoy this popular, long-lasting peppermint flavor yourself. Get some Beech-Nut Gum in the yellow package.

to go West and attend to it. Costello jumped to his feet. He said, "One minute, Mr. Kaufman. I haven't had a chance to say a word, and I have an important demand." He hesitated a moment and then burst out, "Yes, darnit, we'll sign on one condition—that we get front row tickets for 'Hellzapoppin' tonight!" He thought that was impossible. But the demand was fulfilled, and Abbott and Costello opened on Broadway and were tremendous!

The next stop was Hollywood.

The first picture was just so-so. But they weren't discouraged. Bud Abbott confessed, "Listen, the first time I saw us on the screen, you know what I did? I laughed like hell! Yes sir! I watched a routine we'd been doing for a decade and I laughed, I thought we were so funny. You see, we'd always been playing in the routine, but this was the first chance I'd ever had to see it!"

Early this year the boys were thrown into another movie. And here, folks, is where Horatio Alger takes over. It was to cost only $250,000, which is about half of what any decent motion picture must cost. It possessed no names and no big-shots. It was a throw-away along with Bank Night and sets of dishes. It was called "Buck Privates," and in it Abbott and Costello were to characterize a couple of misfit draftees.

The gags were corny. The type of thing where the top-sergeant barks at Private Costello, "Throw out your chest!"—and Costello answers, "I refuse. I'm not through with it yet!"

Without publicity, without ballyhoo, it became one of those Hollywood miracles that make articles like this possible. It swept the nation. In some big cities it was held over for five weeks. In others it made more than "Gone With The Wind." Universal ran out of prints. And the net profit at last reports was better than one million dollars!

Abbott and Costello were—presto!—immortal! They were signed for the navy epic. They were given a big budget, a bigger cast, and Deanna Durbin's crack cameraman, Joe Valentine. They were, to indulge in understatement, on top!

MANY astute persons and expensive experts have tried to figure out the reasons for the sudden meteoric climb of Abbott and Costello. Well, pudgy Lou Costello has an explanation for it.

"Bud and I always read the funny papers, but we kept it a secret because we didn't want adults to think us morons. Soon we learned that Mutt and Jeff and other comic strips dealing with teams were popular beyond imagination. So we wondered why the two of us couldn't just become animated comic strips ourselves. Abbott could be the straight man, the wise guy, while I could be the butt of most of his jokes, turning the tables on him often enough to keep the customers amused.

"Now of course we know that we do low and corny comedy, but apparently that's exactly what the public wants today, judging from the millions who follow the funny papers day by day. We figure one hundred million Americans can't be wrong, so as long as we keep up the wise guy and sap combination, we keep going ahead."

However, today in midst of the universal hoorah, Abbott and Costello have managed to hold onto their heads.

"We're saving our money," they told me in chorus. "We have something now that hits the public fancy. We may last two years, three or even longer at our present high peak. But the reaction is certain to come one of these days, and when it does, brother, we'll be ready for it with plenty of cash on hand."

Rotund, 200-pound Lou Costello, a black-haired dynamo, is happily married and the father of two cute girls, Pat, four years old, and Carol, two and a half. Incidentally, it might be worth telling how he met his wife. About ten years ago while he and Bud Abbott were playing in Washington, D. C., the two of them ran into two attractive girls backstage. The girls were members of the troupe, and they were arguing bitterly. "They argued just the way Bud and I did," recalled Costello, "so we decided that we had a lot in common with them and immediately invited them across the street for a conciliatory hamburger with onions. I married one. Abbott the other. Believe it or not, they've never fought since!"

COSTELLO, always a half hour early for work, leaves the studio as soon as possible to toil in his backyard where he is constructing a huge toy home filled with gadgets for his two girls. His greatest outside interests are prize-fighting and baseball. He's a New York Yankee rooter and a great pal of Joe DiMaggio. They say when DiMaggio is in a hitting slump, Costello gets the blues and actually begins losing weight!

The one extra thing I wanted to know about Costello was how he ever invented his favorite expression—"I'm a ba-a-ad boy!" It began, I learned, when Lou Costello was a kid attending Public School No. 11 in Paterson, New Jersey. One afternoon he misbehaved in school, and his teacher, Mrs. Whitehead, ordered him to write, "I'm a bad boy!" on the blackboard 500 times and recite it aloud each time he wrote it. He never got over that. He has used the expression ever since. Today it's even embroidered on his bedroom rug!

The quieter and slicker member of the duo, Bud Abbott, is forty-one years old and is five feet eleven inches tall. His favorite comedian is Lou Costello. His second choice is somebody named W. C. Fields. He doesn't care especially for music, reads only magazines that might give him ideas for humor routines, and loves boats (having just purchased a twenty-five-foot de luxe model cabin cruiser).

Abbott's great passion concerns Hoyle. He enjoys, more than any other diversion, a game of cards. On the set he plays draw poker at five dollars a game—the other day he won forty dollars from Dick Powell—or will play rummy for matches.

To keep himself and his wife company Abbott has three fox terriers. To amuse guests he buys hundreds of goofy machines and mechanical gags. He is considered by John Grant to be the greatest straight man in the business. Despite that, he is no prima donna and is always ready to go out of his way to help a friend.

And there, friends, you have the daffy duo.

With the release of their new navy film and with the completion of their third movie which revolves about a haunted tavern, it would seem Bud Abbott and Lou Costello have everything. They have their own dressing rooms. They have a spot on the Charlie McCarthy-Edgar Bergen radio show. They have just been made honorary Colonels by Governor Heil of Wisconsin. Yes, the world is theirs. Every ambition fulfilled, except one.

"It's nothing much," sighed Lou Costello. "It's just that neither of us will ever be satisfied with our artistry until we've played in just one picture with a sweet tomato like that Greta Garbo!"

and wherever skin touches skin. One of these should be used every day of the year—winter, summer, spring or fall—and they're especially important when you're going out on extra-special dates. If you are the least bit doubtful of your complete daintiness, always use an anti-perspirant on these warm summer days and evenings. You can't be too particular about these big-little points of good grooming.

Don't forget your depilatory, either. A girl can't look lovely with superfluous hair on upper lip, underarms or on her legs. Keep one of the new, safe, easy-to-use depilatories always handy so that you'll at all times look clean and freshly feminine.

By this time, your drooping spirits should be completely revived and you undoubtedly feel as sweet and clean as clover. All this probably consumed fifteen to twenty minutes, but it was time well spent and you're now ready for the second half of your ritual. If your face skin is dry, apply a bit of rich lubricating cream before you apply new polish to your nails. But it's a complete waste of time to try to do anything else while polish is drying. You'll only complicate matters. So the best thing is to steal the next five minutes to lie down with feet and hips elevated above the level of your head and just utterly and completely relax. This will reward you richly in relaxed nerves and facial muscles, sparkling eyes and also an alert mind. The rush of blood from feet to head in this position does important things to clear both your mind and rest your body.

About ten minutes remain, but that's time enough for the finishing touches. Sit down comfortably in front of a well-lighted mirror; do a facial once-over with a bit of cotton soaked in skin freshener; pat dry and then apply your favorite foundation—cream, stick or liquid form.

One of those excellent, skin-matching make-up foundations will be perfect. Spread it smoothly over face, neck, arms and all skin that shows above the dress you're going to wear. In fact, be sure that your foundation make-up extends below the neckline all around so that you don't look as if you have two kinds of skin, instead of one lovely continuous skin line. Rouge for evening can be brighter and more dashing than that used for daytime wear. A generous quantity, if carefully blended around the edges, will make you look radiantly alive and vital. Powder lightly over rouge to give it that soft, glowing-from-underneath appearance so charmingly natural looking.

Lipstick should match your rouge, and both should of course harmonize with your nail polish. Evening is the time for soft, full lips, too, so round out straight, too narrow curves with a bit of artistry.

Eye shadow, to be most exciting, should repeat and accent the color of your eyes by evening. Shaded off carefully toward the brow and toward either corner, shadow gives interest and mystery to the most ordinary eyes.

Brow pencil, applied in slightly jagged, feathered lines, to form soft curves from inside corners to cheerfully, slightly upturned outer ends is the best effect for evening. Matching mascara brushed up and outward in two or three coats, then brushed again when definitely dry, will add depth and brilliance to any eyes.

Last of all, comb your hair in the softest, most becoming lines you know, being careful to keep it natural looking and as young and shining as possible. Spray a little brilliantine on the ends of the hair or use a bit of dry shampoo, if that's what it needs, then comb it up and out to give it line and body.

You've just time enough to slip into the few pieces that constitute a summer evening's wardrobe and then spray your ears, chin, neck, arms and dress with the most luscious, tantalizing perfume you've ever been able to find in a month of perfume shopping. Hankie, handbag and wrap should not be spared a fragrant spraying also. Then, on with the last sure touch—a gay flower, a bit of bright jewelry—and off you go for the kind of an evening that dreams are made of.

Before we close, let's summarize the details that made this forty-minute pick-up a complete success.

Your humble but so important soap, your toilet water, your curlers, depilatory, deodorant, anti-perspirant and your make-up, to say nothing of brilliantine, dry shampoo and perfume were all in good working order and placed where you could find them quickly. Your lingerie—the few pieces you needed—were clean and fresh and dainty. You had ensembled your wardrobe, not expensively, but with completeness in your well-organized mind. And when the opportunity came, you were ready. Isn't that the story of successes in any language, whether it's grooming for special occasions or grooming for everyday daintiness and feminine loveliness? You've got to have a design for daintiness, and here you have it in outline. Whether for evening or daytime, the essential ritual remains unchanged. There's no key to glamour more certain than the infallible appeal of constant good grooming.

Do you have an unexpected date? You'll look fresh as a daisy for it if you treat yourself to an active lather facial with Lux Toilet Soap. Here's how you do it. First, pat Lux's luxuriant lather on your skin. Then rinse with warm water and a dash of cool. After you dry your face, it will feel much cooler and softer and will look far more radiant and refreshed.

Try to find time, too, for a lathery beauty bath with the same soap. It will not only renew your pep, but will insure daintiness and freshness from top to toe. Buy a cake of Lux Toilet Soap now at your local syndicate store.

Some of your best allies in making-up are Kleenex Tissues. These handy cleansing tissues are absorbent and soft. They're just what you need for removing old or excess cosmetics, and for blending new make-up. Being very inexpensive, they're intended to be thrown away after use, so it's no longer necessary to clutter your dressing-table with a greasy, stained cloth for cosmetic removal. Buy a box today. They're compactly packaged for neatness.

How's your summer complexion? Is it a popular sun tone? If not, you can follow the lead of other clever lovelies and achieve an outdoor look with one of Max Factor's three shades of tan Pan-Cake Make-Up. Or you can combine two or more to get just the shade you desire. Tan-Rose, one of the newest tones, is a flattering sun-tan with a slight rose glow.

Max Factor Hollywood Pan-Cake Make-Up goes on easily and lasts for hours without repowdering. It not only gives your face a natural velvety finish, but it helps conceal minor complexion faults. Why not pep up your make-up?

STEP LOVELY

along the way they gradually got into trouble. A foot, you see, is a remarkable piece of mechanism, small and compact enough to be beautiful—when properly taken care of—yet strong enough to support your entire weight whether at ease or in motion. There are, in one foot, twenty-six bones which form an arch to allow for spring and resilience. This arch acts as a lever to raise your weight off the ground and is held in place by a combination of muscles and tendons.

You can imagine the marvelous elasticity and strength that feet must have to enable you to walk gracefully—to say nothing of running, jumping, skating and dancing! Gifts of nature so lavish and complicated certainly deserve more than just casual care. And since a healthy foot is also a beautiful foot, you get double value for every minute you spend on caring for yours.

A first step to foot beauty is a thorough, daily bath. Air and water are very important to skin all over your body, and after hours of close confinement in shoes and stockings, feet need plenty of both. Use a good, sudsy soap and soak your feet for at least five minutes. If they are unusually tired or perspire too freely, alternate hot and cold water several times. This not only refreshes and stimulates but also strengthens. Foot salts dissolved in the water will help relieve a burning or blistered condition which often accompanies excessive perspiration. Dry your feet with a turkish towel and dust on soothing foot powder.

Massage is also excellent to relieve overworked feet and give them a new lease on life. Three or four minutes of brisk, deep rubbing on soles and sides is wonderful for relaxing tired nerves and muscles. Massaging well under the arches, over the toes, back over the arches and across the toes again is another foot relaxer.

PAGING MR. JONES!

Many husbands stay away from home because of that may destroy romance . . . "LYSOL" helps prevent this risk!

"ONE NEGLECT"

YOU'VE seen it happen time after time. A beautiful wife—with all the qualities you'd think would hold a husband enthralled forever. And yet, her loveliness, and her talents as a home-maker and mother are not enough to keep her husband's interest from straying. (Why doesn't someone tell her about "Lysol" for feminine hygiene?)

Don't be too quick to blame the husband when love turns to indifference. Often the wife is guilty of neglect of herself. Carelessness about intimate, personal cleanliness spoils many an otherwise happy marriage.

More women should use "Lysol" for feminine hygiene . . . as so many thousands of intelligent, modern women do. Probably no other product is so widely used for feminine hygiene because:

1. Non-Caustic . . . "Lysol", in proper dilution, is gentle, efficient; contains no free caustic alkali. 2. Effectiveness . . . "Lysol" is a powerful germicide, active under practical conditions; effective in the presence of organic matter (dirt, mucus, serum, etc.). 3. Spreading . . . "Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension; virtually search out germs. 4. Economy . . . Small bottle of "Lysol" makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. 5. Odor . . . The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears after use. 6. Stability . . . "Lysol" keeps its full strength no matter how long it is kept, or how often it might be left uncorked.

A REALLY EFFECTIVE DEODORANT!

and such defects mar the comfort as well as the beauty of feet. Corns are caused by friction and pressure from ill-fitting shoes. A corn has no roots but is a conical mass of hard, dead skin, many layers deep. A mildly medicated corn plaster, applied immediately after your bath, will relieve pressure and at the same time soften and loosen the corn so that it may be removed safely with a clean, blunt instrument. Never cut a corn—you're courting a very serious infection if you do. After removing a corn, sterilize the spot with a bit of alcohol.

Soft corns between the toes are caused by excessive moisture and shoes that are too narrow. Keep your feet as clean and dry as possible. Sprinkle a good foot powder between your toes, too, after every washing and before putting on stockings. Never use a liquid or ointment on soft corns. And be sure to wear shoes that won't crowd your toes.

Callouses are caused by the wrong distribution of weight on your feet. The mild ones may be peeled off following the use of a medicated pad, but deep, tough ones often need to be treated by a reliable chiropodist.

Blisters should be kept immaculately clean and protected from friction. A double layer of gauze applied with adhesive or an especially made sterile pad should be used. Collodion is also safe. You know, don't you, that you should never put adhesive tape directly over any open cut, blister or abrasion? Unless these have air they cannot heal and may become even seriously infected. Special care is necessary for even the slightest skin break on feet because of perspiration mixing with shoe and hosiery dyes.

Ingrown toe nails can also be extremely painful. They are caused by badly shaped shoe toes and by nails cut the wrong shape. Toe nails should be cut straight across and left long enough to protect against shoe pressure.

If you ever pick up a case of athlete's foot—as you easily can at swimming pools, gymnasiums, etc.—keep your feet as dry as possible and use one of the healing lotions or powders made to relieve this highly infectious condition. Check athlete's foot just as soon as possible because it has an insidious way of spreading. It is not only painful and disfiguring, but extremely persistent.

Did you ever give yourself a pedicure? No? Then your feet have a real treat in store, for nothing makes them feel so luxuriously pampered as a good pedicure.

Begin by soaking feet in alternating hot and cold water, using a special foot soap or foot salts. After a few minutes of this, hold your feet right up under a strong stream of running water as cold as you can stand and allow the full force of it to flow against the soles, sides, tops and arches. This will stimulate and refresh as it strengthens your feet. Dry thoroughly, especially between the toes with a clean turkish towel.

Now, rotate your ankles, wriggle your toes vigorously and massage your feet with a soothing cream or foot balm. Stroke firmly, deeply and briskly right down the length of the sole, over and under the toes and arches and around the sides, too.

Cut or file your toenails straight across. Treat the cuticle as you would on your fingers, pushing it back gently with an orange stick dipped in oil. Avoid cutting toe cuticle unless absolutely necessary. Then, don't cut too close.

In summer when feet are exposed on beaches and in sandals for both day and evening, it is especially important to keep toenails neatly polished in a shade to match your current manicure. Nail white under the tips makes a nice finish. You no doubt know the trick of holding toes apart with wads of cotton to keep them from touching while polish is drying. Finish off with a good, special foot powder, and you'll feel like a new woman.

How much do you exercise your feet? We're not talking about standing or even walking in tight, high-heeled shoes. Foot exercises should be taken with shoes and stockings off, so that toes and shackled muscles can stretch, and air can get to those too-sheltered tootsies of yours. Try walking around on tiptoes a few minutes every night and morning. This will give both grace and strength to feet and arches. In your bare feet, rise up on your toes, then drop down slowly.

Wriggling your toes and rotating your ankles strengthens and also reduces the legs. Place an old book or thick telephone directory on the floor, put your bare toes on the edge, your heels on the floor and practice rising on your toes until you're tired. This will strengthen both leg and foot muscles. Pick up a marble between your bare toes and, holding it there, walk across the floor. This makes for foot grace and flexibility.

And how do you walk? Do you swing your legs rhythmically from the hips, coming down briefly on the balls of your feet before touching the ground with your heels? That's the way all graceful people do it. Keep your feet parallel, toes straight ahead and strive for smooth, flowing motions. Take a lesson from your pet pussy cat—watch him walk if you'd really learn grace with a capital "G." He's a past master at it. Your favorite movie stars can teach you how to walk, too. One of their first Hollywood lessons was learning how to use their feet gracefully. Watch especially the dancers—Betty Grable, Ginger Rogers, June Preisser, Eleanor Powell and all the rest. Skaters are another lot of rhythmic walkers. In fact you could name any well-known movie star, and her walking would be well worth watching.

If you'll practice all the little attentions that spell the difference between neglected and well-cared-for feet, you'll step lovely right into the kind of beauty that shows in your face and carriage as well as in your precious tootsies.

Will your legs do you proud in your shorts or bathing suit this summer, or when you go hoseless? They may be as shapely as Betty Grable's but they'll never win such admiration unless you keep them as well-groomed as your hands or your face. Don't let an unattractive growth of hair detract from their appearance, especially when it's so easy to use Imra, an odorless cream depilatory that spreads easily and removes hair quickly and painlessly. It leaves your legs as hair-free and soft as a baby's skin. The process takes only from 6 to 12 minutes—a very little time to spend now and then for good grooming.

When you shed those hose, don't let those shapely legs go about lily white in contrast to sun-tanned arms and face—or with minor blemishes standing out in glaring relief.

You can pour yourself a flattering pair of stockings with Miner's Liquid Make-Up and give your legs the same healthy color and smooth texture as your face. It comes in five flattering shades—ranging from delicate tones to Hawaiian, a deep sun-tan. It's as easy to apply as slipping on hose and stays on for hours. Glamourize your legs by trying Miner's Liquid Make-Up today.

Girls who inspire romantic murmurings are those whose complexions stay velvety smooth—even on sticky summer evenings.

If your powder doesn't stay put, try Pond's new beauty step—a vanishing cream mask. After your face has been thoroughly cleansed and refreshed, dip generously into Pond's Vanishing Cream and coat your face and throat thoroughly. Leave it on a minute. When you remove the cream with cleansing tissue, your skin will feel silky soft with a finish that is a perfect base for make-up. Try it and see how well your rouge blends and how much longer your face powder clings.

If gray, drab hair makes you look older than you are, let Canute Water lend a hand to help you. It's a pure, safe, colorless liquid that recolors locks similar to their natural shade. All you have to do is to wet your hair with Canute Water and allow it to dry. A few applications —all the same day, if you like—recolors hair completely. Afterwards you can curl your hair or get a permanent. There's no interference. Neither will salt water, sunshine or shampooing disturb the color. If you don't like faded locks, brighten them up.

If you want to look as if you'd stepped from a bandbox, you must step from surroundings that are bandbox-clean. Remember, good grooming begins at home, and beauty rituals can only be performed with complete satisfaction in dainty surroundings.

To insure perfect grooming, use Lysol regularly to disinfect your washbowl, bathtub, bathroom or dressing room, and be sure to keep your room and belongings scrupulously clean and orderly at all times.

Do the balls of your feet pain you, and spoil your good times? If so, you'll welcome Dr. Scholl's new Lu-Pads, little slip-on foot cushions designed to act as shock absorbers for this sensitive area. They're made of strong, light, flesh-tinted fabric and slip on easily. What's more, they don't show even when you wear pumps. Don't let your foot discomfort reflect itself in your face. Buy Lu-Pads and ease your feet and your expression.

Who is Dave Rose anyway? Asking that, you label yourself an ignoramus in the field of radio and swing. Ask Thomas S. Lee and Willet H. Brown, president and vice-president respectively of the Mutual Don Lee network. They'll tell you that every time they heard an outstanding arrangement of a song sung by Jeanette MacDonald or Don Ameche or Dorothy Lamour, they were told with monotonous regularity that said arrangement had been made by a young man named David Daniel Rose. They decided that he shouldn't be left lying around loose and snagged him as musical director for their broadcasting system. He started with "Adventures in Rhythm," the Betty Jane Rhodes program. Characteristically unpretentious is his explanation of what happened.

IT was a lucky accident. I was to come in with twenty-two pieces and was cut at the last minute to seventeen. Not knowing what to drop, I took a chance and dropped most of the brass. I knew I couldn't compete with all the fine orchestras on the air already, so the only thing left was to accent the strings which gave the band a different style. I had no theories worked out, because I'd never planned to be an orchestra leader. Do I like it?" He grinned. "I like it because the reaction's been good."

To "Adventures in Rhythm" was added "California Melodies," the Maxine Gray show, and Joan Blondell's "I Want a Divorce." Then Tony Martin was signed for the Woodbury Soap program on NBC, a rival network. For obvious reasons, networks are not too anxious to use people under contract to their competitors. Yet NBC had no choice but to hire Dave Rose, since Tony would hear of no one else. "First," said Tony, "because his arrangements are terrific. Second, because only one bandleader in five can direct a singer as well as an orchestra, and he's that one."

His radio success is built on a groundwork of solid musicianship which he thinks it's childish to talk about. "I try to keep my standards," he says, "without getting too highbrow." His friends will tell you he's written three symphonies. "I'd rather not call them symphonies," says Rose. "They're tone poems." They were all premièred by the Chicago Symphony under the baton of Roy Shield, director of NBC in Chicago. Rose has been asked to conduct one of them at the Hollywood Bowl during Music Week in June, with an orchestra of two hundred and fifty. "It'll probably never be that many," he tells you.

All of which goes to answer the question, who is Dave Rose? It's a name as highly regarded in his field as is Judy's in hers. (Have patience, kiddies. He really did talk about Judy.)

As for the publicity angle, that is indeed baloney. He's one of the few bandleaders in town who laughs at the notion of a personal press agent and doesn't take even legitimate publicity seriously, thereby causing the efficient department which looks after such things at Don Lee no little concern. He evades them when he can. Nailed down, he'll argue: "What's the use of publicity unless you deliver? If I do all right with my music, I'll get the kind of publicity we both want." Once you've got a line on the man, you realize that the notion of edging into Judy's limelight would be so distasteful to him that you're ashamed of having brought the matter up.

I for one apologize. And I wish anyone else with a lingering doubt could have seen Mr. Rose on the day he finally, reluctantly, agreed for the first time to talk to the press about Judy. He'd given a promise which weighed on him. But what weighed still more oppressively was the ordeal in store. He appeared trembling at the door of the aforementioned publicity department. "I'm scared as hell. How can I duck this?" he pleaded.

They applied soothing syrup. They told him he couldn't go with one of the most popular girls in the movies and avoid publicity. They advised him to face the barrage, he'd live through it. They were convincing, but Dave was in no mood for logic. He went to his rehearsal. He watched the clock. He hoped against hope that the press would be late, that the press might even have a little accident, nothing really serious, just enough to keep it from getting there by four-thirty, when the rehearsal would be over and Davy could run.

Instead of an accident the press had a premonition, arrived at four, planted itself between Dave and the exit and watched wild suspense flicker into resignation. I'll say this for him. Once trapped, he surrendered with courtesy and grace. He didn't like it. He was uneasy. He escaped as soon as he could. In the interval, though, he told a simple straight-forward story.

He met Judy a number of years ago when he was asked to make some arrangements for her records. She really was a child then, and their association was purely professional. But even then he was amazed by her natural grasp and appreciation of music. "She's never had any formal instruction, you know, but she seems to get by instinct what most of us have to dig for. She still bowls me over by the comments she makes. And I'd say the same if I had no personal interest in Judy."

AFTER his separation from Martha Raye they saw more of each other. A common enthusiasm for music drew them together first. Judy thirsted after knowledge. She loved to hear Dave play Rachmaninoff and Delius, still her favorite composers. Just when they fell in love is their own business. "I finally realized," says Dave, "that she was a grown-up girl with an understanding that was older than her years. Things—well, they just went along smoothly."

I asked about some of the qualities that attracted him in Judy. He answered that one promptly. "The fact that it doesn't take a night club to make her happy. Or expensive clothes. She's got 'em, of course, but she'd just as soon run around in three-dollar dresses, and for my money she looks just as well in them. I have a hard time thinking of things to give her. The girl can have anything she wants, and she seems to get the biggest kick out of some funny little gadget she can laugh at. To Judy, everything's fun. We play tennis, we swim, we bowl—you know how you fool away an afternoon. I've taught her to shoot. We take targets and guns and go out a little way in the valley. She's a lefty, you know. But she's very, very good. As good as me?" He smiled, and there was a note in his voice which every girl would like to hear in the voice of the man she loves. "No, no, she mustn't be as good as me."

The half acre backyard behind his house in the San Fernando valley is largely given over to a miniature railroad track. "Every kid wants to be an engineer," he apologizes, "and I never got over it."

At that, his train isn't so miniature. It's scaled one and a half inches to the foot, the locomotive weighs seven hundred pounds and the five freight cars, big enough to sit in, will carry ten or fifteen passengers. It's the apple of his eye, and if nothing else did, Judy's adoption of his apple would have warmed him to her.

"She doesn't think it's nonsense, as a lot of them would. She figures it's what I happen to like for a hobby, so it's okay with her. She thinks it's wonderful I can have an out. That's what I mean by understanding. We spend whole afternoons with the fool thing. She doesn't love it as much as I do, but she loves it. She'll come out and play fireman, pull on a pair of gloves, watch the steam gauge, pour the coal in. I'm the boss, she follows orders. Gets coal all over her arms and grease on her face, looks cute as a monkey. She has a hobby, too, by the way, only I'm not in on it. Spends her spare time painting, but she won't show me the stuff."

Cars are another enthusiasm of Dave's. Partly to gratify it and partly to squelch Judy, he bought an English car with a right-hand drive.

"She's an awful heckler. When you drive with Judy, it's look out, not so fast, not so slow, there's a truck coming, get over to your right. Well, this car's so low she can't see over the windshield, so I drive in peace. She's happiest, though, when she's driving. Do I heckle her?" Again that reminiscent grin. "Only in fun. I start on her the way she does on me, so she can hear what it sounds like."

Their favorite eating place is a Russian restaurant, known as Bublichki, whose specialty, Chicken à la Kiev, Dave describes with a certain reverence. "Breast of chicken, rolled up to look like a chicken leg and browned to taste like a dream. When we're very hungry and want to be good to ourselves, that's where we go and that's what we eat."

WHEN Judy's not working, they go out a couple of times a week. A late dinner after one of Dave's broadcasts, then a drive or a night club as the mood takes them. Unless it's a special occasion, they wear sports clothes. Neither likes to fuss. They don't patronize the bars. Judy doesn't drink, "and I can get along without it," says Dave. He's one of those who can't face work except on deadline, so he's often up all night on an arrangement that has to be in rehearsal at nine. "No sleep is bad enough. Liquor on top of it is worse."

They both enjoy dancing, though, according to Dave. "I do a very plain dance." Judy rumbas beautifully. He avoids the rumba. If it's unavoidable, he struggles along somehow. But he's very grateful when he can turn her over to somebody else who likes to rumba.

His good taste is further evidenced by the fact that, expert though he is, he keeps his hands meticulously off Judy's singing. "She got along fine without me. Why should I butt in?" Only when asked in his professional capacity to work with her, does he do so, then makes it his business not to tamper with her style. Otherwise they don't discuss either her work or his. "Except," he qualifies, "that I sometimes consult her about business affairs. When all these jobs started piling up on me, I got a little confused. I'd always admired the way Judy and her mother handled her career, so I turn to them both for advice. And take it!"

In a situation which has its trying aspects, Rose has acted with dignity, going his quiet way, keeping his mouth shut. If his face turns grim now and then under the sting of chatter, it doesn't stay that way. In the final analysis, only he and Judy count, and they'll make their own decision.

She's promised Metro not to marry for a year. Dave must have been a party to that promise. She's too much in love to have given a pledge he didn't subscribe to. What he said to me bears this out. "We're very close. We have no marriage plans. I'm not forcing issues."

It's not so much her marriage to Rose that the studio opposes as her marriage at all. But they gave her a grown-up part in "Little Nellie Kelly." They glamorized her in "The Ziegfeld Girl." Maybe they're preparing to meet the inevitable.

Both Judy and Dave have birthdays in June. He gave her a ruby cocktail ring. She gave him a pair of special cufflinks. ME and YOU were engraved on either side of one. The other was engraved with a bar of music and US. You can read Judy's heart in the cufflinks. After meeting Dave Rose, you really don't care how soon the ME and YOU merge into US.

Green" and so forth. She's in agony because she just knows she's lousing up everything she does—which is to say Lupino is really building up for an Academy Award!

I saw her at Warner's just the other day right after a long dramatic take in "Gentle People" that was a honey. She went through it with Tom Mitchell time and again, her eyes sparking, her little body giving it the electric works until Anatole Litvak was satisfied. But was Ida? Heavens, no! "No emotion—no strength—no feeling—nothing!" She groaned and gazed around the set with an end-it-all look.

Of course Lupino had just recovered from a session with a gang of streptococci, and when they get through with you, you aren't usually looking at the world through rose-colored glasses. But even when she's in the pink, Ida just can't keep her sunny side up when it comes to self-appraisal.

I could start on "The Sea Wolf" which is Ida's last picture, but if you even mention it, Ida rolls her eyes and says, "Oh, that! Well—I just can't bring myself to mention that. The less said the better. I was horrible, of course! I don't know how I ever did anything so bad. It will probably end my career!" And so on and on. And she means it. The last thing she has done is always strictly garbage, no matter if the rest of the world calls it wonderful. So—take "They Drive By Night."

Ida lost ten pounds on that one—and one look at her featherweight frame tells you she could never afford them. She was perfectly healthy all through the picture. She simply stewed them off. Raoul Walsh, who directed it, found himself forced to hand out fight talks like a college coach to keep Lupino in there pitching and not sobbing in black despair after every take. When it was finally over he sighed, "I've never seen an actress with so much ability who needed so much encouragement!"

IN the middle of the film Ida faced a scene in which she was to go insane. It was the most crucial scene in the show for her. Naturally then, it was also her biggest mental hurdle.

She came to Raoul Walsh one day haggard and dry-eyed and said, "Well, I just can't do it!" This was a couple of weeks before the scene was due. But Ida had been tossing and turning and tearing her hair about it ever since she first looked at the script. "I simply can't read a script calmly like any other actress," Ida confesses. "I have to act it out. By the time I'm through I'm all worn out, mixed up and scared to death!"

Anyway, Walsh poured on his persuasive powers, got Ida relatively calm and promised they'd shoot it at night when nobody was around. Just a cameraman, an electrician and himself. Which is what they did, but Ida was a wreck when it was over.

Even when "They Drive By Night" was safely on film, any mention of the picture (an instant hit) made her heart flop down to her French heels. She didn't dare attend the preview. She never saw it until weeks after it had been released when she and hubby Louis Hayward sneaked guiltily into a second run house. She worried because people said she'd reminded them of Bette Davis, whom, by the way, Lupino has never even met.

What could possibly cause all this negative neurosis in a star so definitely in the groove? No one can say for sure. As one of her best friends sighs, "How can you explain Ida when she's twenty different people at the same time?"

She was born during a London air raid in 1918, and that might have had something to do with it. Furthermore, Ida is the tag end of a line of gypsies, minstrels and Italo-English entertainers who have been hard at it without one interruption for some 425 years and can prove it. Temperament's in her veins. Show people are a separate breed anyway. The real McCoys are always volatile, impulsive, psychic, tense as springs, wild, brilliant and maybe a little bit screwy by lay standards. Ida Lupino is the real McCoy.

When she was less than seven years old, she was already kicking up her heels and running away from school, and at thirteen Ida was tearing around the British theatrical world biting her nails with the urge to get going. She changed her name and then changed it back again. She worried and fretted. She denied her famous family's help and then sought it. When she had a chance finally to come to Hollywood, she wailed that it was the worst possible thing for her—but over she came to make "Alice in Wonderland," a super-special version of the Lewis Carroll classic Paramount had up its sleeve.

They wanted just about the sweetest, freshest young miss in Merrie England for the title part. Ida had been playing little cockney chippies and sidewalk floosies (as she still does today) until Hell wouldn't have it. The one virginal vacation she had was a sequence where she faked sweetness and light to frame a rich old man. The rest of the film she was a pretty awful little tramp. Anyway, the sweet part is what studio scouts caught, and Hollywood had found its dream girl.

When Ida stepped off the Chief, the shock was pretty profound all around. Her hair was bleached and her naughty eyes mascaraed. She was decked out in the gladdest rags she'd been able to find, and her hips were weaving like an underfed Mae West's. That's what Ida thought they were looking for—sex. She never did "Alice in Wonderland," needless to state. And pretty soon she knew she wasn't exactly wanted.

Oddly enough, though, Ida didn't worry about that a bit. "I don't know why not," she muses. "I'd been tearing myself apart in England. But from the moment I arrived in Hollywood I relaxed. The place was beautiful, life was easy. I didn't bother about what I did on the screen or how I did it. I just took it easy and got as smug as a pussy cat. And was that fatal!"

I don't know whether or not the average girl would look back at six years under contract and a couple dozen pictures as a complete waste of time, but Ida Lupino thinks she remained in a state of career coma. "I didn't worry a bit!" she explained. Life begins with Lupino two jumps from a nervous breakdown.

She flirted with that, of course, in "The Light That Failed," from which picture Ida personally dates her worth-while days in Hollywood, although she's never suffered so much before in her life. Before the divine misery set in, she went through fourteen months of the mortal kind.

That is, both idleness and the dread infantile paralysis ganged up on her. Her contract finally blew up at Paramount by spontaneous combustion, after which Lupino finally decided there'd be some changes made. She let her hair go natural, dieted (as if she needed it!), took off a few pounds of make-up to boot and decided to be aggressive about things.

"I suddenly realized," said Lupino, "that I definitely was not one of those people things just come to. There are lots of people in life, you know," she confided, "who have magnetism. They attract people, fortune, events. Not me. I'm cold. People shy away from me. So do events. I have to get things the hard way."

IDA set about being a go-getter. And the first thing she got was—the air. Nobody, apparently, wanted the new Lupino. The next thing she acquired was paralysis. Between them they lasted a year and a half. It was profitable enough personally, because Ida lay on her spine, her brain racing like mad, and became (1) a composer, (2) a short story writer, (3) a painter.

She also became a little eccentric about herself, and it took a couple of guys notoriously on the wacky side to get Ida back in the groove. One was Orson Welles. Ida got on one of his radio broadcasts, and after she'd lived through his rantings and ravings she was a new woman. "This," breathed Ida, "is a man of destiny!" It turned out that another gentleman, Wild Bill Wellman, was really Ida's m.o.d. Wild Bill was entrusted with making Kipling's "The Light That Failed" at Ida's old alma mater, Paramount. She'd always craved to play Bessie, the beautiful bawd. So Ida just stomped, wild eyed, into Bill's studio sanctum one day and announced:

"Mr. Wellman, I want to play Bessie in your picture!"

"Oh—you do, do you?"

"Yes—and I'm going to. Nobody else in this town can do it!"

"Well—I'll be damned! But, you know, as you stand there with your eyes popping and your nostrils flaring, you look like the dame, at that. Okay, you've got it. But you'd better be good!"

Ida was. Although she flirted with a nervous collapse through every foot of film.

Fortunately Ida, in her off-career life, is just as irresponsible, carefree and flighty as she is concentrated and conscientious about studio affairs. She's married, of course, to Louis Hayward, a case where opposites definitely didn't attract, as this Louis is cut right out of the same crazy quilt as Ida. They're very happy in a hectic sort of way.

Louis met Ida in London when she was hardly out of pigtails and started calling her a fresh little brat right away. Their courtship around Hollywood could make one of those screwball tit-for-tat movies Cary Grant is always playing in. Their married life stays just as wacky.

They dwell atop Mandeville Canyon in a house called "The Hams' Hideout," which they bought one day on the way to a dinner party. They were a half hour late at the party and excused themselves by saying, "Sorry to be late, but we saw a house we liked on the way and bought it!" After the purchase, they found it didn't have a lot of important things, no dining room, for instance. So they've been tacking on ever since—a good excuse, by the way, for Ida to keep away from Hollywood crowds and commotion.

Premières are out, and people who ask her to parties are never sure that she'll show up or, if she does, whether she'll be a little mouse sitting in a corner or the life of the party. As for Hollywood night life, it hasn't had a look-in since Lupino became a dramatic actress. She used to drop in at a popular café every now and then, but now when she's making a picture, she's a limp wreck each night and in the hay by eight. Or else she's going over all her acting agonies with Louis. They're the mercuric type of couple who lug home all studio worries and argue them out to each other. They love these confabs dearly and keep them up for hours.

One night not long ago a very "important" Hollywood soirée loomed up—something like a command performance. So Ida and Louis dusted off their dinner clothes and arrived grimly, because Ida "freezes" at fancy social circuses. They couldn't find the front door this night, though, and tramping around through the bushes peeked in a window and saw all the people. "D-do we go in?" asked Louis. "No-no," squeaked Ida. "Let's go get a hamburger instead." They were creeping stealthily away when a hand grabbed them. It was a watchman who thought they were suspicious characters. When they explained, he ushered them to the door very politely—and they had to go in!

When luck's running with Ida, though, she's at home with her pups, absurdly titled Edward-Who-Is-Not-to-Pick-the-Flowers and The Duchess. The Hams' Hideout by now is just that, always jammed with Ida's friends, all of whom are given keys to the place so she'll never know who's there when she gets home. Some of the people they see a lot are Geraldine Fitzgerald and her husband, Ralph Forbes and Heather Angel, Richard Haydn (who is "Professor Carp" of the Charlie McCarthy program), and of course, Ida's sister, Rita, who's dancing in a Hollywood night club now, and her mother, Connie Emerald. Ida's dad, the comedian Stanley Lupino, incidentally, is an air raid warden in London now and has some medals to prove what a good one he is.

THE Hams, when they get together, turn on a recording machine in the rumpus room, replay the records they make and kibitz on each other's faults. That's the nearest Ida's pangs of professional self-criticism get to disturbing her home life. The rest of the time she's off the beam, fluttering here and there arranging flowers, inspecting some antique "bargain," pecking out new tunes on the piano (she's had an album of her waltzes recorded) or in bed devouring a good book. When she's happy and relaxed, too, Ida is a pretty vague person.

Several Hollywood hostesses have been piqued because Ida has simply forgotten invitations of all sorts. One radio script sent up several months ago for her approval has never been found. Important telegrams arrive—and vanish. Mail means absolutely nothing to Lupino when she's relaxed. Neither do clothes; she buys most of her home rags in boys' departments. She's likely to say "yes" to everything without giving it a thought. The other day she made fifteen appointments for one day and messed them all up. She'll even forget to eat when she's got the load off her mind.

But all of that is fairly rare these busy days and never, never in the course of one of Ida's camera cramps. "The minute I get started on any picture I get the goons and the jiggers," advised Ida, looking hollow-eyed and pursued. "You'll never believe it, but I'm actually afraid of that lens. When it gets anywhere near me, I tie up like a wet knot."

Ida said the only moment of peace she had while making a movie was lunch on the set. She doesn't dare go in the Green Room, Warners' studio restaurant, for lunch. It's too much of a strain knowing people will be looking at her. "You have to put on an act," said Ida. "And I'm not up to it." Playing a succession of hysterical hussies hasn't helped Ida any either. "I've been going crazy so much on sets," murmured Lupino, "that I wonder how I keep sane off them.

"Sometimes," said Ida, "I don't think I'll be able to keep it up through another picture. I wonder if it's worth it. If things weren't so upset and unsettled and the future so much in doubt, I believe I'd settle down, have a family and never do more than one picture a year.

"And maybe," she continued, looking dismally depressed, "that's all I'll get a chance to do after this part. Now this next scene—I'll never be able to do it right! I've tried all morning and I'm horrible, miserable, terrible! It will certainly ruin my career—what are you laughing at anyway?"

I couldn't explain, but Ida started laughing then herself. "You know," she said, "Jimmy Cagney once said something I liked. 'The time to start worrying,' he said, 'is when you stop worrying.'

"I guess," grinned Ida Lupino, "I'll never have to worry about that!"

PRIVATE JAMES STEWART, U.S.A.

short and sweet. When Jimmy came out, he found the entrance thronged by women. With Meredith and Grady running interference, he made his way to a special electric trolley that was to take him and 18 other draftees to Fort MacArthur.

As they waited for the street car to take off, the three stood and chatted. Meredith was knocking himself out trying to think up a few jokes. Every now and then Bill Grady would manage to get in a word or two of advice: "The guy to make friends with right off the bat," he kept saying, "is the top sergeant. You only get to see a general through a spy glass. But this top sergeant. . . ."

At 7:39 the street car pulled out. For a while Meredith and Grady just stood there waving their handkerchiefs. After that Meredith said:

"Let's go get us a cup of coffee."

"Yes," Malcolm said, "coffee is the ideal stimulant. There are no after effects."

The arrival of Private Stewart at Camp MacArthur was celebrated by photographers and newsreelmen. Uncle Sam's army took it all pretty casually. When the picture-taking was over, Jimmy was handed a knife, a stool and a bushel of potatoes.

"I guess you want these things peeled," Jimmy said grinning. And peeled they were.

That afternoon Jimmy got his gun. It was the regulation army rifle issued to every soldier. With half the regiment looking on, he turned the weapon over and over in his hands and examined it like a small boy with a Christmas toy.

"This is great, fellows. I've never even held one of these things before. The only kind of gun I'm familiar with is the prop gun that makes a lot of noise on a movie set."

Private Jimmy Stewart made friends with the top sergeant all right. He wrote Malcolm a letter and told him all about it. He wrote home and told all about camp life, of the guys who kidded him, the guys who didn't, of marching and sore feet, of eating and an improved appetite. Of everything he wrote with Stewart humor. Such as:

"I am living in a tent. I'm up to my hips in mud. Come to think of it I am pretty tall, so maybe it isn't quite up to my hips. Peace, it's wonderful. Very wonderful."

JIMMY didn't linger at Fort MacArthur. He hadn't drawn his first pay before the order came through from Washington transferring him to the air corps. The announcement, of course, appeared in the papers.

Two days later Jimmy departed from Fort MacArthur. Such a delirious farewell was never occasioned by the leave-taking of a major general as was made over our James. A mob of women were on hand to wish him "bon voyage." They shrieked, and they wailed. They cooed, and they pleaded. It took 24 military police to shoo them away long enough for Jimmy to pile into a train and take off. It wasn't a de luxe train. There wasn't a Pullman on it. Private Stewart was sharing a seat in the day coach!

Moffett Field is where Jimmy belonged, and Moffett Field was happy to have him. With something like 325 hours of flying time to his credit, Jimmy is one of the smoothest pilots in the movie colony. In the yellow-striped little two-seater of his he has made jaunts all over the country. An expert on maps, he knows the terrain of California like the proverbial book.

Could have been that a qualified citizen like Jimmy would be promptly commissioned a second lieutenant in the air corps and given a bomber to play with. But no. Jimmy happens to be 32, and the age limit for a flying cadet is 27. Which is how come Jimmy wrote back to Malcolm a week or so after he had arrived at Moffett:

"The nearest I have come to an airplane is to carry a parachute from one plane to another."

Whether Jimmy will ever be zooming around in a pursuit plane or practicing a little with-malice-toward-none dive-bombing is debatable. There are miles of red tape to be cut, and that takes time. But if anyone will see that it gets cut, it's our Jimmy. Don't go selling his stock short. Scratch that shy, baffled look of his, and you'll find the face of a man who very definitely knows what time it is—right to the second.

Regarding Jimmy's status quo with the feminine population, Milton Berle has said the last word on the subject. Asked by a chum over at Ciro's how come he was going home so early he replied: "I'm knitting a sweater for Jimmy Stewart," and I'm two days behind schedule now."

Milton Berle may or may not be knitting a sweater, but everyone else's sister, auntie and grandmother is furiously at work turning out items for Jimmy's comfort. One enterprising miss made him a parachute. It is a death-trap in all probability, because parachute-making is a science and not a handicraft. But it is a thing of beauty and a toy forever. It's made of red, white and blue and would affright even the hardiest enemy as it glided toward the ground.

Socks, sweaters, shorts, cowboy boots, sombreros, fancy belts—these are only part of the gifts showered on Private Stewart. One kindly Southern gentleman who fought with the celebrated Confederate General, J. E. B. Stuart, sent him his sword. Another well-wisher sent him a bulletproof vest. And as for the 'teen age girls of our land, Jimmy's buddies out at Moffett wish them long life, excellent husbands and healthy broods. Why? Well, these starry-eyed things are making the most delicious fudge ever to top off a man's dinner. And they're sending it on to Jimmy—with love.

At this writing, Jimmy's unit at the Camp hasn't thrown its monthly dance, but camp hostesses, who normally have trouble rounding up enough dancing partners for the soldiers, are already besieged with applications. They telephone and they wire, waitresses from San Francisco cafeterias and freshman cuties from U. C. L. A. several hundred miles away. So far Jimmy has not revealed whether or not he'll attend the first dance jamboree. Judging by his burning desire to melt into his company and be "just one of the boys," you would bet your boots that he'd come. Still, his aversion to publicity may have a lot to do with his decision. The odds are three-to-two that he'll make the first dance, three-to-one that he'll make the second. His buddies, with whom he's popular no end, will practically drag him to the second, if he skips the first.

Private Stewart of the U. S. A. may not be making pictures, but that doesn't mean he has severed his connections with Hollywood for a year. Far from it.

Easter week-end he had his first furlough and took the earliest plane back to his chaste little white house in town. Malcolm answered the ring and virtually lost his legendary composure. He woke up Burgess Meredith, who rounded up the gang for a long talk.

In the afternoon Jimmy paid a visit to the Leland Haywards. Margaret Sullavan, whom he has known since his Princeton days, had just had a baby, and Jimmy was anxious to have a look. He told them funny anecdotes about tent life and played with the Hayward-Sullavan moppets, Brooke and Bridget, who even put on a style show for him.

At home there was dinner and then a short "business session" with Burgess Meredith. First there was the matter of the house. Meredith would take it over for a year with one proviso: should Jimmy's folks ever come to town, they were to have free access. The second item had to do with Malcolm. With Jimmy gone, he made an announcement: he was going to "become very serious and devote his full time to further medical study."

So much for the "business session," during which not a single lease was signed, nor a single memo made. That's the type of business men both of them are.

On the romance front there was little or no activity that week-end. Certainly Jimmy didn't make the boites and bistros with any lady. And he made few telephone calls. Fact is that Jimmy at this writing is as foot-loose and fancy-free as he has ever been in his life.

It is true that a night or two before he took off for his brief stay he called up Ruth Hussey whom he had discovered while making "The Philadelphia Story." They had one date, and that's about all. The columnists tried to fan it up into a tender passion, but even with all the coaxing there has been no conflagration whatsoever.

They're proud of him at the studio—especially Louis B. Mayer, who thinks he's setting a fine example for the youth of our land. But they all miss him very much, too.

As one little prop boy put it—

"We'll all feel gay when Jimmy comes marching home." Which just about makes it unanimous.

★★★ The Wagons Roll at Night

Step right this way, ladies and gents; get yourself a load of a fast-moving, nerve-tingling, romantic movie.

The formula is an old one, but the story has some new wrinkles. Humphrey Bogart continues to climb by a swell acting job. He's the head of a carnival who picks up a smalltown grocery clerk, Eddie Albert, and transforms him into a fearless and intrepid lion tamer. Incidentally, this is so well done that it doesn't at all seem incredible. Sylvia Sidney, who makes her movie comeback as a fortune teller, has lost none of her acting skill or appeal and is welcome to hang around a while.

The plot has to do with Bogart trying to keep Albert away from his (Humphrey's) kid sister, Joan Leslie, a pure, fresh, young thing. Humphrey doesn't want her to get tainted with carnival life in any way.

Beside the crack performances of Bogart, Albert and Miss Sidney, there is good solid acting by Sig Rumann, Cliff Clark and Charlie Foy.

Director Ray Enright has enlivened the proceedings with a steady pace throughout, and the scenes inside the lion's cage, which Eddie Albert actually played (he refused to use a double), are standout thrills.—Warner Bros.

★★★ The Cowboy and the Blonde

This movie is by no means the most startling or exciting film ever made. It is, however, a simple, well-directed, well-conceived, well-acted little picture which will give every ticket purchaser his money's worth. And the profit is heightened even more for Twentieth Century-Fox, in that the picture introduces and establishes a new and exciting movie personality. In these days with male talent so much in demand, George Montgomery should be a front-rank star within a year.

The picture is a mild lampoon of Hollywood. Montgomery is a cowboy who gets a chance as a movie actor. He tangles with Mary Beth Hughes, who is both a temperamental movie star and the girl friend of the movie producer. They fall in love, of course, but not until there are a number of amusing situations.

Montgomery is natural and in full control of himself all the way through. There are many people who believe Miss Hughes is a fine actress. This reporter does not happen to share such an opinion, but he enthusiastically agrees that she's any man's eyeful. The supporting cast is better than usual, topped by Alan Mowbray, John Miljan (who does not work anywhere near enough these days), Fuzzy Knight and Richard Lane. Directed by Ray McCarey.—20th Century-Fox.

★★½ Man-Made Monster

Here is a horror yarn guaranteed to give you goose pimples. It follows all the rules of good horror pictures faithfully, and the result is a very neat and consistent piece of spine-tingling fun.

Lon Chaney, Jr., who seems to be following in his pop's footsteps more and more, has built up immunity against electricity by doing electrical tricks in a circus side show. He falls into the hands of Lionel Atwill, a typical movie "mad doctor," who turns him into a killer. The new twist is this: Chaney knocks off people, gets sent to the electric chair, where he takes to the electricity like a six course dinner. It's the old Frankenstein formula, of course; eventually, after spreading terror through the whole countryside, Chaney knocks off the mad doctor.

George Waggner's direction creates and sustains a consistently eerie mood throughout, and the performances of Chaney, Atwill, Anne Nagel, Frank Albertson and Sam Hinds are topnotch. —Universal.

★★½ Ride On Vaquero

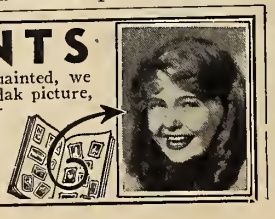
Have you been seeing any of the Cisco Kid pictures? If not, you've been missing a treat. If you have—then you'll be especially pleased to know that this is the best of the lot. It is romantic adventure par excellence. The leading role, of course, was made to order for Cesar Romero, and the blonde and lovely Mary Beth Hughes is a sufficiently competent lady in support.

The cast is packed with above-average character folks which is probably what makes the picture stand out. Romero, as usual, wears his heart on his sleeve. He is about to solve a certain complicated criminal situation when he sees Mary Beth, an entertainer, and falls head over heels in love with her. That complicates his life and nearly causes him to lose sight of his job—but all ends well.

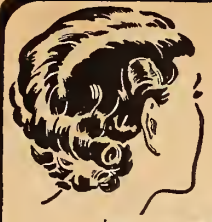
There's an interesting thought here. Romero as Cisco Kid is one of the few movie cowboys who can afford to go romantic. Most of them, you know, are not permitted to even kiss the gals, because they have to avoid "sissy stuff" from the standpoint of kids in the audience. But Romero has been branded a sap for dames before, and it's part of the make-up of this character.

Chris-Pin Martin, Lynne Roberts, Edwin Maxwell, Don Costello and Arthur Hohl are best in support. Directed by Herbert I. Leeds.—20th Century-Fox.

★★½ Great Mr. Nobody



Here is a pleasant, healthy little movie, not especially original and not at all exciting, but if you happen to wander into a theatre and find it on the screen, you'll rather enjoy it.



Eddie Albert is perfectly cast in the familiar average man type of role, appropriately named Smith. He is a clerk in the advertising department of a newspaper, moping along, thinking up ideas for his boss to take the bows on. He can't be bothered with material things largely because he's always dreaming of becoming a big hero some day. The writers could have made it a good deal more sparkling with very little trouble, but it's fun nevertheless.

Joan Leslie continues to be talked about in glowing terms by the movie publicity men and continues to bewilder critics by seemingly having nothing at all to justify any such praise. Alan Hale and Dickie Moore are best in support. Directed by Ben Stoloff.—Warner Bros.

★★½ Repent at Leisure

You've bumped into this story a half hundred different times, but perhaps you won't mind sitting through it again, especially since the dialogue is bright and the acting is pleasant. Kent Taylor, Wendy Barrie and comedian George Barbier head the cast of extremely competent players.

This picture tells about a rich heiress ready to marry a fortune hunter. The night of the marriage she runs away. Aboard a bus on her getaway, she meets a sales clerk, falls in love with him and marries him because he really loves her and, not realizing who she is, can't possibly be after her money.

It's terribly familiar but, nevertheless, a pleasant hour's entertainment. Jerry Cady's sprightly script is largely responsible plus the pleasant pacing of director Frank Woodruff and the really excellent trouping by the three leading players—RKO-Radio.

★★½ Power Dive

Intended simply for excitement, this picture fulfills its promise. It's a snappy, down-to-earth movie replete with thrills, and the cast headed by Richard Arlen and Jean Parker is very okay.

The yarn is built around the airplane testing game. Arlen is the No. 1 tester, and Don Castle is his younger brother with ambitions along the same lines. Jean Parker is the daughter of an inventor, whose machine is tested by Castle after Arlen nixes it.

The supporting cast is better than average. Louis Jean Heydt, Roger Pryor, Billy Lee and Helen Mack all handle their roles effectively, while Cliff Edwards has the laugh department all to himself. Directed, and very smoothly, by James Hogan.—Paramount.

"Well, when we arrived, I heard about Mrs. White and started to study voice with her. It was the grapevine system that got me into the studio. A pupil of Mrs. White's knew Mr. Louis Leighton, the M-G-M producer. The pupil told Mr. Leighton about me, and Mr. Leighton told Mr. Sam Katz. When Mr. Katz asked me to come over to see him, I didn't want to go at all—thought it was just silly. He called me again, and I went thinking I'd just see Mr. Katz. When I got there, there was a whole roomful of people waiting to hear me sing! I was too dumb to be frightened, and I sang the Tarantula, an aria and a popular song, which was one of my favorites.

"They wanted to sign me right away. I didn't want to sign at first, but eventually I did, of course. Know what decided me? Well first of all, the studio promised they wouldn't ask me to do a thing for a whole year, not even make a test. Then they said they would give me everything the best conservatory of music could give me, the best teachers to be had anywhere—and for free—and in addition, I would get a small salary! That's what really decided me. After all, I'm a practical girl, and what could I lose?

"The studio's lived up to its promises beautifully. I couldn't have had finer teachers anywhere, and I didn't have to make a test for a year. When the time came, they took a scene or two from Deanna Durbin's picture, 'It's a Date.' I made a bargain with Mr. Katz before I did it. If it was bad, they were to release me; if it was good I was to stay.

"When I saw the test, I went right up to them and I said, 'Well, I win!' 'What are you talking about?' they said. 'Well,' I told them, 'it isn't any good.' They said, 'Everybody likes it but you. Trouble with you is you need a good spanking.'

"So there I was. After all they'd done for me, I couldn't just walk out. So I kept on with my lessons, and then I was told I was cast in 'Andy Hardy's Private Secretary,' my very first picture. The first day on the set Mickey took me behind the scenes and showed me the ropes. He told me what they meant when they said 'Hit the baby!' That means turn on the small lights. He explained that 'Hit the mark' means to stand on the tape that shows when you're within camera range. He did everything he possibly could to help me, and this is no publicity line, either.

"It seems to me that movie-making is a sort of game, and the best man wins. The Academy Award is the goal for this game, and I want to make the Academy Award! To be an actress like Katharine Cornell or Helen Hayes is the goal for the stage, and I want to make that goal. Opera is the goal for a singer, and I want to make that goal, too. That goal most of all!

"In the meantime the studio is a good, wholesome atmosphere for a girl to be in. Cross my heart and hope to die, if that isn't the truth. I've been treated with nothing but respect since I arrived. The boys on the lot treat me just the way my brothers do. 'Hey, Stinky,' John Carroll will yell at me, 'your slip's showing!' or 'Stick your stomach in and keep those shoulders straight!' Dan Dailey will holler, or 'When you grow up I'll take you out some night' from John Shelton. That sort of thing goes on for hours.

"I don't go out on dates, and that's just fine with the studio. I don't believe in being a stick-in-the-mud, but I do advise girls against dates when they're working hard at a career. I go to the opera occasionally, and once in a while I go to parties my Aunt gives. I'm the sort of girl who calls a boy up and says, 'Look, are you doing anything tonight? Want to go to a party?' If he can go, fine. If he can't, I go with my brother or alone. If you start going out with one boy, you have to go out with others, and I simply don't have time for that. What's more, when I do have a romance, I want it to be in the moonlight, not in the newspapers.

"Well, I guess that's all. Maybe they have groomed me for glamour, but if they have, they've been awfully clever about it and extremely kind. And I am very, very grateful as any girl with a fairy godmother should be!"

he asked? "Maisie, I mean! Well, she has laid an egg every day for the last seven days! And would you believe it—each day the egg gets smaller! Isn't that terrific!" And would you believe it—Jimmy still thinks the publicity man fainted from the heat!

THIS LITTLE CHICKIE STAYED HOME

Incidentally, there's nothing phony about Cagney's love of the barnyard. A few days after Maisie was so impressively introduced to the public, Jimmy scooped up his wife and their three-year-old adopted son and set out for Martha's Vineyard where the Cagneys have their farm. There, as often as Cagney can arrange it, young Jimmy, Jr. will enjoy the Huckleberry Finn childhood his city-bred pappy missed. "It'll be great for the kid," Jimmy stated before he left. "He's been with us in Hollywood for three months. That's enough for one dose. The change will do us all good. Now, if we could only take Maisie. . . ."

DILEMMA DE LUXE

Mickey Rooney is sitting on a griddle. And it's going to get hotter and hotter unless someone discovers a way to pull him off. Mickey's distress, strangely enough, is due to complications arising from his hectic love life. As we go to press, dancer Dolly Thon, his long-time lady love, is confiding to friends she'll become Mrs. Rooney in September—and Mick is telling intimates that's the month he goes to the altar with Linda Darnell! In our opinion, it will take the wisdom of a Solomon to yank him out of his predicament. But there are those who think everything will turn out okay. Linda is said to be peeved with Mickey for announcing marriage plans she knows nothing of. If that is true, the Darnell-Rooney combination may break up, leaving the way clear for the dancing Dolly.

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

IT'S THE TRUTH

It happened just recently. Jane Wyman and Ronnie Reagan were exploring a Beverly Hills home with an eye to buying same. Janie marched out of the bedroom with disappointment stamped in her big brown eyes. "It's awful," she moaned. "Only two tiny windows and a dinky closet with a door that sticks!" Ronnie patted his worried wife on her bright blond head. "Let's take in a movie," he suggested. "It'll relax us. We've been looking for a house for months. I guess we're doomed to spend out lives in apartments." Fifteen minutes later the Reagans were holding hands in a neighborhood theatre. Suddenly Janie choked on her candy bar and Ronnie swallowed his gum. For there on the screen in a film titled "This Thing Called Love," Rosalind Russell and Melvyn Douglas were prancing around a house that was the exact answer to the Reagans' dream! The rest of this tale writes itself. The following morning, Jane and Ronnie scrambled over to Columbia Studios. They cornered the man who designed the house, talked him out of his blueprints—and are now gleefully constructing a home that's "just like in the movies!"

BETTE THE PACE-SETTER

Girls who are tired of beauty articles telling them how they can look "ethereal" like Hedy Lamarr, "oomphie" like Ann Sheridan, and "cuddly" like Sonja Henie, may find it refreshing to know how they can look "interesting" like Bette Davis. Bette has two pet stunts which any gal with the ordinary implements of war paint can imitate. First there's her hair-do. Bette's wearing bangs these days. Originally they were literal hangovers from the time she played Queen Elizabeth and had to shave a few inches off her forehead. But Bette liked 'em so well, she's keeping them. Secondly there's that distinctive Davis lipline. Bette gets it by rouging her under lip instead of her upper lip. She then presses both lips together, and an unbroken arc of color is planted from one corner of her mouth to the other. Simple, isn't it? But watch out on that lip trick. Advance reports indicate it takes a mighty special face to get away with such a complete reversal of technique.

ON THE SET

she wears to marry Dick, are initially draped on Geraldine's torso and then transferred to the shapely body of the star.

To keep his cast pepped up about the proceedings, Director Kanin has issued orders that no one may know until the final day of shooting who wins the gal. Kanin figures in this way he'll get more realistic performances from his stars—and some good publicity for his picture, besides. The nerve-wracking uncertainty induced by this dictum has led to considerable apple-polishing on the set. Ginger's three suitors believe that by winning her off-screen favor they may influence the ending of the film. Fanciest apple-polisher is Meredith. His daily gifts to Ginger range from a 10c bracelet and a 50c watch, to a ratty-looking set of furs costing $14 and a vintage '22 flivver that was no bargain at $20.

But gifts or no gifts, we don't think Meredith has a chance. Or Murphy, either. Our chips are riding on the rich man. Ginger's no sap.

A Darling Girl...A new Party Dress—

but the Same Old Question of a Date!

No girl should risk underarm odor when Mum so surely guards charm!

NO ART OF DRESS, no natural loveliness, no beauty aid a girl could command can make up for the fault of personal undaintiness—for the offense of underarm odor.

A girl may have an enchanting skin and lovely lips—clothes in the peak of fashion. But one offense against personal daintiness, one moment of unguarded charm and even the most eager admirer receives an impression that a girl may never change.

Too many girls trust a bath alone to keep free from offending. But no bath, however fresh it leaves you, can guarantee you lasting charm. A bath corrects the faults of past perspiration—it cannot prevent the risk of underarm odor to come. Unless you give underarms special care you can be guilty of offending and never know it.

That's why so many popular girls use Mum daily. A quick dab under each arm and your charm is safe—safe for business, safe for dates, safe all day or all evening long. Play safe—guard your precious charm with quick, safe, dependable Mum.

More women use Mum than any other deodorant. Housewives, business girls, movie stars and nurses know that their husbands, their jobs, their friends are too important to offend. They prefer Mum for:

SPEED—When you're in a hurry, Mum takes only 30 seconds to smooth on.

SAFETY—Mum won't irritate skin. And the American Institute of Laundering assures you Mum won't injure even fine fabrics.

DEPENDABILITY—Daintiness is lasting with Mum on guard. Without attempting to check perspiration, Mum protects against underarm odor for hours to come. Start now to guard your charm—get a jar of Mum at your druggist's today.

FOR SANITARY NAPKINS—You need a gentle, safe deodorant for Sanitary Napkins—that's why so many women use Mum. Always use Mum this important way, too.

We're relaxing during the dog days. Swinging in our old hammock and taking an occasional mint julep.

Yes, we're willing to talk but campaigning is out. Our voice is soft, cooing, mellow.

"Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" and "Lady Be Good." One is an unusually gripping drama, the other an unusually rippling musical. Opposite, but twin, poles.

Victor (GWTW) Fleming produced "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," the famed Stevenson yarn. Of course, he had no talent to work with—only Spencer Tracy, Ingrid Bergman and Lana Turner.

"PUDDIN' HEAD"

THAT SCREEN SLICKEROO FRANCIS LEDERER GOES CORNY WITH HAYSEED JUDY CANOVA!

Getting lean, suave, Czecho-Slovak Francis Lederer as leading man for "Puddin' Head" doesn't mean that Romance has crept into Judy Canova's screen life. Like Gene Autry, Republic's rubber-mouthed chanteuse can bestow only sisterly cheek-pecks—no real kisses. In her third triumph as a corn-fed hillbilly belle, Judy's kept too busy to think about love, anyway. In one scene, she slugs eight rounds with dance-comic Eddie Foy, Jr. And that in spite of a siege of flu that stymied shooting for three days.

To play the phony Count who tries to scare Judy and her Pop (Slim Summerville) into selling their inherited Manhattan plot of land to a radio station

Judy's contract, like Gene Autry's, says that she can't ever be cinematically mean or ill-tempered. What's more, she must always be wholesome and live by the Golden Rule!

Judy's most popular fan was the Iowan who sent a gallon of ice cream per week! Here are Raymond Walburn and Slim Summerville (he's practically retired—makes an occasional movie) licking it up.

Lederer's stand-in Victor Sabuni had to don 6" blocks to turn himself into a 6-footer. He and Francis, founder of the "World Peace Federation," talked nothing but foreign affairs on the set.

On the romantic side were Mary Beth Hughes and fast-ridin' Don "Red" Barry. Title of pic, "Puddin' Head," was taken from Judy's half-collie, half-terrier pup.

next door, Lederer turned down two offers of more sophisticated roles. And adjusting his Continental dignity to the yokel caprices of the Leaping Lena model Ford you'll see, took some of the starch out of the "Count's" stiff shirt. For that matter, a blistering turn at hoeing potatoes is bad medicine for any Count's ego. But to the real Lederer, it evoked nostalgic memories of the days when he slaved his way through a Prague drama school with a hoe!

Companion and stand-in to the glamorous Czech was Victor Sabuni, who once did the same job for him at Paramount, now acts as correspondent for South American newspapers through his own Sabuni International Syndicate. During most of the picture, poor Sabuni worked under lights on twenty-four hour shifts. By day for Lederer. At night for the Syndicate.

Added comic competition for Judy is furnished by Raymond Walburn and Chick Chandler, both of whom landed roles through flukes. Walburn's call came after producer Albert Cohen, idly fingering a cigarette pack, spotted De Witt Clinton's portrait on the Federal tax sticker, ordered: "Get me a comedian who looks like that!" Chandler was a last-minute substitution for Buster Keaton, whose comeback was nipped by sudden illness.

Chief "Puddin' Head" brow-furrower for director Joe Santley, ex-vaudeville big-timer, was coaxing four cows, three pigs and five goats—all heat balky—through a revolving door. It took three apoplectic hours. Other headache: Catapulting Eddie Foy into a mackerel barrel—he's allergic to 'em! More soothing to the Santley soul was getting a San Marino oil man's gorgeous 5-acre estate as background for swank party scenes. Negotiator was the Assistance League of California, a group of society matrons who ask philanthropic big-wigs, not for money, but for the loan of their private grounds to movie companies. Rental proceeds are turned over to charity.

Add note: There's one word in this $500,000 Republic vehicle the British censors will "tsk tsk" out of the script—"punk." Don't get us wrong! It's something a truck-driver says—not a comment about the film!

Classical music-lover Lederer learned about "corn" from Judy. She's called "Jenny Lind of the Ozarks" by Republic. Can warble grand opera as well as hillbilly ditties!

MOVIE REVIEWS

BY WOLFE KAUFMAN

A Woman's Face ★★★½

Joan Crawford is not only on the upbeat again, she's there. This is her best job in a very long time, and a swell movie; it has suspense, action, melodrama—and it has Crawford. A Crawford full of fire, vitality, realism and power.

"A Woman's Face" is a psychological melodrama built on a mystery suspense formula with romantic overtones. It has to do with the change that takes place in a scarred and bitter femme when plastic surgery turns her into a beautiful woman. It took some courage for Joan to play the part of a horribly disfigured person, even though she eventually becomes beautiful.

She is cast as the head of a gang of blackmailers, and she falls in love with Conrad Veidt—a nasty guy with a solid front. To captivate him, she gets Melvyn Douglas, a plastic surgeon, to change her face. Then she gets a job as a govèrness, with the idea of killing a little boy (Dickie Nichols) so that Veidt can inherit a big bankroll. But the physical alterations of her face have also, it seems, brought about spiritual regeneration. She can't quite go through with it. This leads to a thrilling chase and shooting finale that cannot be revealed here, since the movie depends a great deal on the suspense elements involved.

It's beautifully written by Elliott Paul and Donald Ogden Stewart, who rate distinct bows for their labors. And George Cukor's intelligent and all-understanding direction also is on a high plane. Added to which, of course, is first-rate trouping by a big cast of experts which includes, Joan, Douglas, Veidt, Osa Massen and Albert Basserman.—Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Love Crazy ★★★½

This is the screwiest assignment Bill Powell or Myrna Loy ever had. You'll laugh your head off, then go back and laugh some more.

Myrna and Bill are about to celebrate their fourth anniversary as the movie starts. Then a series of things happen (and I'll be doggoned if I'll tell you what they are) to make Myrna jealous as all get-out, with the result that they wind up in the divorce court. Naturally, Bill has too much good sense to permit Myrna to get a divorce—so he simulates insanity and lands in a nut house. Now he has to break loose and convince the missus that she still loves him, in spite of the fact that the cops are after him. From there on, the story gets a little involved and complicated. Suffice it to say that all ends well, and that there isn't a dull moment throughout.

A lot of the story developments are ancient, and the corn is plentiful in practically every gag sequence, but all of it is handled in a refreshingly new and funny manner. When Bill Powell, for instance, shaves off his mustache, disguises himself as his own sister and talks in a falsetto!

The acting? Oh, yes, the acting. Bill and Myrna, of course, are tops. Gail Patrick will surprise you with her impersonations of a modern vamp. Jack Carson has a role perfectly suited to him, as the other man. Florence Bates was born to be a caricature mother-in-law; excuse us, Florence, but you are excellent.

Give a big hand to the director, Jack Conway, for such pace and timing as is a rarity these days.—Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. (Continued on page 10)

★★★½ Major Barbara

There probably is no man in the world today who can irritate you as much (and make you like it) as this George Bernard Shaw lad. How can you get mad at a guy who delivers? His newest movie, "Major Barbara," is another "Pygmalion."

Mind you, this is not a picture for general consumption. It is what we wise guys call a class film; it's for the cultured trade. But even if you hate it, you'll have to admit it's an A-1 job.

Shaw wrote the play in 1905, and he has managed to move it to the present with ease and with logic. The story has to do with the state of soul and the conflicting viewpoints of a millionaire munitions maker, his daughter (who is also a Salvation Army major), her suitor (who is a young Greek scholar on the side) and a Cockney laborer whom Barbara takes in hand and remolds. "Pygmalion" in reverse; the girl makes the man over.

Wendy Hiller, whom you remember from "Pygmalion," brings poise and surety to her portrayal; Robert Morley is perfect as the father, giving Shaw a chance to throw in terrific gobs of his own viewpoints, and Rex Harrison is topnotch as the suitor-scholar. But it is Robert Newton, as the Cockney, whom you will remember for a very long time. Directed by Pascal.—United Artists.

★★★½ Million Dollar Baby

It's rollicking. It's gay. It's slaphappy, brimful of fun and has some of the spiciest lines heard on the screen in a long time.

May Robson acts the part of a very wealthy American who has lived abroad for many years; she just heard that her father gypped his partner out of a fortune, so she wants to square things, finds the wronged man's granddaughter and gives her a million bucks. Well, suppose you were a bargain basement salesgirl, and somebody came along and handed you a million? Priscilla Lane, who is the gal in the case, finds out it's not as good as it sounds; in fact it's a pain in the neck after a while. She loses her boy friend because Ronald Reagan is one of those gents who wants to live on his own, not on the girl friend's, bankroll; she is besieged by salesmen, tax collectors, charity specialists; she is—. Oh, well, go see the picture!

Acting? You know all about Robson; she's as good as ever here, with more footage. And Priscy Lane is absolutely elegant. Jeff Lynn is as sleek and well-groomed and likeable as ever (but he really ought to get mussed up just a bit once in a while), but the real acting surprise comes from Reagan. The kid has finally done it!

★★★½ Blood and Sand

"Blood and Sand" was the best film made by Rudolph Valentino, who was a much finer actor than you can possibly believe. Whether or not the new version with Tyrone Power in Rudolph's shoes is better or worse is hard to say, but it is a thrilling, breath-taking movie extravaganza.

It is possible that "Blood and Sand" (the 1941 version) will go down in the record books as the most beautiful film of all times. You have never seen such color, such composition, such costumes. By comparison, the writing and acting seem secondary. Yes, director Rouben Mamoulian has stolen the show!

"Blood and Sand" is an earthy story, a study of primal lusts and ambitions. The early part of the picture is best from a writing and acting standpoint. It shows clearly how a little boy, harnessed by a blinding passion to defend his father's name, alone, in the dark of night, studies bull fighting. With the boy's growth to Tyrone Power manhood, warmth seems to leave the story, however, and the brilliance of the costuming and scenics take over. Tyrone's love for childhood sweetheart Linda Darnell, whom he has known since childhood; his attraction to Rita Hayworth and his growing fear of the arena lead the yarn slowly to its shocking finale.

Little Rex Downing, as the boy, gives the role a lot more fire than Tyrone does when he takes over, but this is due largely to the fact that Tyrone has a much tougher task.

Nazimova does a sincere bit as Tyrone's mother; Linda Darnell is decorative as the other girl; John Carradine doesn't know how to do a bad acting job, and this is one of his best; J. Carroll Naish, Laird Cregar and Anthony Quinn are fine in small bits.

Never has Rita Hayworth been as good. Her gowns are daring and exciting. And her performance is the best of her strangely up-and-down career. If this job doesn't set her definitely as one of the top stars of today, there ain't no justice! Directed by Rouben Mamoulian.—Twentieth Century-Fox.

★★★½ Shepherd of the Hills

There is no simple way to classify this film. It has many fine qualities, it has many faults, it has magnificent scenery and color photography—and it has the very finest possible acting. The fact remains that there will be some of you who won't care for the story.

Harold Bell Wright's famous old-time novel is portrayed faithfully. But the story's dated, and nothing's been done about it.

The plot takes place in the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia. Life is beautiful and rough and wild down there; so wild that moonshining is considered a normal occupation, and killin' and feudin' its natural attributes. In this background a story of regeneration and retribution is painted, with Betty Field, John Wayne and Harry Carey handling the big acting loads.

This reporter happens to believe that in this movie Betty once more delivers a new-type interpretation. When you consider the versatility displayed by a youngster who can play the leads in such varied films as "Mice and Men," "Seventeen" and "Shepherd," you begin to realize why she has gone this far this fast.

John Wayne gives Betty a close race for top honors as the mountain boy who is in love with her but can't marry her because he's got a feud to settle. Harry Carey is unbelievably good as the mystery man, the title character.

Highest honors also to Beulah Bondi as

HERE'S WHAT YOU'VE ALL BEEN ASKING FOR—

LITTLE-KNOWN FACTS ABOUT WELL-KNOWN FACES!

Jack Holt

Born John Charles Holt, May 31, 1888, Winchester, Va. Adventurous son of a minister. Early in life sought his fortune as a sand hog, fur trapper, freight packer, cow puncher, stunt rider, member of an Alaskan expedition. Wound up in movies in 1915 and practically relived his experiences on the screen. Centered his interests around polo. Stopped playing recently. Sits on the sidelines and watches son Tim carry on. Despises lap dogs and double features. Never misses a Rose Bowl game or latest in spine-tingling detective yarns!

Tim Holt

Born John Charles Holt, Jr., Feb. 5, 1920, Beverly Hills, Cal. Veritably weaned on polo and motion pictures. Made his début on screen at age of ten with papa Jack Holt. Head of his class at Culver. Loves out of doors, excels at badminton and swimming, raises cocker spaniels and owns a string of polo ponies. A candid camera fiend; he snaps his own travelogues and shorts. Hates formal togs and night clubs. Is tanned as an Indian. Needs almost no sleep but loves plenty of food (particularly thick steaks with lots of juice). Hollywood's youngest daddy.

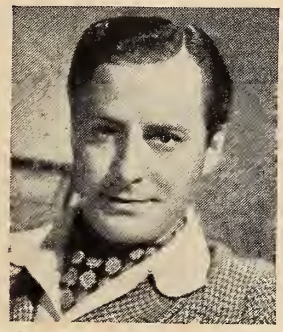
Bob Hope

Born Lester Townes Hope, July 9, 1907, London, Eng. Topnotch authority on Scotch jokes . . . made his first hit in "Roberta" then played in "Red, Hot and Blue" . . . has six brothers . . . loves mobs of people around him . . . loathes formality, trolley cars, pepper and snow . . . talks about ten different things at once . . . skips back and forth with no warning (mentally, it's like watching a tennis game to listen to him) . . . nothing enrages him more than to be interrupted . . . most effective pacifier is pie à la mode . . . always ready to lend a side-splitting Hope performance to charity.

Miriam Hopkins

Born Miriam Hopkins, Oct. 18, 1902, Savannah, Ga. Studied to be writer . . . switched to drama . . . has closets and drawers filled to the brim with furs and jewelry . . . loves paintings and has her walls covered with 'em (looks just like an exhibition) . . . her pilot-butler scares the wits out of her doing barrel rolls over the house; but only amuses her adopted son Michael . . . hates pastels . . . can't stand sight of grey . . . loves crisply tailored clothes . . . lodges guests in a spacious, beautifully furnished de luxe trailer, and they love it!

Walter Huston



Born Walter Huston, April 6, 1884, Toronto, Can. Looks and often acts more like the engineer he started out to be, than an actor. Loves to fool around with sound effects. Makes amazing furniture, the three-in-one-piece type. His hobby's cabinet-making. Eugene O'Neill's plays are his favorites. Won't have a phone in his house, wouldn't dream of buying an expensive car (owns two Fords). Likes entertaining at home but can't be dragged to a night club. Lives with wife in San Bernadino Mts., even when the snow gets 17 feet deep!

JOHN HOWARD . . . Born John Cox, April 14, 1913, Cleveland, Ohio. Was a Phi Beta Kappa and president of University Players at Western Reserve. Family finances thwarted his plans to be an English professor, so he turned to acting. Organized his own dance band in college (he plays piano, drum, sax and trumpet). Swears like a longshoreman, cooks like a dream and doesn't mind washing dishes! Draws and paints like a professional. Disinterested in all babies except Hedy Lamarr's cute adopted son, Jimmy.

LESLIE HOWARD . . . Born Leslie Stainer, April 24, 1893, London, Eng. Most elusive man in Hollywood . . . would rather play polo than sleep; and he really loves to sleep! . . . has astounding repertoire of accents running gamut from cockney to Brooklynese . . . hates to be well-garbed; sticks to beer jackets, slacks and berets most of time . . . can eat unbelievable quantities of roast beef and drink gallons of stout . . . devours Shakespeare . . . makes home movies of his kids . . . filming British propaganda pictures.

JOHN HUBBARD . . . Born John Hubbard, 1914, Chicago, Ill. Easy going . . . impenetrable as a sphinx . . . pores over biographies and funnies (literally lives from one Flash Gordon episode to the next) . . . tweedy looking . . . wed on April Fool's Day after 9-year courtship . . . wife calls him Hub . . . first thing he notices about a woman is her eyes . . . loves acting and wouldn't quit if he had a million, works at it from 5 A.M. till 9:30 P.M. . . . best friends are ex-prizefighters and bullfighters . . . keeps in trim fighting a phony bull on wheels!

ROCHELLE HUDSON
Born Rochelle Hudson, Claremore, Okla., March 6, 1916. Direct descendant of Hendrik Hudson. Had stage ambitions at the age of four, but the Oklahoma laws prohibited the appearance of minors on the stage, so the Hudsons moved to California. She attended Fox Studio School. Has 15 hook rugs to her credit, as well as several paintings. Doesn't like dogs, but owns two cats. Loves to sit down at the piano and improvise by the hour. Tell her a book is a best-seller, and she'll avoid it like the plague.

MARY BETH HUGHES
Born Mary Elizabeth Hughes, Alton, Ill., Nov. 13, 1919. Her grandma acted on stage with Ethel Barrymore—gave family claim to fame and spurred Mary Beth on to dramatics. First went to California for her mother's health; stayed on because of overwhelming success. Lives in modest bungalow in West Los Angeles, drives tiny car of ancient vintage; concentrates wholly on her work, rarely goes out at night. Doesn't diet, gorges on chicken à la king, reads light fiction, keeps four dogs. Is scared to death of fires—gets jitters at scream of fire siren!

Born Ian Hunter, Capetown, South Africa, June 13, 1900. Attended St. Andrews College, Grahamstown, S. A.; entered World War toward the end, and looking around for something to do in London after the war, he hit upon acting. His other ambition is to be a chef, lobster thermidor being his specialty. Can't play a note but loves music. Give him beer, cheese, oysters, caviar and lots of Dorothy Parker's poetry, and he's happy. Hates going to the tailor, new shoes, radios, automobiles, civilization and progress.

Born Ruth Hussey, Providence, R. I., Oct. 30, 1916. Studied to be painter and secretary; turned out actress. Got her start fashion commentating on home town radio station. Dwells in a Hollywood hotel. Can't resist petting stray cats, chooses quiet people for chums, takes in all concerts, operas and art exhibits in town. Favorite color is blue; choice flower is poppy; shore dinners are her dish. Hates to get up early, finds 9 o'clock calls hardest part of her job. On the side, she plays piano and snaps pictures of unsuspecting friends.

Born Gloria Jean Schoonover, Buffalo, N. Y., April 14, 1928. Her adoring father swears she started singing at the age of eighteen months and learned the words of songs before she could carry on the shortest conversation. Deanna Durbin is her "truest ideal." The greatest punishment in the world to her would be to make her stop singing for even a day. She wants to go to college, and the only difficulty she has in school is mathematics. Has a huge collection of every kind of doll.

ALLEN JENKINS
Born Allen McGonigal, New York, N. Y., April 9, 1900. Changed his name because he could never remember how to spell it. Attended American Academy of Dramatic Arts. He calls himself the worst dressed man in Hollywood. Never goes near a night club. Claims he eats like two horses. Is an excellent cook, his specialty being shrimps creole. Has several chow dogs and is still startled every time he sees their blue tongues.

Born Rita Johnson, Worcester, Mass., Aug. 13, 1914. Was bitten by the acting bug at the age of four. She starred in grammar school dramatics, but in high school was told she couldn't act! Strangely enough she much prefers movies to the theatre because she feels that the educational scope is wider. Has played bits in more than twenty movies. Is a coffee fiend and is automatically served gallons of coffee wherever she goes. Gets into food ruts ordering the same thing day after day for months. Secret passion: Spencer Tracy, of whom her husband Stanley Kahn is frightfully jealous.

Born Allan Jones, Scranton, Penn., Oct. 14, 1914. He has worked in coal mines and driven trucks, won two scholarships, studied abroad and sung for the St. Louis Municipal Theatre. His two great ambitions are paradoxical; he wants to play a non-singing role in the movies and warble at the Metropolitan Opera. Has the finest stable in Hollywood and when he is not working, puts on a horse show every Tuesday for sight-seers. He uses his own horse if he has to ride on the screen.

Born Victor Jory, Dawson City, Alaska, Nov. 23, 1902. Started his career as a prize fighter, with a burning ambition to acquire cauliflower ears. Was champion wrestler of the National Guard. Attended University of California. Has appeared in 515 plays. Owns 5,000 books and claims he has read every single one. He is an expert at outdoor cookery. Is always smoking either a pipe or cigarettes. His favorite role was the lead in "Liliom"; his favorite actress is Katie Cornell. Was a woman hater till he met up with Jean Inness—and married her.

Born Betty Leabo, Excelsior Springs, Mo., Feb. 25, 1916. No dizzy blonde is this young lady, for she won a scholarship to U.C.L.A. and worked her way through two years by modeling clothes. After leaving she became a full-time model but kept her eye on the studios. She was tested for the role of Fern in "The Rains Came," and her career was assured. She's had one flying trip East but didn't get near the Stork Club, which simply killed her; thinks the movies are just as good as the theatre, considers hubby Owen Ward the handsomest man in the world and is as natural as the girl next door.

JOHN JUSTIN
Born John Justinian Ledsma, London, Eng., 1917. Got his first experience in stock in Liverpool; became discouraged and went to South America where he toiled as a ranch hand. Tiring of this life, he worked his way back to England as a deckhand and entered the Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts. IT'S FUN TO BE INFORMAL

BY NANCY ARCHIBALD

Nothing formal about the host and hostess on the Gable farm as they entertain, help-yourself style, in honor of Clark's new film, M-G-M's "They Met in Bombay."

—It's fun to set the table with paperware. Save footwear with a small table for dessert course and serve a cooling pineapple punch.

—And fun to be cool and conservative with cut-outs from dainty paper doilies to make your refreshments look crisp and inviting.

Courtesy Dole Hawaiian Pineapple Company

Informality's the rule on the Gable farm. Clark and Carole love to have company drift in around dinner time and stay for a feed—providing they help prepare it themselves. And if it's a July night, hot and breathless, you'll find the Gables out beneath the stars.

Supper is served picnic style on the porch. The makings are spread out colorfully, lavishly. From then on each guest is his own chef with no food-combinations barred. Count on Clark to set the mood with a superman three-decker: alternate layers of sliced tomatoes mixed with thin crisp bacon, sliced breast of chicken and slices of roast beef —mounted on toasted whole wheat!

Whole cook books could be written about the Gable appetite. Carole can tell you that it's solid, masculine and impatient. After a day's toil on the farm wrestling with soil and tractor, he's liable to be too hungry to get his overalls off for dinner. And sometimes Carole has to send him back for "retakes" with the soap and water!

If his fingernails pass inspection, she turns her boy-man loose on his favorite dish—broiled trout and Boston baked beans. Or if the trout isn't biting, he can eat his way through salmon salad by the bowlful.

When Clark is working on a picture, the size of his meals varies with the amount of action in the plot. During his latest, M-G-M's thrilling melodrama, "They Met in Bombay," with Roz Russell—all about jewel thieves and phony detectives racing madly around exotic East-Indian sets —Carole had a real struggle to keep her husband well-fed. She fears the farm will soon run out of greens from the vegetable garden and livestock from the corral if Clark keeps on in this type of role.

Why don't you take a tip from the Gables and do your summer entertaining informally? You can trim your table gayly with bowls filled with substantial salads and trays laden with colorful sandwiches and chilled desserts. Serve one hot dish and a good old-fashioned raisin cake to balance the lighter dishes. Canned pineapple juice makes a fine foundation for cooling beverages. Spiced tea with pineapple juice ice-cubes always proves popular. You can serve hot tea, too, and you'll find it will win friends—even on the warmest evenings. Try thin slices of lime stuck with one or two cloves as a variation for lemon. Coffee is a winner served either hot or iced when accompanied with chilled whipped cream.

If you think picnic-style meals a little too rough-and-tumble, arrange your buffet more formally but keep it cool and casual with novel ceramics, lacy paper doilies that you can get inexpensively at your local five and dime store and a fresh-flower or tropic-fruit centerpiece.

SUMMER SALMON SALAD

To serve four:
1 small head lettuce
1 can salmon
1 onion, minced fine
2 tomatoes, quartered
2 green peppers
2 eggs, hard-boiled
1 tablespoon vinegar
2 tablespoons vegetable or mineral oil
1 teaspoon lemon juice
salt, pepper, paprika, garlic salt and celery salt

1. Trim off chilled head lettuce, tear off crisp leaves and arrange in large bowl.

2. Open can of salmon and empty into a soup plate. Remove bones and pieces of skin. Add minced onions and heart of lettuce chopped fine.

3. Arrange salmon and onion on lettuce, garnish with quartered tomatoes, sliced hard-boiled eggs and green peppers sliced in thin rings.

4. To fish-oil remaining in soup plate add vegetable oil, lemon juice, vinegar and seasoning—mix well and pour over salad. Keep salad in cool place until serving. (To enlarge for unexpected company add cold sliced boiled potatoes and diced radishes.)

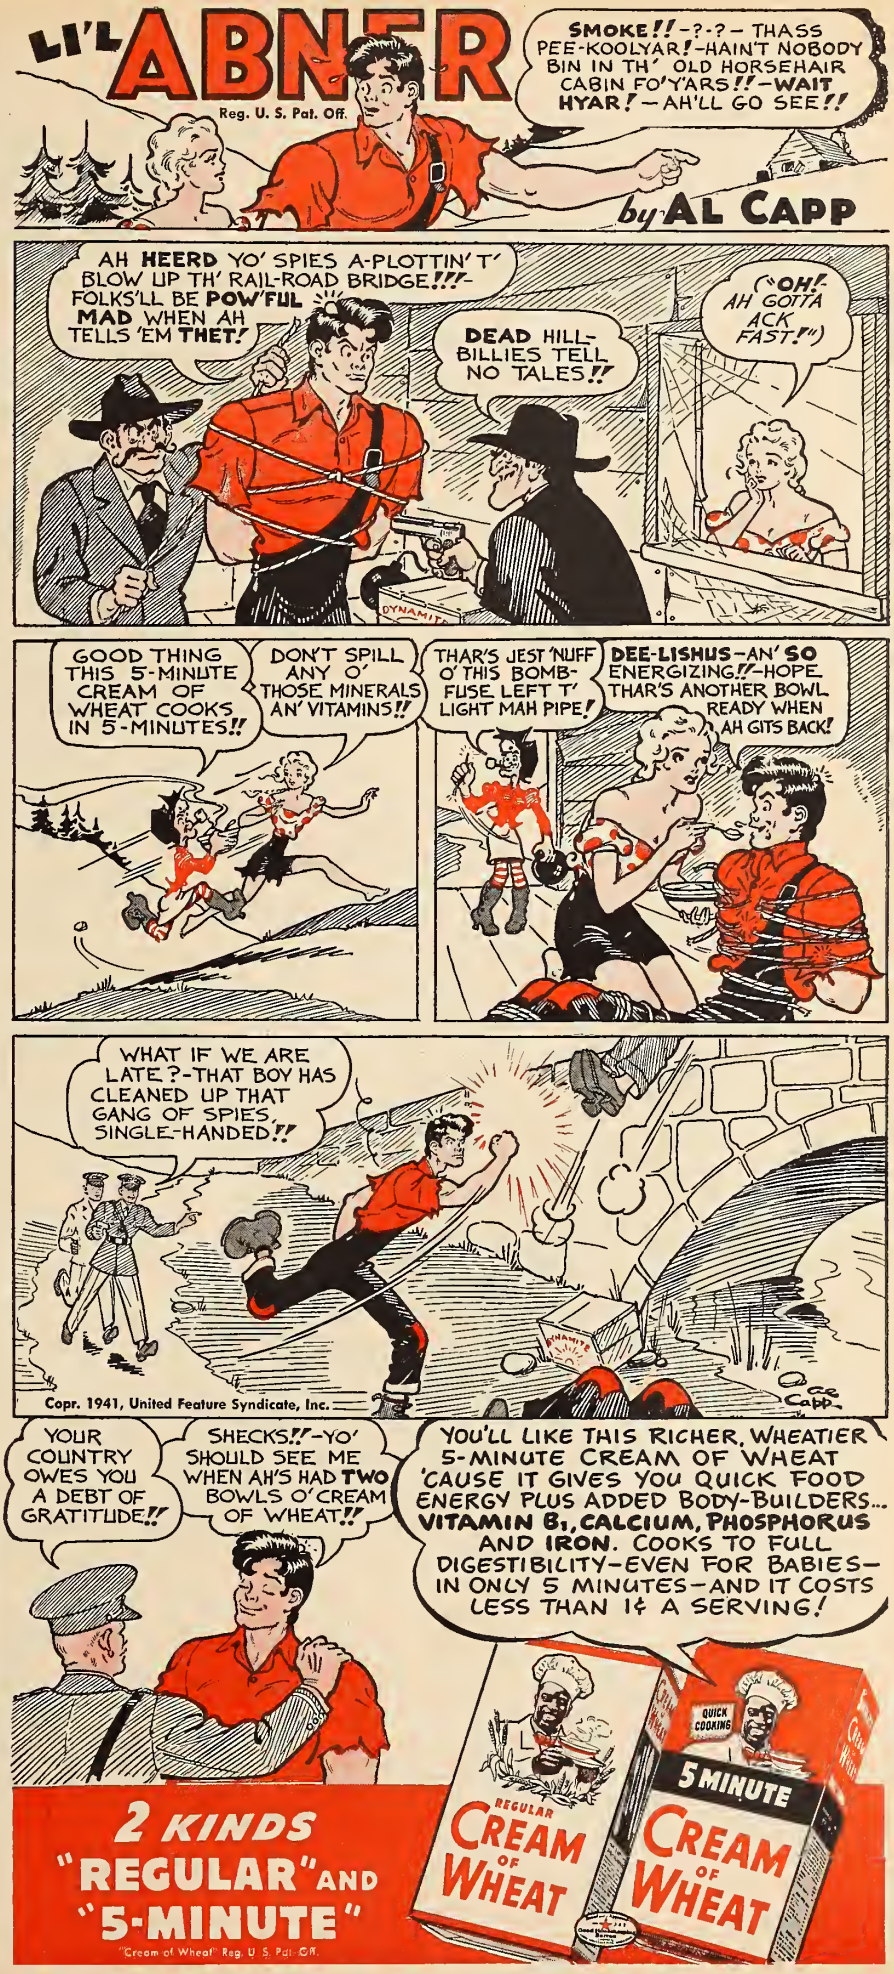
EASY RAISIN CAKE

To make 12 slices:
⅓ cup soft butter
1⅓ cups brown sugar
2 eggs
¼ cup milk
1¾ cups flour
3 teaspoons all-phosphate baking powder
⅓ teaspoon nutmeg
⅓ teaspoon mace
⅓ teaspoon cinnamon
1 tablespoon grated orange and lemon peel
⅓ teaspoon vanilla
1 cup seedless raisins

1. Cream butter and sugar, add beaten eggs and milk. Then sift flour, baking powder and spices together and add to cake batter, beating in thoroughly.

2. Wash raisins in hot water, allowing to soak one or two minutes, drain and dry on a fresh towel. Add grated fruit peel, raisins and vanilla to batter and stir.

4. Pour cake batter into greased paper-lined loaf pan (about 9½ x 4½ x 3). Bake in a moderate oven (350°F.) for from 50 to 55 minutes. Do not serve until cool. If you wish to make the cake richer, pour 1 pony rum over it and wrap in a dry cloth until ready to serve.



REFRESHING PINEAPPLE JUICE PUNCH

Sparkling Pineapple Punch: 6 to 7 servings—double or triple recipe according to amount desired.

2 cups canned unsweetened Hawaiian pineapple juice
1 cup Pepsi Cola or ginger ale
½ cup grapefruit juice
¼ cup raspberry sirup sliced oranges and maraschino cherries crushed ice or ice cubes

1. Mix fruit juices and raspberry sirup and chill in refrigerator. (If fresh raspberry juice is used, add 3 tablespoons sugar.)

2. When ready to serve, add Pepsi Cola, ginger ale, sliced fruit and ice.

Ilona Massey

Ever since she was a humble Hungarian peasant girl with a yen for Rudy Valentino, Ilona Massey dreamed of becoming a great dramatic actress. Realizing her ambition in United Artists' stirring "International Lady," songstress Massey warbles but one tune, tickles your spine with her powerful emoting. She started out as an errand girl in a Budapest shop, advanced to model and thence to chorus girl in the leading opera house. She secretly studied voice (against the advice of the management) and one night stepped into the ailing prima donna's shoes and brought down the house. Her marriage to a young Budapest capitalist ended when his parents forced a divorce in 1935. Grief-stricken, he took his life. Ilona plunged deeper than ever into her career, became top-notch on the European concert stage. Her first job in this country was losing eleven superfluous pounds on a diet of dry liver, cottage cheese, pineapple and skim milk! Last March she became Alan Curtis' bride and hopes for no less than a dozen wee ones!

Joseph Cotten

Born May 15, 1910, Joseph Cotten spent his first 16 years in Petersburg, Va., where he was known as the town problem child. His first serious ambition was to act, and at 17 he joined a little theatre in Miami, Fla., where for five years he swept, posted bills and played everything from bits to leads. A role as understudy with David Belasco on Broadway led to 56 weeks of arduous little theatre work in Boston, and stage and radio shows with Orson Welles. "The Philadelphia Story" (stage) and "Citizen Kane" put his name in lights, and his present "Illusion" for United Artists promises to make the letters a few sizes larger. Joe, who's 6' 2" tall and weighs 185 pounds, lives in Brentwood with his wife (writer Lenore Kip) and daughter; rarely mixes in the Hollywood whirl; prefers riding, badminton, football, reading and record-playing (he has a gigantic collection) to social chit-chatting. In his carpentry shop he turns out shelves for the entire household.

Joan Crawford

In Hollywood and points east, Joan Crawford's an individualist with a capital "I." She uses neither powder nor rouge on the street (despite a generous sprinkling of freckles), never drinks, loathes hats and makes her own bed. She wears a special wig over her hair when it's newly set. Once dove into a pool, wig first! A super-sentimentalist, she's saved every blessed item ex-hubby Tone ever sent her. Her enthusiasm for Garbo matches the ardor of her own fans! She and her adopted baby Christina spend their leisure time in New York where Joan "gets out of the rut." To her cocktail parties there, she invites highbrow intellectuals in every known field. Her two pets are a pair of dachshunds who débuted in "Susan and God." They keep away her arch enemies—crawfish! Winters she stays snug with six fur coats! Dead serious about her career, she deliberately chose the difficult role in M-G-M's "A Woman's Face" for its dramatic value.

Philip Dorn

One of biggest European stage names to crash Hollywood headlines is that of Philip Dorn, currently appearing in Warner Brothers' "Underground." Born Fritz Van Dongen on Sept. 30, 1905, he's 6' 2" tall, weighs 179 pounds, has blue eyes and brown hair. He's probably the only screen star to belong to the Queen's Guard, an honorary organization whose duty was to patrol the royal Dutch castles. Of an old shipbuilding family in Scheveningen, Holland, the Van Dongens' beliefs forbade theatre-going, and his mother has yet to see her first movie! His spouse is Marianne van Dam, European tragédienne. In his spare time he goes in for classical music, reading, fencing and photography, and is "fascinated" by cowboy songs. As part of his training for American films, he sees five movies a week and studies English five hours per day. He's crazy about dogs, especially mongrels, "because they have less airs and more understanding of human frailty."

Veronica Lake

In Paramount's "I Wanted Wings," nightclub singer Veronica Lake nearly wrecks the careers of three flying cadets and makes hash of a U. S. Flying Fortress. Off-screen she's as meek as Moses, earnest and extremely proper; ups her nose at title of glamour girl; aspires to be a second Katie Cornell. She's wed to John Detlie, prudently pays $50-a-month rent, hoards her pennies for a home in the valley. Born at Lake Placid, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1919, she set her cap for an M.D. degree, but left college to cash in on her parents' winter jaunts to Florida and California. During a Hollywood visit, Veronica casually accompanied an actress friend to a studio interview and was offered a part then and there! She refused it and enrolled in dramatic school to study in earnest. Weighing only 98 pounds, she's 5' 3" tall and wears her natural blonde tresses in what her friends call a "sheepdog bob." Privately she sweeps it up high atop her head.

Bette Davis

It would be well-nigh impossible to picture Bette Davis without a cigarette in her hand, spectacles and a book, make-up from head to toe, her bottle of milk on the set, her protruding eyes (resulting from a burn from a flaming Christmas tree), her tie collection—including a red and blue one of Roosevelt's and a grey of Lindbergh's. It would be just as impossible to imagine her being mean to dogs, reporters and autograph hunters, exhibiting her expert rumba to the public, going to bed early and rising at daybreak during vacation, tossing out her prize horror album (full of unflattering portraits of herself). You'd find it more than difficult to catch her laughing softly, leaving coupons unclipped, sitting up straight in her chair, not peppering her conversation with "damn," swearing off clam chowder and potatoes. But it seems the most natural thing in the world to see her playing the leading role in Samuel Goldwyn's film, "The Little Foxes"!

A LOVE STORY LIKE IT!

Directed by GARSON KANIN
Produced by ROBERT SISK
Story and Screen Play by Paul Jarrico

According to the stars, newlyweds Harris and Faye have a long love-life-line. These same wise stars (says astrologer Blanca Holmes) remind Alice that they warned her not to marry that bewitching Martin man in the first place.

She shall have music . . .

The first time Alice Faye and Phil Harris went on a date exactly four months ago, she ignored his charming manners and his undeniably romantic approach and, after carefully surveying his stocky six foot frame, blurted:

"Phil, you're getting too darn fat!"

This apparently pricked Phil Harris' vanity and bruised his sensitivity. He admits today that he fell for Alice on their very first meeting. And if she thought he was getting too fat, well, maybe he was. Perhaps hanging around Don Wilson and his three publicized chins had deceived Phil for years into feeling comparatively slender. So, immediately, with Alice Faye's words still ringing in his ears, Phil Harris went on a historic diet. It was a diet that made M. Gandhi seem like a glutton. Phil Harris also went on a rigid and Spartan exercise campaign that made Lionel Strongfort seem like an anemic.

In a short time he had lost fifteen pounds. Each pound of flesh was a calvary. Friends reported that he became overly conscious of his figure, and that he watched pounds closer than the Bank of England. Sir Launcelot and all the Holy Grail-hunters never did more for the sake of true love.

As for Alice Faye, she practiced what she preached. If Phil could lose weight for her, well, she could keep her own waistline down. For, though merely five feet two in height and weighing only 112, Alice had always been a lover of rich foods, one who appreciated juicy steaks as much as fat roles. So, not only for the sake of her future but for the sake of setting a good example for Phil and keeping her appearance perfect for him, she hewed to her lines.

And now, obviously, it has all been worth the sacrifice. For Alice Faye, the reformed band singer, and Phil Harris, the bright-cracking band leader, are happily married in Encino, California. And they have the blessings of Hollywood's foremost fortune teller who has predicted "a long and extremely successful wedlock." But since they are both on pigmy diets, and since they eat nothing at all, their combine is proof enough that it is possible for two people—if they will it—actually to live on love!

Cesar Romero is always good medicine for a gal who needs to smile. Here, at a 20th-Fox banquet, Alice basks while the gracious Romero scintillates.

In the light-mourning days of her grass-widowhood, Alice played the field with a vengeance. This particular page of heart-balm is French producer Raymond Hakim.

POST-GRAD EXPERIENCE IN THE MARRIAGE-SCHOOL IS WORKING WONDERS FOR ALICE AND PHIL!

When Alice Faye and Phil Harris were knotted in Ensenada, Mexico, by Judge Jaime Pardo with five of Harris' Texas friends looking on, that afternoon in May, it was indeed the straight romantic goods. Because for two months before, they had made moon-eyes at each other in dark corners, sung the same songs, thought the same thoughts, dreamt the same dreams, and finally, when many skeptics wondered if it was an undiluted publicity gag, the pair permitted Dan Cupid to score another bull's eye.

Unquestionably it's an adhesive marriage—one that will stick. Experts ascertain that a successful couple must have mutual interests. Alice and Phil fill the bill. They have music, recent divorces, Rudy Vallee, a love of dancing, an enjoyment of sports and a variety of trivia in common.

Each has one strike, no hits, on the matrimonial scoreboard.

Alice Faye has long understood her major marriage handicap. "You see," she once explained, "when I chose to continue in films, I decided to throw love out the window. A girl can't afford to make more money than her husband. After all, it's still a man's world, and a man wants to be the head of the house." Yet despite this, she eloped to Yuma in September of 1937 and married dark-haired, handsome Tony Martin. They'd met when he played a minor part in her starring picture, "Sing, Baby, Sing," and he asked for her autograph and got her phone number. After endless public fights, a year of separation when Alice claimed she was "a golf widow," she filed suit for divorce in 1940, a divorce which became final last March. However, her split with Tony Martin was due only to one thing—he had to stay in the East for his career and she had to remain in Hollywood for hers, and to each career was the most important thing in life.

On the other hand, Phil Harris' adventure into matrimony and his recent divorce, while less publicized, was much the more startling. (Continued on page 81)

In 1934, Raft fell in love with Virginia Peine, ex-wife of Edward Lehman, the Chicago department store scion.

WHY WOMEN

In 1939, it was Norma. He asked in vain for a divorce from Grace Mulrooney, from whom he's been separated 15 years.

Now he and Betty Grable are inseparable. They talk baseball together and collaborate on a rumba that's out of this world!

PEINE WITH HER SOPHISTICATE, THEY HAVE ALL

There are three photographs in George Raft's bedroom. One is of Joan, nine-year-old daughter of Virginia Peine. One is Norma Shearer and her two children. The children make it okay, taking the emphasis off romance. Otherwise Norma wouldn't be there, as Virginia isn't. Not that George feels anything but friendliness for either. Only when a break comes, he believes in breaking clean. The third photograph is of Betty Grable, girl of his present. Maybe girl of his future.

That Raft is attractive to women is like saying that the sun rises in the east. On the screen they fall for him because he seems a fellow of infinite experience. Hands that can be tender and hard. Eyes that can melt or paralyze. The brew of love spiked with a hint of danger. Our so-called gentler sex likes it that way.

He doesn't belie his screen personality. Except that it takes a hell of a lot of provocation to make George get tough with a woman. His normal attitude is marked by an outmoded chivalry. If he'd been Sir Walter Raleigh, he'd probably have thrown himself instead of his cloak across the mud for his queen to walk on. He's thoughtful as few men are thoughtful, generous to the point of folly, a close-mouthed worshipper at the shrine of an ideal. "Treats 'em like tissue paper," shrugs his more realistic pal, Mack Gray.

In "Man Power" he had to slap Marlene Dietrich. First he tried to argue Raoul Walsh, the director, out of it. "She's a GIRL! I might hurt her!" Marlene assured him she could take it. "But I can't!" When they finally got him cornered, George closed his eyes tight, struck her and then disappeared, sick to his stomach.

He doesn't cast his women to type. The three who have meant most to him—Virginia Peine, Norma Shearer and Betty Grable—have little but their good looks in common. Yet each represented—and Betty still does—hope of the happiness he's been trying to find through the long years since his marriage was dissolved—in fact, if not in law. His wife's reluctance to divorce him hasn't made the quest easier. But for that, he might have been the husband of Virginia Peine. Which might have been a mistake.

He met her at a Chicago nightclub—a honey-haired beauty, exquisitely dressed, fed up with a marriage that hadn't worked and with the idle life to which she'd been reared, crazy to be an actress. They said little more than hello to each other that night, but her face stayed with him. He glimpsed it again at the Clover Club in Hollywood and grinned to himself. She'd sworn to get to Hollywood, and here she was. "I'll call you," he said, but didn't. Because Mr. Raft doesn't believe in the legend of Mr. Raft, lady killer. He's proud as Lucifer—sensitive to rebuffs, so forces himself on no one—pleased when women like him but never taking their favors for granted. "What happened?" she challenged him when next they met at a cocktail party.

"Afraid I might get to like you too much."

She smiled. "Call me anyway."

That was the beginning, and it lasted four and a half years. Virginia taught George to play bridge. She went dutifully to fights and ball games with him, trying without much success to put her heart into it. He enjoyed taking her out. Any man would have been proud of her. There was nothing she didn't know about how to wear clothes. He'd been building a house for his mother in Coldwater Canyon, but his mother died before it was finished. So he moved Virginia and little Joan in, living himself at a hotel. Liked it better, he said—less fuss. Every once in a while you'd hear that his wife had agreed to a divorce, so he could marry Virginia. Then you'd hear she hadn't.

Maybe that helped break it up. But Virginia's restless ambition helped, too. More than anything else, she wanted a career. It didn't pan out in Hollywood, so she went to England, then to New York, where she started making headway. It became the old story. Can two people, separated by geography, remain close in feeling? In this case they couldn't. Their friends say they'd have parted sooner if it hadn't been for Joan.

She was two when Raft met her mother, and he's laid at her small feet as much love as if she were a child of his own. He's a pushover for kids, anyway. This was a particularly attractive one, whose growth he'd watched from babyhood, who responds to his love with the fervor of a warm heart. She's in New York now with her mother, who got what she wanted—a good part in the Gertrude Lawrence hit, "Lady in the Dark." George thinks that's swell. He thinks Virginia's swell. He sees her in New York when he calls at the house for Joan. But they don't go out together, even on casual dates. As noted above, George prefers (Continued on page 69)

LIFE

WHEN TWO GOOD SKATES GET TOGETHER THEY CAN'T HELP HAVING A WONDERFUL TIME!

BY DOROTHY SPENSLEY

At fourteen Sonja Henie made a prophecy that came perilously close to being the blueprint of her life.

If she had dreamed up the picture of marriage in a far country to a handsome fellow, half Adonis, half Esquire ad, a cavalier who would be Scotch and English and Irish (Sonja's maternal grandmama was Irish), a dashing guy who flew his own plane, played ice hockey, swam, fished, ran a football team, and whose name was Dan Topping, she would have made a one hundred per cent score as a Norwegian Cassandra—but optimistic.

Sonja was already a winner. She had skated off with the world figure-skating championship at Oslo, and then her family's friends got together for a rousing celebration with lots of smorgasbord. It was as the new champ lifted a spoonful of lutefisk to her plate that one of the elders looked paternally down at her.

"And now, little Sonja, are you satisfied?" he asked her. "You have conquered the world with your skates. There is nothing more for you to do."

Sonja tapped the side of her dish decisively with the spoon. "Oh, yes, there is," she declared. "There is much more for me to do. I want to win the Olympics three times; I want to win ten of these figure-skating championships. And I want to go into the movies."

If she added with a quick intake of breath, that she wanted to crown her career by marrying a handsome, wealthy man, she could have built her future, triumph by triumph, on the vision that she wished up for herself. But Henie, then as now, kept a strict silence about men, marriage and love. That was her own personal business. It has always been and always will be.

FOR HENIE IS TOPPING

Single-purposed, Sonja was tensing every muscle in her exercise-hardened body to bring about the fulfilment of one desire—to excel in skating. Love? That was a soft game. Time for that later, she thought.

As the furrier Wilhelm Henie's daughter (three generations in the fur business—no wonder today Sonja loves the luxury of fine furs; prides herself on owning a cape of the world's rare platinum fox skins) she had earned her first honors the hard way. Year after year from the age of eight, she followed the ice over the continent, taking lessons from Europe's finest teachers, entering contests only to come in last, as at Chamonix in '24 when she tried out for the Olympics the first time.

As the honors piled up, there were romance rumors—Jeff Dickson, the sports promoter; Clifford Jeapes, the British film magnate; Jack Dunn, young Cambridge student and aviator—her skating partner on the 1936 tour—might have been the real thing, but his sudden death struck that out.

In Hollywood after Darryl Zanuck signed her to a film contract in 1937, the rumors expanded to horrific size. . . . Richard Greene, Cesar Romero, Tyrone Power (this made a lot of dust), Lee Bowman, Alan Curtis. Through it all Sonja dimpled and was quoted as saying she liked a man who was a "good dancer and had a sense of humor." This was safe talk.

Besides there was her apology for a lack of serious matrimonial intention . . . "too busy." It's the career woman's perfect alibi for a shortage of that thing called love. It might not have been apparent to the gossip-column followers, but it was true of Sonja. There was truth in what she said about being "too busy," but she's just as busy today—and she is very potently married.

The answer is that the Queen of the Ice has met her match—and her mate. The girl who can pull in a million dollars for one short season with her skates and her ability to whip up fairy-like ice extravaganzas has had her mind changed by Dan Topping.

Whether he can change it as far as he would like to, which would include giving up her annual skating tours and giving only occasional exhibitions, is something else again.

The Topping-Henie romance is right out of a book. Piece it together, and you have a perfect romantic scenario.

The tall, tanned Topping is all that any girl could wish for. Although he has been catalogued as a "wealthy playboy" because he seldom seems to be going through the gestures of hard work, he actually works as he plays. His interests lie in a professional football team—the Brooklyn Dodgers—and, in directorial capacity only, in the baseball team of the same name. To satisfy his white-collar instincts he runs an advertising agency, too, handling one of the nation's juiciest accounts, the National Distillers, an organization of about fifty of the country's leading liquor manufacturers.

One evening in January of last year, just as Topping was dressing to attend an ice show at New York's Madison Square Garden, the phone rang, and he found his host at the other end of the wire. "Say, Dan," the phone crackled, "I've just discovered that I have to take the sleeper plane to California. Business. Urgent. Let's not spoil the evening. You take the tickets and use them. I wouldn't want Sonja to think that I had wasted them. She sent them over."

Dan, a little bored perhaps, said, "Sure," he'd go.

To Dan Topping at that precise moment, the name Sonja Henie meant a swell little athlete who was also a swell looker. A girl he had met casually at a party three years before. But that was all. He was, to put it bluntly, fed up with women in general. (Continued on page 71)

Sonja conceals tiny weights in her curls to keep them intact while she does things on ice in 20th Century-Fox's "Sun Valley Serenade," co-starring Johnny Payne.

accent on LOVE

BY GEORGE BENJAMIN

Si and Ellen's merger this summer will be a second try for both. He was married for 5 years to Alice White; she was wed to Fred Wallace for 7 years.

A BOY-MEETS-GIRL STORY—WITH MORE

"Let's go to polo this afternoon," someone suggested. There was an immediate murmur of assent.

Ellen, watching the waiter toss her mixed green salad in the wooden bowl, protested mentally. There were a dozen things she would have preferred doing. It was so dull watching polo unless you happened to know someone who was playing.

She listened to the polite buzz of conversation and laughter shot through occasionally by an enthusiastic greeting as someone joined one of the groups lunching at the parasoled tables that were set in the gardens surrounding the fashionable Racquet Club swimming pool.

Ellen looked up at the peak of San Gorgonio heavy with January snow that towered over the desert. And she marvelled again at fabulous southern California and the fabulous things that had happened to her since she had arrived there. The green salad she had ordered so casually, saying to the waiter "—and bring me a green salad with my fish,"— cost every bit as much as she and her mother had allotted for their dinner in the old days in the Middle West when they had lived on the fifteen dollars a week she had earned as a salesgirl!

Si Bartlett approached their table, women's eyes following him. He was dressed for polo, and his white helmet set off his rich bronze skin.

"Hi there!" He hailed Gladys Wayne, Ellen's friend and house guest.

Gladys began introducing him all round. When she came to Ellen, he said, "Ellen and I have been waving gaily to each other at the studio for years, but I've never been able to get any further than that. Maybe a proper introduction would help."

Ellen held out her hand. "I've heard so much about you, Mr. Bartlett," she said. And all the time she was thinking she never had seen eyes so blue.

"Coming to the game this afternoon?" He addressed everyone, but his eyes never left Ellen.

"Looking forward to it," she assured him. She was looking forward to it now. As she had thought a few minutes before, it made all the difference in the world when you knew someone who was playing.

They settled themselves in the stands as the starting whistle blew. Almost immediately Si made a brilliant play that put his team in the lead.

"Tell me about Si Bartlett," Ellen said to the man next to her. "I know, of course, that he worked on the screen story for 'The Road to Zanzibar,' and that he's done a lot of other successful pictures . . . but what's his background?"

"His real name is Sacha Baraniev—believe it or not," her companion told her, "and he was born in Russia. On his mother's side, he's English. He used to be a newspaper man. And once upon a time, he was married to Alice White."

"He's interesting," Ellen said.

The whistle sounded for the next chukker. And almost immediately a horse and rider went to the ground. A dozen voices took up the cry, "It's Si—it's Si Bartlett!"

Later Ellen and Si left the field in his car. "When you fell—" she said—but she got no further.

"I didn't fall," he told her. "The horse did. And a girl who's going to see as much polo as you are from now on should know about these things."

The trophy he had won rattled, unnoticed, on the seat between them. Later at the Racquet Club, he insisted it was hers.

"Ellen!" Gladys Wayne exclaimed, when they were in the powder room together, "Si's fallen for you—really! Oh, I know that seems ridiculous in this short time—but it's true!"

"How can you be sure?" Ellen wanted to know.

"He gave you his trophy, for one thing," Gladys told her, "and he's never given a trophy to a girl before!"

She glanced at Ellen's reflection in the glass as Ellen powdered her nose. "And you're overboard, too, darling!"

They drank champagne to christen the loving cup. And a pale rim of dawn hung over the mountains when Si headed his car toward Los Angeles.

Six o'clock the next evening he telephoned. "Look," he told Ellen, "I can't come back to Palm Springs. I have to stay in Hollywood and work. But you're between pictures, and you can be anywhere. So how about coming back to Hollywood and giving me a chance to show you what a swell place it can be?"

"I'll start tomorrow around noon, and you can take me to dinner tomorrow night," she said. "And I find you a very discouraging man."

"Why?" he demanded.

"Because," she explained, "you've talked me into cutting short a desert holiday I've been looking forward to for weeks . . . in spite of the fact that it was only last week I promised myself not to stick my neck out again for any man."

She paused. There was no answer. "Si," she said, "are you there? Are you listening?"

"I'm here," he said, "and I'm listening. I'm also wondering if you'll be as pretty in town clothes as you were in those white slacks and that blue coat and that red and white striped sweater, with your hair—that clean, crackly hair of yours—blowing all over your face. And don't ever tell me I don't notice what girls wear. . . . Anyway, by tomorrow night I'll know all! I'll know whether (Continued on page 76)

GENTLE JIM

BY JAMES CARSON

THE MOVIES HAVE HANDED HIM A HEART OF FLINT—BUT THAT CAGNEY TICKER IS STRICTLY FOURTEEN-CARAT!

Jim and his wife Billie dash to Martha's Vineyard whenever the hermit mood hits them. Up there he goes for weeks without a shave or haircut. Steers clear of mirrors and gloats over the fact there's not a phone on the place.

There's ironic humor in the circumstance that Jim Cagney's been typed as a roughneck on the screen. They've varied his ethics and social viewpoint. But gangster or misfit, bully or underdog, the accent remains on fists. Fists at the double. Side-of-the-mouth argot. A tough little sez-you! mick from the sidewalks of New York. I've raked my memory in vain for a picture in which Jimmy talks and acts like himself and doesn't once square off. Maybe there is one. If so, you name it.

It's funny, because you could hunt through twelve counties before finding a man more unlike his screen self than Cagney. Take every label with which he's been tagged by the films and substitute the reverse—for loud-mouthed, reticent—for pugnacious, patient—for hot-headed, tolerant—for lowbrow, cultivated—for moody, courteous—and you'll begin to head somewhere nearer the truth. Even then you won't have the whole story.

For all his practical sense, Cagney's a dreamer, dreaming of a world where justice flourishes and cruelty has no place. His practical sense tells him it's just a dream, his deepest instincts prompt him to do what one man can toward giving it substance. Between the two he sometimes verges on despair—though his balance of humor and ultimate faith keeps him from toppling over. No ostrich, he faces steadily the realities which flay his spirit but has fashioned himself a haven or two for the illusion of escape.

The haven of his place at Martha's Vineyard, for instance, where for a month he can make believe that nothing beyond his gates has the power to touch him. The haven of books—poetry, history and philosophy, by choice. The haven of natural beauty. Climbing among the canyons near his home, he reaches the top and flops, eyes fixed on distance. That's when he gets what a friend calls his "mountain look—so peaceful you'd think he was part of the rock, swear he was going to dig in and stay there forever."

You may ask, "What's he got to run away from, he's done all right for himself." The question misses the point. As a kid he always had some other kid in protective tow. The other kid was generally undersized, underweight and out of step with his world. Jim wasn't so big, either, but he was fearless, as you had to be to cope with the local hoodlums. Born with a stout heart, his mother saw that he kept it. When he came home sporting a shiner, she'd ask him how his adversary had fared. And if he'd been beaten, she'd send him out to fight again.

Because he had courage himself, he could afford to show gentleness for others. It was this gentleness, more than his physical prowess, to which his anemic young protégés clung. They were generally mixed-up kids, unsure of themselves, in need of liking and faith from someone they respected. Quick to recognize and respond to any genuine need, Jim gave them the understanding they craved. His perceptiveness has deepened with the years. At the core of his makeup lies compassion for everything that suffers under the sun. Life has the power to hurt him more than it hurts the less sensitive. That's why he tries to escape it now and then.

He owns a collection of guns any sportsman might envy but has never hunted an animal in his life. He collects the guns for their historic interest. Senseless killing—killing for sport, as it's called—angers him. In Coldwater Canyon, where he lives, deer run across the road at dawn and dusk. Some- (Continued on page 84)

As a kid he yearned to own a boat. Acquired the Martha a few years ago, but got seasick every time he cruised on it. Finally gave it to brother Bill, who's his manager.

Loves stag dinners with Spence, Pat O'Brien, Frank McHugh and Lynne Overman. Most of them knew each other when. They kid Jim about his pre-$4,500-a-week days in vaudeville.

Is the fair-haired boy at Warners, where he's been under contract for eleven years, and gets along like a million with the studio's jovial vice-president Charles Einfeld.

What clothes have

BY ADELE WHITELY FLETCHER

REGINALD GARDINER

"Women's heads are the thing that annoy me. I think the way women do their hair today is terrible. They shellac and lacquer it and have a roll of the evening paper, or something of the sort, over one ear, and something else bobbing around on the top of their head. Why can't women just have their hair loosely waved and leave it alone?"

GEORGE SANDERS

"The less seen the more intriguing! If a woman has a wonderful figure and she exposes it, there's nothing to it—she's impersonal, like a nude statue. Whereas when a woman wears things that conceal—in a clever way—she's exciting. I like the clothes of the Edwardian period best."

BOB HOPE

"I'm awfully sick of slacks. I don't think slacks are feminine at all.

You know what I like—lace cuffs and neck things. I don't know whether I'm a little nancy, but they kill my very soul and they're very sexy."

TYRONE POWER

"Anything with frills I think is frightful! I go for tailored things. They have the same attraction for men that a man's uniform has for women. And you know how that is—a girl is keen about a fellow in his uniform, but when he comes home on leave and gets into the tired suit that's hanging in his closet, he loses his charm. She won't even go to the movies with him."

LOUIS HAYWARD

"I think the most attractive thing a woman can wear is an evening gown with Victorian shoulders. And I like peasant clothes—simple things. There's too much suggestion today. The old Victorian idea was much better."

SEX APPEAL?

Here's something on which those Hollywood boys are quite ready to go to town!

JOSEPH COTTEN

"I'm a sucker for all the things men like—tailored clothes and frilly white collars and cuffs. Very elaborate evening clothes, too. And nothing in between. The ones I don't like are called afternoon dresses and garden party frocks."

STIRLING HAYDEN

"Sweaters are awfully nice. The tighter clothes are, the more appeal they have. That's plain rudiments. Put a good-looking girl in a tight anything, or a loose anything, and you get the difference right off. (This is for publication. I have to watch myself.)

I don't like heels that are neither high nor low. Low heels are all right for sport. But high heels do things for a girl's legs. I don't like ankle straps, either. Wedges are abominable—and that's praising them!"

GEORGE MONTGOMERY

"I think tailored clothes have the most sex appeal, and I'm glad to have a chance to talk about the built-up soles girls are wearing. Maybe I'm old-fashioned, but I don't go for them at all. To my notion they make girls look as if they were walking with a bunch of mud on their feet."

JACKIE COOPER

"I think women's clothes should fit their figures, but I sure don't go for dresses so tight a girl can scarcely breathe in them. You can tell a lot about a girl by the taste she uses in her clothes. I don't like bare midriffs and gowns which are cut much too low. I like sports clothes in the daytime, neat and not fussy—and really feminine clothes for evening—you know, dainty and floaty and pale colors."

BOMBER"

BY SYLVIA KAHN

Honey-haired Jean Ames is 5' 2½", weighs 105 lbs.

A THRILL-A-MINUTE MOVIE MADE UNDER THE HAWK-EYED SUPERVISION OF THE U. S. NAVY

SCREAMING Stuka dive bombers, dropping horror from European skies, have exploded American interest in a war weapon that never seemed important before. These devils of death, inventions of German warlords, have caused a jittery United States to look cloudward at its own bomber division and to search anxiously for Uncle Sam's answer to the destruction-dealers from abroad.

And Warner Brothers have looked, too. Looked hard and found in the steel-winged monsters of the Navy sufficient drama to embrace the talents of Errol Flynn, Fred MacMurray, Ralph Bellamy, Regis Toomey and a thousand others. At the Naval Air Base in San Diego and on Stage 16 at the studio, Warners have Technicolored a $1,500,000 air epic Americans will not soon forget.

The story of "Dive Bomber," thrilling to U. S. audiences, will completely shock our Fascistic brethren. For "Dive Bomber" is not concerned with those who kill, but with those who save. Its heroes, Mr. Hitler will be surprised to learn, are doctors—a small army of medical wizards known as flight surgeons.

Advances in aviation have produced planes able to soar from 40,000 to 50,000 feet, altitudes at which man cannot survive without mechanical assistance. Such physical disturbances as pilot fatigue, high altitude sickness and night blindness, brought on by flying into rarefied atmospheres, have sent many a pilot crashing to his death. In "Dive Bomber" you will see what medical men (Flynn and Bellamy) and flying men (MacMurray and Toomey) are doing to make fliers altitude-resistant.

Like all Hollywood movies, "Dive Bomber" has its frothier side, too. Froth-provider is stately, blonde, 20-year-old Alexis Smith who is to the plot what a ruffle is to a lamb chop—not essential to the principal ingredient, but so eye-appealing as to make digestion that much pleasanter. She and another ruffle, soft-cheeked, bedimpled Jean Ames, appear briefly in a night club scene.

Filmed as it was, under the surveillance of the Navy, "Dive Bomber" could not offer its cast and crew the plushy conveniences of a studio-controlled production. At San Diego, the entire company rolled out of bed at 6 A. M., ate box lunches prepared by the nearby Hotel Del Coronado, wore numbered identification tags, submitted to fingerprinting and paid more heed to the Navy's seven technical advisers than to the director, Mike Curtiz. Flynn, an alien till next December, had to secure special Navy Department permission to enter the base; MacMurray was besieged by women who tried sneaking into his hotel room, crawling through his window and peeping over his transom; Regis Toomey dropped seven pounds after a single day of working in a stifling high-altitude suit; and all three were exhausted by 1,500 off-duty sailors who pestered for autographs.

At the studio the same strenuous working conditions held good. A Navy man was on hand constantly, okaying dialogue, passing on costumes and sets, and seeing to it that nothing undignified or embarrassing to his department sneaked into the picture. Explosive, interfered-with Mike Curtiz summed it up in his inimitable manner: "It's the most unheard of thing I ever heard of. What happened to me shouldn't happen to a dog—but it did!"

Flynn sailed his boat, the Sirocco, down to location at North Island Air Training Station and entertained the 150 members of cast and crew practically nightly.

MacMurray with film flight surgeons Flynn and Bellamy. Ralph is terrifically subject to seasickness, but took an 11,000 foot power dive in 9 seconds without a qualm!

Eddie Albert used to be a $100-a-month traveling salesman; now hits Warners for $1,000 a week. Has his first dead-serious role in "Out of the Fog," which co-stars Lupino and Garfield.

Real name's Edward Albert Heimberger. Abbreviated it because everyone called him Hamburger. Dates very rarely, but when he does he runs the gamut—from Joan Leslie to Maria Ouspenskaya.

The general idea seems to be that Eddie Albert is something they let out of a cage. His fans believe—after reading publicity about him—that he exercises on a convenient chandelier, vacations in a monastery, eats standing on his head, devotes his talents to giving timid folks the hot-foot and is a relentless, unmitigated extrovert, a zany and a screwball.

Well, if you prefer hokum to fact, then you may go on believing that tripe. But if you are one who likes his stuff straight, then the fact is that Eddie Albert is a very, very sane character, intelligent almost to brilliance, with a great tolerance, a love of people and an appreciation of life itself. As an actor, Albert knows his art better than some Academy Award winners; as a human, he is a champion of the Little Man, and he feels there are more important things to do than to entertain.

"Maybe it's okay if people think I'm a screwball," the good-natured 33-year-old charmer explained to us one afternoon while placing a diet of Bach on his automatic phonograph. "I'll tell you a secret, though I suppose I shouldn't. I actually encourage those who think I'm an unreliable nut. It suits me fine. I'm then considered, by most of my contacts, an erratic and forgivable eccentric who is harmless and not to be regarded as serious. Fine. It gives me more time to be really serious!

"You see, most people are so weighed down with obligations, appointments, promises and so forth, that they haven't time to do the constructive things they want to do. But since I am labeled a screwball simply because I've done comic roles on the screen, and because I've pretended to be absent-minded and easy-going, I am not bothered by the unnecessary—by non-essential get-togethers, by parties, by hot air. People look at me, and they say, 'Oh, that Eddie Albert, he'll forget. You can't depend on him, he's a screwball.' So they let me alone. And then I have the precious time to do the things I consider vital for my part in this world."

And when he told us what things he considered vital, we learned the serious side of a so-called daffy.

He claimed that, aside from his career, upon which he works extremely hard, there were two types of outside indulgences that required his time and energy. First, a billion projects he wished to start and sponsor which in small ways might benefit other human beings. Second, an endless number of personal dreams for his own enjoyment that he wished to convert into electric realities.

Which was fine. But at this point we requested Eddie Albert to become more specific.

He was a little self-conscious about injecting the personal pronoun into the conversation. And was afraid that in a short interview he could only pass along a superficial idea of the items of living that magnetized his attention.

"But look," he said, "if you really insist, I'll try."

We insisted. And Eddie Albert tried.

"Well, here's the type of thing I devote my time to," said Eddie Albert. "The South American situation, for example. Two years ago I ran into a lot of smuggled literature which made me realize that Nazi fifth column activities in South America were terrific. And furthermore, if it continued, the Nazis would have a toehold on our hemisphere.

"I promptly began working out a thorough plan for greater unity between North America and South America. I felt it was important. Life or death. I worked as much as twenty hours a day on it. This plan, to draw the South American republics away from the Nazis and closer to the Stars and Stripes, involved sending good will ambassadors, making documentary films, giving the Latin nations a bigger economic break, having our networks extend their broadcasts to Brazil and Argentine and Peru and so on. I took my entire plan to Jack Warner. That was a year and a half ago. He liked it and sent it along to Secretary of State Cordell Hull. He, too, was extremely interested.

"But at that time, we weren't yet threatened directly by Fascism, so our government thought my plan a trifle premature. But today in the face of the menace, almost everything I helped work out is being applied by our nation. We are sending ambassadors of good will like Doug Fairbanks; we are making movies of Juarez and Bolivar, and Julien Bryan is shooting documentary films of the Latins; and the big local networks are spreading our influence to the South—all toward unity, understanding and defense.

"And that, in brief, is just one of the outside things I am interested in."

We asked Eddie Albert for another sample. And he said, "Well, then there was the vitamin oil I wanted to extract from shark's liver." We shuddered. That sounded a trifle on the screwy side.

It seems that several years ago Eddie Albert discovered it was possible to obtain a vitamin oil necessary to ailing human bodies, from the liver of the deep-sea shark. It was a great discovery. Of importance to the health of man. And as soon as Eddie learned for certain this vitamin oil would cure, he went on a big campaign to market it. But at this point, you will note the rare difference between Eddie Albert (Continued on page 73)

Lips that Lure

BY CAROL CARTER

Next to eyes and facial planes, formed by the bone structure of your face, lips are your most important feature. Their size, shape, mobility and make-up reveal your habits, character and disposition, whether you realize it or not. Lips talk mighty loud without ever uttering a word, and the face of an otherwise lovely girl can be utterly marred by lips that are too broad, too narrow or just nondescript.

Hollywood stars have one advantage over other ordinary damsels, for they must practice diction constantly, and there is no better way to keep lips soft, flexible and appealing. They practice laughing, smiling, whistling, puckering and do all sorts of plain and fancy exercises as regularly as you put powder on your nose. Their lips are under such complete control that they can register either slight or deep emotion by the most fleeting of expressions.

Here are a few of Hollywood's lip tricks: Open your mouth wide when you talk. Make your lips work to form your words. It's good for them. Turn up the corners of your mouth and smile. It pretties lips as well as dispositions. Laugh more and loosen up those harsh, set (Continued on page 82)

CREAMS PROTECT SKIN AGAINST SUMMER SUN, WIND AND ALSO WATER

POWDER FOR SUMMER SHOULD BE RICH TONED AND FINE TEXTURED

M-G-M'S VIRGINIA GREY TANS CAUTIOUSLY AT FIRST summer MAKE-UP

Are you getting ready for a summer jaunt to a camp in the mountains or at the beach? Perhaps you're going on a cruise—or maybe you are settling right down at home to keep cool. In any case, if you are a normal, beauty-conscious girl, you're faced with that annual question of how to protect your skin and still have a rip-roaring good time outdoors.

You have a problem, but you don't have to fret about it. All of your favorite young screen stars—Linda Darnell, Nan Grey, Deanna Durbin, Olivia de Havilland, Rita Hayworth, Gene Tierney and the rest—have found an easy solution. All these girls have to spend plenty of time in the sun each day during outdoor scenes, yet they can't afford to get blistered and red. So to play safe, they use sunburn preventives lavishly, whether they're going out for only half an hour or on an all-day location trip.

The sun's your best ally to beauty and vitality—if you know how much of it is good for you! It's full of health-giving ultra-violet rays which act on the sterols of your skin and change them to Vitamin D. The presence of a sufficient amount of this important sunshine vitamin in your system gives you a clear skin, strong bones, good digestion, steady nerves and lots of energy. You can store up this energy from the sun pleasantly and easily by getting outdoors frequently, and also by including cod liver and halibut liver oils, irradiated butter, milk and ice cream in your regular diet.

But it's important, too, to know how far to go in catering to the sun. More sunshine than your body needs will burn and dry your skin and cause endless discomfort.

You may be one of those fortunate brunettes whose skin has even pigment distribution and who takes to tanning like a duck to water. But don't rush the process and neglect to use sunburn preventives unless you want your skin to become downright leathery and very dry. Fifteen minutes isn't too short a time to spend beneath the sun's penetrating rays your first day out. A good sun-tan properly acquired, layer after layer, is much more even and lasting—and is a grand protection from an overdose of ultra-violet penetration, besides helping you to withstand extremes in heat and cold.

If you have brown hair, medium to dark eyes and fairly strong skin texture, you probably can achieve a rich golden tan. Cover yourself generously with a good coat of cream, oil or sun-tan lotion—and take five minutes on each side the first day, increasing the time five minutes for each side every day thereafter.

If you are a fair, delicate-complexioned blonde, redhead or even brownette whose skin seems to freckle and burn at the slightest exposure, your dream of a deep tawny sun-tan had better be modified to a light golden shade. Your delicate skin with its uneven pigment distribution just isn't geared to absorbing much sunshine—and you probably get all the sunshine vitamin you need from just plain skyshine, those reflected, indirect light rays that are almost as penetrating as direct sunshine. You should protect your skin with lotions and creams even on cloudy days, if you plan to spend much time outdoors. Whenever you go swimming, slather yourself with sunburn preventives, and don't bask in the sun unless you dry thoroughly and cover yourself with a fresh coat of lotion and protector.

If your heart is set on a sun-tan before you have time to safely acquire one, you can always use a natural-looking make-up foundation on arms, legs, face and neck—for a glowing outdoor color.

No matter what type of skin you have, give it special attention after sunning. Go a little easy on water and friction for a few days, using light cleansing creams and lotions to keep your skin soft and supple. If you've been overzealous in your sun-worshipping to the tune of a mild burn, you'll find talcum powder very soothing. For a more serious burn there are a number of soothing ointments, creams and lotions that speed healing.

Your summer vacation and your idea of enjoyment may mean spending hours on the beach and frequent dips in the ocean, so be sure to take into consideration the effects of salt water on your skin. Although stimulating, it has a decided drying effect. And you'll need to keep yourself well covered with oily lotions and creams.

Important to your summer glamour, too, is the care you take of your complexion and the make-up you choose to go with your tan.

More than ever in summer time your skin needs the protection of light cleansing and foundation creams to protect its satiny texture. If you can't wash your face for a few days, you can cleanse it with a light cream and facial tissues, or cotton saturated with a fragrant cleansing lotion. You'll find that your lotions, skin fresheners and creams will be much more refreshing and (Continued on page 67)

WARTIME HOUSE GUESTS

Hollywood's opened its heart and its purse to dozens of little Britishers—whose sole complaint is that "the war's a nuisance"

Roddy McDowall is twelve. A slim, wigglesome twelve with chocolate-colored eyes and a brown forelock of straight hair which he keeps shoving away from his brow as he tells about the teacher-priest at his school, St. Joseph's College on Beulah Hill, London, who climbed into a hole left by a time bomb. . . .

"The Jerries dropped the bomb, and it fell through to the school cellar. Father went down to see how much damage had been done, and someone threw a pitcherful of water in after him. They didn't know he was there!" says Roddy with small-boy glee.

There are many little boys and girls like Roderick Andrew McDowall of London, England, in Hollywood this season. About twenty or twenty-five in all. The British Consulate in the Southern California city says twenty-five, thinks there must be more, wishes they would all register with the Consulate "in case of trouble." They hasten to add that there has been no "trouble" so far.

The arrival in America of little boys like Roddy and little girls like Gracie and Primrose and Ursula began over a year ago and continued under the eye of our State Department, the United States Committee for the Care of European Children and, in Los Angeles, the International Institute. The children are in this country only for the duration of the war, and a ruling of the British government makes their adoption into American homes impossible.

The flow of evacuées stopped almost entirely with the shelling and sinking of the ship, City of Benares, with its tragic loss of child life. Parents in England felt they would rather have their little ones stay at home and face the perils of aerial warfare than to subject them to the terrifying and inevitable risk of submarine attack on a wide and deep ocean.

So it is that grave, well-mannered children, a poignant handful of them, have found their way to Hollywood and now remind the film colony that there is war almost everywhere, and that only in America can children still play peacefully.

"It is so hard to know how to comfort these children," says Conrad Veidt on the set of Columbia's "Tonight Belongs to Us." "My wife and I have with us the young son—he's thirteen—of my good friend and physician in London, Dr. Wigram. Clive came to us last August, and the next month we entered him in military school.

"He's such a child in some ways, and in others he is a grown man, fully matured by being separated from his parents, whom he misses very much. There are many times that my wife and I would like to treat him as a child, pamper him, humor him, as we might a child of our own, but there is much of the Spartan in Clive. He is lonely in this country in spite of the boys at the school—Urban, and he holds aloof from any babyish overtures that we are tempted to make.

"It is tragic, this circumstance, because it is re-enacted in many other cases of the evacuées who are in this country. There is deep sentiment in all the children—I have seen Clive prop up pictures of his mother and father before him as he writes to them. But the children find themselves in bewildering situations, trying to adapt themselves to a country that is so (Continued on page 79)

American film-making's a cinch to Roddy McDowall, who made British films under fire last year. That's part of an anti-aircraft shell he's exhibiting to his teacher.

Clive Wigram, son of Conrad Veidt's good friend and London physician, is the Veidts' house guest for "the duration." After school, he has fun visiting Connie on the set of Columbia's "Tonight Belongs To Us."

It happened one night—

Red-haired Dorothy's a blonde in "Citizen Kane." Original film name was Linda Winters, but she reverted to her own Dutch tag upon learning there were 6 other Lindas in movies.

Dorothy Comingore had a blind date in Hollywood a few months back with a man wearing a black beard. His name was Orson Welles. As a result, people today are gasping "Citizen Kane" and "Dorothy Comingore" in the same amazed breath and wondering where in the world delicious Dorothy has been all their lives.

The answer is: She's been right around Hollywood telling producers she was good and begging for a Chinaman's chance to prove it but collecting, instead, snubs, suspensions and pink slips that said, "You're fired!"

Dorothy Comingore is the girl the Hollywood studio Pooh Bahs pooh-poohed right up until the public got a peek at "Citizen Kane." If you say her last tag very fast it sounds like "Come-and-Go," which very neatly sums up Dottie's dreary movie career Before Welles. She had been fired more than a furnace and dropped oftener than a hot dish—before a phony press agent gag stepped her out with Beau Orson one night, and he faintly remembered her when casting got tough on "Citizen Kane."

Even while that resounding triumph (which may well become the greatest motion picture of all time) was shooting, the dear old Hollywood geniuses still kicked Dorothy around.

You'll be glad to know, I'm sure, that such foolish shenanigans are things of the past with Dorothy Comingore right now, and a comfortable contract is at last on ice.

So from slavey to queen, she boils right down to one of those Hollywood Cinderellas you've been reading about, with Orson Welles in the role of Prince Charming. Or does she?

If Dorothy's feet are tripping airily around on glass slippers, she's also rubbing ruefully another section of her classy chassis which still aches from boots downstairs. If she's Cinderella, Dorothy is Cinderella the hard way.

The day I saw her in her trim little North Hollywood house, she was running true to form. Her brand new baby daughter had just fallen on her head, and the Scotch nurse had been carted off minutes before in an ambulance with acute appendicitis. Despite this domestic crisis, Dorothy emerged serene and beautiful.

She has hazel-green eyes that catch sparks of gold from a glorious mop of curly red hair, her own red, too, not a bottle's. Her skin is white as morning cream, her hands are classic, her mouth is wide and rosy. When she smiles, you know she has sex; when she talks, you know she's got brains. In the figure department—well—Dorothy's silhouette has had a career all of its own, that's been part of the trouble.

But all that's fairly along in the sad story. Comingore catastrophes began bunching hits long before. When Dorothy was six and a spunky little native daughter of Los Angeles, her folks took her to a neighborhood movie, and it happened to be amateur night. When they called out for the amateurs, Dottie, to her mother's horror, bounced right up on the stage, improvised a Pavlova ballet and won first prize—a crate of cantaloupes. The tragedy was —Mrs. Comingore wouldn't let her keep the cantaloupes!

From that time right up to the coming of Welles everything connected with show business had handed Dorothy a push in the mush, one way or another. There have been times when she wished she'd followed her childhood yearning to be a Carmelite nun. Times, too, when Dorothy wished she'd stayed in the University of California and collected a degree in philosophy of religion, as she started out to do.

Instead Dorothy listened to the Red Gods calling and ditched the Berkeley campus for Taos, New Mexico. "I don't know why exactly," said Dorothy, "except that I'd read D. H. Lawrence." Every lady in Taos is supposed to have been the great English writer's dream girl, and maybe the lure of getting the lowdown on great love affairs was what did it. Instead of cutting a gay figure in the world of art and letters, however, Dorothy ended with a job dusting off relics in the Kit Carson museum there and odd jobbing around the plaza. But she got in on the fringe of dramatics and absorbed some art and a great deal of independence and courage, also the capacity to live on air, which is a good thing for a prospective actress to learn. There were times when people had to take up collections to keep the Comingore soul and body on speaking terms.

The next stop on Dorothy's dash to destiny was a place called Downieville, California. It's up in the old Forty-Niner gold rush country away from practically everywhere. Why did she go there? "Have you ever been to Downieville?" inquired Dorothy. "Well—it's so pretty. Little houses hang on hillsides and things. I worked in a restaurant waiting tables. In the evenings I fooled around high school plays."

The combination of career and cooking worked in Carmel, which is pretty, too, where Dorothy blithely rattled as soon as she could collect enough tips to buy an ancient flivver. Carmel has a Little Theatre that's fairly famous and which was practically the big time to Comingore after Taos and Downieville. But nobody saw any reason to make her a star even there. They let her sew costumes, though, and fool around the wings while she earned her board and keep at a dude ranch in the Carmel Valley. "Then the cook left," sighed Dorothy, "and they put the apron on me. The ranch had a reputation for wonderful homemade bread, and I'd never baked a loaf in my life. I didn't work there very long."

Dorothy thinks the less said about her efforts to eat in artistic Carmel, the better. She dwelt in leaky shanties and never saw a pair of silk stockings. To support herself, her two cats and sheepdog, she (Continued on page 88)

Daughter Judith Melinda is six months old, with bright red hair and huge blue eyes. Her mom, who's Mrs. Richard Collins around the house, will be twenty-six on August 24.

IT'S A HECK OF A

James Craig went to college for seven years—but not because he was stupid! He went that long because he was smart. He wanted an education that would equip him for any number of things, not just one. But he never dreamed that, among other things, he was equipping himself to crash Hollywood.

"When I was back in Texas fumbling passes," he says, with a grin and a hint of a Texas drawl, "I thought of actors as a bunch of sissies. The locker-room talk about 'the Little Theatre group' was pretty bawdy."

If somebody had told him five years ago that he was just the type to get up in front of a movie camera and talk love to somebody like Ginger Rogers, he would have kayoed him. And don't think he couldn't have! He's 6 feet 2½ inches, weighs 190 pounds, and played fullback.

But nobody thought of telling him five years ago, or ever: "You ought to be in the movies." The first time he heard those fateful words was when he said them to himself.

It wasn't that he suddenly fancied his looks. What he suddenly fancied was the kind of salaries that Hollywood paid. He's disarmingly frank about it.

"I grew up with just one ambition," he says. "To make money. It sounds cynical, but it's the truth. And why not tell the truth?"

When Jim was 17, his father lost all his worldly wealth. He later made another fortune, but in the meantime Jim got a pretty good idea of what it was like to be without money.

His father was (and is) a building contractor, who traveled all over the country on construction projects—a fact that may partly explain Jim's own wanderlust. Also, his great-grandfather was part Cherokee. "From all I hear," says Jim, "he liked to move around, too. All my other ancestors were farmers. They stuck close to home."

On February 4, 1912, his dad's construction project was in Nashville, Tennessee—so Nashville became Jim's birthplace. And James Henry Meador became his name.

"Hollywood didn't change it. I did. 'Meador' sounded like a bad word in Spanish. I don't know where I got the 'Craig.' From the play, 'Craig's Wife,' I guess."

While he was growing up along with several brothers, the family moved all over the country—to Kansas, to New York, to Richmond, to Florida, but Nashville still remained their home-town.

"That's where I went to school. And I was always terrible in English. That is, until the eighth grade. Then I ran into a little old teacher, as tough as nails—she must be 85 now, but she's still teaching—and when she got through with me, I knew grammar. Before that I didn't see any sense in worrying about it. Nobody ever gave me a reason why a subject should be this, and a predicate should be that. But she did. So I stopped being a rugged individualist as far as grammar was concerned."

But not as far as education in general was concerned.

"Seven of us decided we didn't like going to a big city high school. We all fancied ourselves as tough muggs, and we didn't like the discipline. We had to study too hard to play football. So we went together and bought an old broken-down Ford and drove out to a country high school every day and played football out there. Nobody in Nashville would have given ten cents for the futures of any of us, but we're all doing all right today."

The year Jim graduated from high school was the year that his Dad lost his money. That was 1929.

"The gloom was pretty thick around home that summer. There was a lot of talk about how I probably couldn't go away to college. I decided I'd light out and bum around the country a little and see if I couldn't find a college that would take me even if I didn't have a bank book. I sort of had my eye on a couple here on the West Coast.

"Even if I didn't have any luck, I figured the change of scenery would do me a whole lot of good.

Jim has two women after him in RKO's "The Devil and Daniel Webster"—Simone Simon (above), who's making a film comeback, and co-star Anne Shirley.

MOST OF US'LL SETTLE FOR SOME MOONLIGHT AND SUN ON OUR SUMMER VACATIONS, BUT JIM CRAIG HELD OUT FOR A MOVIE CONTRACT!

SENSATION!

"I got a ride first to New Orleans. Then I hitch-hiked to Houston, which was a town I liked. It had a lot of attractions, including cute gals. I was in a lunch-car there when a young guy on the next stool said, friendly-like, 'You look as if you might play football.' One thing led to another, and I told him how I was scouting around, looking for a college that needed one more football player. He said, 'How about going to Rice?'

"I had never heard of it. In those days, it didn't get on the sports pages—although it was all right scholastically. He said it was outside Houston. 'Why don't you go out and talk with the business manager?' he said. Which is exactly what I did.

"He said Rice needed football (Continued on page 86)

He has black hair, brown eyes and a fascinating scar on his left cheek. Is a whiz at boxing and golf. Mad about music, but hates to dance.

29-year-old James gets over 1,000 fan letters a week—mostly from smitten gals in their twenties. Admits he gets a huge kick out of them.

EARTHQUAKE HITS GRABLE! GODDARD FEUDS WITH CRAWFORD! MAE WEST TO BE CO-STARRED WITH BARRYMORE!

WHY NOT BE PRACTICAL?
It's terrific! It's colossal! It's fantastic! We mean the story going around about a certain sensational star and her ambitious business-man husband. Seems the star took a nose dive for a handsome actor in her last picture. Being fair and open about things, she went to her husband and told him of her infatuation. As was to be expected, the husband raved and ranted. Cornering her in their living room, he shouted till the walls shook. "That guy!" he screamed. "That second-rater! I'm ashamed of you! Why couldn't you go for the star? He could do you some good!"

CAN IT LAST FURLONG?
A friend of ours went to the racetrack with George Raft, Betty Grable and George's shadow, Mack Grey. Our friend reports that George and Betty each bet on different horses in the big race. But when the bangtails began to run, George didn't even follow his. He watched Betty's instead and shouted wildly for it to come in first. When it finally did, he was delirious with joy. "You won, Betty," he cried. "You won!" Betty was thrilled, too, but a little concerned about George's loss. George shrugged it off. "Mine wasn't important," he said. "But you won. That's all that counts!" Our friend walked with Mack Grey to the cashier's window. "By the way," our friend asked. "How much did they bet?" Grey grinned broadly. "Well," he answered, "Betty had two dollars down. And George—he bet five hundred!" Our friend doesn't understand about such things. But our psychiatrist does. He insists love and insanity are often only a shade apart.

PLAYBOY
Don Ameche is a model man. But he has one besetting sin. He's an incurable practical joker. Betty Grable still wakes up in the night shivering with the memory of a stunt Don pulled on her when they were doing "Moon Over Miami." Betty stepped into her dressing room to change her costume when suddenly, without warning, the entire room began to shake violently. Back and forth it rolled while Betty slid from wall to wall, and the furniture thumped around her. Betty was terrified. "Get me out of here," she screamed. "It's an earthquake! Help!" Then as quickly as it had come, the "earthquake" subsided. Trembling, Betty found her way to the door. And there, grinning with joy, stood Don Ameche. Delightedly he told her what had happened. When Betty wasn't looking, he and his stand-in had slid a hand-truck under the dressing room floor. As soon as Betty closed the door, they had proceeded to work it with all their might! Betty just looked at Don. She didn't say a word. She was glad she still had her teeth.

DISA AND DATA
The built-up bosom Jack Benny sports in "Charley's Aunt" has earned him the title of "Hollywood's Number One Sweater Boy" . . . Virginia Gilmore's idea of fun is setting off on a fishing trip all by her lonesome . . . The late Doug Fairbanks, Sr., never ordered fewer than two dozen suits and 25 pairs of trousers at a single clip . . . In "Birth of the Blues" Paramount will feature flashes of nine musicians whom they consider the most famous in the popular field They're Ted Lewis, Benny Goodman, Duke Ellington, W. C. Handy, Tommy and Jimmy Dorsey and Louis Armstrong. A photograph of the late George Gershwin will complete the roster . . . George Brent's newest gift to Ann Sheridan, his honey, is a kinkajou (tame, fuzzy—but meat-eating) named "Honey" . . . Universal has a unique method for keeping the tears out of Baby Sandy's eyes. When Sandy turns on the sprinkle, the camera records her tears to show her how horrid little girls look when they cry . . . The Hays office is at it again. Their newest decree demands that actors keep at least one foot on the floor during love scenes . . . Carole Lou Costello, Lou's two-and-a-half-year-old, has a brief spot in her pappy's "In the Navy" . . . This older generation: Mickey Rooney's father now goes around doing imitations of the Mick!

Rumor has it that Anne Shirley and John Payne are expecting an addition. Their first will be a year old this July.

MARRIED LOVE DEPT.
For a full year Brenda Joyce has been occupied with personal appearance tours, industry's good will trips and getting herself married. In fact, in the last twelve months Brenda's done everything but work in pictures. So when she checked in at the studio the other A.M. to report for "Private Nurse," she was just as jittery as she was the first time she faced a camera. Putting on her make-up, she nervously dabbed some mascara on her eyeball. Adjusting her eyeglasses, her twitching fingers let them slip to the floor where they shattered. And finally, to cap it all, on leaving the lot she smacked her car into a lamp post and accordion-pleated her fender! "But it took all of that to show me how really sweet my husband is," Brenda told us. "The next morning Owen was awake at dawn, prepared my breakfast and served it up while I lay in bed like a duchess. He insisted on driving me to the studio, also. But by that time I wasn't scared any more. I realized I hadn't the right to be—certainly not while I'm married to a man like that!"

DIDJA KNOW
That Douglas Wilhoit became a Catholic before wedding Olympe Bradna . . . That the Anthony Quinns, whose first child died so tragically, are expecting the stork again . . . That Merle Oberon never saw her father. He died three months before she was born . . . That Mae West and John Barrymore will co-emote in "Not Tonight, Josephine" . . . That before embarking on a recent 12-day trip, Ray Milland sneaked out to buy a dozen gifts and presented one a day to his stunning wife . . . That a popular movie hero wears a chest wig for he-man roles . . . That a resolution entered in the New Hampshire State Legislature would make every April 5th a legal holiday known as Bette Davis Day. That's Bette's birthday . . . That George Raft hopes to ditch acting and turn author . . . He's begun to write but claims he can't get it down on paper the way he thinks it in his head . . . That at Garbo's own suggestion her dressing room has blue walls and a yellow ceiling . . . That Alice Faye's groom's real name is Wonga P. Harris?

LOVIN' BLOOM
Contradicting columnists who insist his love interests are of international scope, embracing French-born Michele Morgan, Swedish-born Greta Garbo and German-born Marlene Dietrich, Jean Gabin has gone U.S.A. in a great big way. Strictly on the Q.T., we have learned his top romantic choice is Missouri's own Ginger Rogers. He phones her often and sends her daily gifts of flowers. Not ordinary flowers, mind you, but heavily-scented French lilacs, which are twice as big as the garden-variety lilac and twice as expensive. But that isn't why Monsieur Gabin sends them. He sends them because they are his favorite posies reserved for his favorite femmes. That's all we know at the moment. You can add it up any way you like.

SHORT(S) SUBJECT
Keep your eyes on the Paulette Goddard-Joan Crawford feud. It's going to go places! About six months ago Paulette trained to New York, dropped in on designer Hattie Carnegie and snagged the most original Carnegie creation of the year—silk shorts for evening wear. She toted her treasure back to Hollywood, wore the outfit at one or two dinner parties and then retired the shorts temporarily, preferring to wait for an appropriate occasion before springing them on the public at large. So far, so good. But just the other morning Paulette picked up her favorite newspaper and read therein that "Movietown's brilliant style-setter," Joan Crawford was about to introduce a great idea in feminine fashion—silk shorts for evening wear! Those who are close to Paulette say no one is going to steal her thunder, intentionally or otherwise. She won't stand for it. So Hollywood looks forward to a nice, juicy pistol duel and secretly hopes both girls appear in silk shorts for evening wear!

Bob Hope and showgirl Alaine Brandeis were among the 1200 guests at NBC's $25,000 blowout for Jack Benny.

Maureen O'Sullivan's hubby Jack Farrow signed up with the Canadian fleet. Gets home occasionally for 10 days.

Most famous profiles at Rudy Vallee's shindig celebrating his pop's birthday were W. C. Fields' and J. Barrymore's.

DITTO
Anne Shirley doesn't suspect it, but when her fourth wedding anniversary rolls around (in August), hubby John Payne will clasp a tricky token of his love on her wrist. It's a slender gold bracelet hung with a heart-shaped locket. On the locket John has had engraved the words: "To match the golden heart you already have." And some folks will tell you that the flame blows out within a year!

MONKEYS AND MAUREEN
Don't mention monkeys to Maureen O'Sullivan! She's allergic to 'em! Especially after her last trip East. One sunny morning, New York's ex-Governor Alfred E. Smith took Maureen and her son on an excursion to the Central Park Zoo. Everything was going fine till they reached the monkey house. As they stepped through the door, one of the zoo attendants recognized Maureen as Tarzan's jungle wife. Recalling her screen adventures with Cheetah the Chimp, the attendant was certain she'd be passionately interested in his own furry charges. He promptly sat her down and for three solid hours plied her with information about apes and baboons! When she at last escaped, Maureen was ready to scream. What she'd have loved to tell the attendant, but didn't dare mention, was that Cheetah is the only member of the monkey family she knows—and she doesn't even like Cheetah because the impish chimp always tries to bite her!

THE AWFUL TRUTH
Bob Hope is under the influence. Working in Paramount's "Nothing But the Truth" has made an honest man of him. He can't tell a lie anymore! Guesting a column for newspaperman Harrison Carroll, Bob let fly the following horrifying, incredible but, he swears—nonetheless true items. Says Bob: "They never allow Clark Gable on the 'Tarzan' sets. It aggravates the elephants . . . Marlene Dietrich does not have the most beautiful pins in Hollywood. The Sunset Bowling Alleys do . . . The army made a mistake when it accepted Jimmy Stewart. They now have six colonels and a major-general answering his fan mail . . . Paulette Goddard does not possess the most gorgeous figure in the world. The Aga Khan does . . . Greta Garbo's shoes will not be used to convoy Atlantic shipping . . . That's simply sunburn on the

W. C. Fields' schnozzola . . . It is perfectly true that there's a picture of Madeleine Carroll in Bob Hope's dressing room. But the inscription, "To the dearest, sweetest, most lovable boy in the world," was not exactly autographed by Madeleine. It was autographed by Hope.

HOLLYWOOD HILLBILLY

Judy Canova, the Cinema City's leading exponent of "hayseed" glamour, has never set foot in the hill country . . . She invented her famous mountain lingo as a kid in Jacksonville, Florida; kept it when she found it made people laugh . . . Newspapermen, putting her through early interviews, came away believing she'd never seen a train or a pair of shoes . . . Rudy Vallee gave her her first radio break . . . She once lived in a house that could only be reached by cutting through a cave and taking an elevator up to the living room . . . Her coal-black hair hits her hips . . . Jack Benny is her favorite radio star; Eleanor Roosevelt her favorite public personality . . . She owns 75 dolls gathered from points as far as China and Egypt . . . A first edition Joe Miller Joke Book occupies the spot of honor in her library . . . She's written her own epitaph. Hopes the words "Here lies Judy Canova—all the world loved her" will be carved on her tombstone . . . "Lil" Abner is not her ideal man . . . She's learned how to play a five-man instrument band and wants it written in all her future scripts.

BUSINESS AS USUAL

In England they still think of Hollywood. With all the tragedy and sorrow that broods over it, the harassed little isle has managed to issue through its British Film Institute a list of stars who, in their opinion, have done the most for motion pictures. The top ten follow: Fred Astaire, Greta Garbo, Shirley Temple, Harold Lloyd, Charlie Chaplin and Mary Pickford. And from the past, Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., Theda Bara, Marie Dressler and Tom Mix. It's an interesting list, but a little surprising when you consider that it modestly contains only one Englishman—Chaplin. And with such delightful Bundles from Britain as Ronald Colman, Herbert Marshall and Madeleine Carroll floating around, too!

CUTE LITTLE SHAVERS

More woe for Laird Cregar. A nasty measles attack recently deprived him of 40 of his 340 pounds. And now he's up for even greater suffering. For his role in "Charley's Aunt," 24-year-old Laird plays papa to 28-year-old Jimmy Ellison. To make him appear sufficiently ancient, director Archie Mayo decided Laird needed a receding hairline. So each morning after removing his chin and cheek whiskers, Laird whips his razor across his forehead and sorrowfully scrapes away an inch of his red-brown topknot! Which isn't half as bad as George Montgomery's predicament. Following the preview of George's first picture, fans wrote in complaining his chest looked like a hula skirt and please would Fox mow it down before exposing it again. So now poor George shaves his chest every morning—and wonders if it's all worth while when it itches like the dickens every night.

MARTHA RAYE

Judy Garland and Martha Raye ought to know each other. Besides having Dave Rose in common (Martha was married to him; Judy will be), both girls possess a quality of generosity and understanding that's hard to beat. Judy is reported to have told friends she's heard wonderful things about Martha and is also reported to have expressed the hope that Martha will be completely happy in her marriage with hotel man Neal Lang. And Martha, for her part, is equally gracious about her ex-husband's second love. Only it is not Martha's way to make sentimental speeches. Martha must wisecrack even when she's serious. As she did at the pre-marital shower given her by Ruby Keeler, for example. Linking her arm through Ann Sheridan's, Martha drew Annie away from the rest of the guests. She was choking with happiness as she told Ann how grateful she was for everything. "And do you know, honey," she finished off, "I really think Neal will marry me—if he doesn't meet Judy Garland first!" P.S. Martha became Mrs. Neal Lang on May 24th.

STRIP PLEASE

Linda Darnell's as proud as Punch of her brand new high school diploma! That Red Cross damsel is Jean Ames.

Martha Raye and Ann Sheridan, who used to feud, are now a mutual admiration society—and a swell comedy team.

photos of Jon, clad in the male version of a sarong (he wears it to woo Dorothy "Aloma of the South Seas" Lamour), have drawn hundreds of letters from women who want his tropical diapers for souvenirs. Now that he's finished the picture, Jon's willing to yield his flimsy wrap-arounds. But there remains one thing he won't do. He won't accommodate the 25 females who, on reading he was having his wisdom teeth yanked, wrote in asking if they couldn't have them for mounting. "Nothing doing," says Jon. "I've got to draw the line somewhere—by gum!"

DARNELL DIPLOMACY

You've got to hand it to Linda Darnell. Linda graduated from high school a few days ago and might have returned to her home town of Dallas, Texas, for the event, but for one thing. When the good people who control such things learned she was considering graduating with her old school chums, they decided the school auditorium couldn't hold the mob that would want to watch a movie star receive her diploma. Scratching their respective scalps, they finally hit on a solution. They would hire the gigantic Cotton Bowl! That was too much for Linda. When the plans were carried to her, she called the whole thing off. She didn't intend to steal the show from the other kids, and she certainly wasn't going to make a Roman holiday of such an important ceremony. Politely turning her back on the enterprising Dallas-ites, she was graduated from a local Hollywood school, and her formal education was brought to a close with the same lack of pomp and circumstance that marked Judy Garland's high school graduation just a year ago.

DEATH TO A RUMOR

Claudette Colbert is all packed up with no place to go. After weeks of tearing up the town preparing for an excursion to New York, Claudette learned husband Joel Pressman would be too busy to accompany her. Quick as a flash she applied for a cash refund on their tickets and, as we go to press, is enjoying (?) her vacation in her own front parlor. Did Claudette scrap her plans because she was afraid to leave Pressman alone? She did not. Or because she was afraid she'd be miserable without him? Wrong again. Claudette snipped off her holiday for just one reason. She doesn't want divorce rumors to start rolling. And she knows they would if she spent as much as a night apart from her lord and master. "When I used to read movie magazine stories that said a star's life was not her own, I used to think, 'Ugh, what slush,' " Claudette declares. "But believe me, brother, I'm not sneering any more! Look at those trunks! Full of gorgeous gowns, shoes and furs—and they'll never get farther than Hollywood and Vine!"

SHORT SHOTS

Add collectors: George Murphy hoards old newspaper columns. He ties them up with shoe strings, vows he'll read them "some day" . . . Martha Raye owns an autographed portrait of Vic Mature which reads, "To Martha, from a charming fellow." . . . John Barrymore is renting his 20-foot stuffed crocodile to Alexander Korda for "Jungle Boy" . . . "Strawberry blonde" Rita Hayworth switches to "russet redhead" for her role in Columbia's "You'll Never Get Rich."

HIGH TENSION WIRE

Three pals—all top movie names—were listening to a radio news commentator recently and heard him announce that their best friend, a famous star, was suing his wife for divorce. The wife happened to be a woman thoroughly detested by the threesome, so they immediately zoomed over to a Western Union office and dictated a long wire to their pal, telling him how lucky he was to be rid of the creature, how much they loathed her, etc. Forty-eight hours later the star and his wife were reconciled! Right now our trio is in the market for 3 pairs of snow-shoes. They contemplate Alaska "for the duration." They'd rather trek across the Tundra than remain within tongue-whipping distance of Mrs. Movie Star, who found the wire when she returned home!

STEP INTO MY PARLOR

Once upon a time Bob Hope couldn't afford three meals a day. Now he can afford them, but he can't eat them! Every time he sits down to a restaurant five-courser, he's so swamped by fans and fellow stars, it's impossible to get a fork to his mouth! Which is a far cry from Bob's early days in Hollywood. Then he was breaking into radio and couldn't even lure an audience to his broadcasts. Bob's favorite story about those days is the one about the time his option was coming up, and he was in desperate need of audience laughter to impress his sponsors. His career was hanging in the balance until he had an inspiration. Before each broadcast he'd sneak next door to the popular Edgar Bergen show and redirect the exit ropes so that Bergen fans, as they left the studio, were unwittingly herded into the Hope booth! Then Bob would tear off a quick routine, and in a few minutes the duped audience would be rolling in the aisles. The scheme must have worked, too, because Bob's sponsors, listening from the East, picked up his option two weeks ahead of time!

THE PERFECT HOST

A party at W. C. Fields' home always amounts to the same thing as the Fourth of July—fireworks. The last one was no exception. Fields invited a group of friends in for the evening and introduced them to a magician he had hired to entertain them. As the magician set up his equipment, Fields raved about his talents. "The best in America," he promised his expectant cronies. But one of the guests was not interested in magic tricks. He preferred the magic of the blonde assistant the magician had brought with him. Luring the lovely lady into the garden, he began making violent love to her and was still at it when the magician stormed into their presence. The sight of his beautiful aide in the arms of another man was too much for him. The magician went berserk, took a swing at the guest, then ran to the living room where he started to break up the furniture! Fields took command. He called the police, and magically the fuming man was whisked away to the county jail. After the air had cleared, Fields faced his guests. "Well, boys," he gloated. "What did I tell you? I said you'd see the best magician in the country, and you have! He started in my parlor and, presto—wound up in the hoosegow! Match that if you can!"

MID-SUMMER MAKE-UP

cooling if chilled in the refrigerator.

If you want to look really fresh and inviting in summer weather, take special care with your make-up so that your skin will stay dewy fresh no matter how high the temperature soars. Be sure to apply a skin-matching foundation first—either in cream, stick, cake or lotion form—and blend it carefully and evenly. Then set it with an ice cube wrapped up in a clean hankie or piece of cleansing tissue. Give your skin a finishing touch with your chilled skin freshener applied with a tissue or a bit of cotton.

Then apply your powder (unless your foundation base takes the place of powder) in a shade that will flatter your summer skin. If your complexion is colorless or your tan is the kind that makes it look muddy and yellow, you can pep up your coloring with a rosier, more glowing shade. Generally, if your skin has a golden tan tone, choose a powder rich in golden, bronze or faintly orange shades. You girls with fair, delicate skins who don't want to or just can't tan will look lovely in one of the delicate petal or cream shades of powder. Your summer powder should always be fine and fluffy in texture.

YOUR lipstick and rouge need changing for the vacation season. You gypsies, whose skins have been toasted to a rich, tawny color, should discard the subtle tones of pre-suntan days and choose a livelier make-up. Generally, lipstick, rouge and nail polish of a deep glowing tone that tends toward orange-red will be much more flattering than your old favorites, red-red or blue-red. You who have fair skins will find that the bright, gay, warmer cheek and lip rouges in either clear red or blue-red will look best with summer pastels and bright colors.

If you are a light blonde or a brown-haired girl with a fair delicate skin, your most becoming shade of rouge will be either a clear rose or a red with a faintly bluish-cast. If you are a fair-skinned brunette, you can wear either deep rose, clear red or a blue-red shade of rouge, dependent on your costume colors.

You may be a golden red-head with a pale ivory or faintly pink delicate skin. The most flattering make-up with your hair and complexion will be a soft orange-red or subdued clear red shade of rouge and lipstick.

If you're in doubt as to just what shade of rouge is best for you, pinch your cheek until the color rises, then try to match your make-up to that shade.

But whatever you do, be particularly painstaking with your summer make-up and general skin care. This is the season when the girl who is innately fastidious and careful of her beauty and appearance comes into her own and far outshines the girl who relies on unaided charms to put her across, forgetting that sun, wind and summer heat wreak havoc with even the best of skins.

A cool and inviting make-up for summer charmers is Park & Tilford Face Powder and Dry Rouge. Both are vacuum sifted to such amazing fineness that they smooth on your skin like satin and cling for hours. And they are available in all flattering summer tones. Rose Glow is a grand shade for girls who don't go in for heavy tanning. The powder gives your skin a soft, glowing undertone, and the rouge, a subtle rose, adds warm and natural-looking color to your cheeks.

200 pictures rated this month

Turn to our valuable Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. The "general rating" is the average rating of our critic and newspaper critics all over the country. 4★ means very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. C denotes that the picture is recommended for children as well as adults. Asterisk shows that only Modern Screen rating is given on films not yet reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

WHY WOMEN FALL FOR RAFT

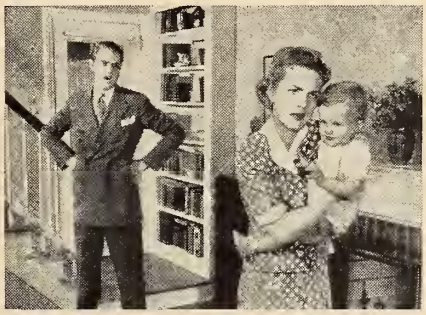
his fractures clean. That's his policy.

But you might bump into him and his pint-size girl friend on the avenue. Joan's studying music, so he goes to piano recitals with her. His chief delight is to steer her into Bonwit's or De Pinna's where he tries to buy out the stock in her size. "Now you've spent enough," she decrees and refuses to try on another nickel's worth. From Hollywood he phones her every week. And hidden away in some vault lies a sheet of legal foolscap ensuring her future—poignant evidence that no child of his own could be dearer than the daughter of the woman he once loved.

Two years ago, having finished "The Women," Norma Shearer went to Europe with a stopover in New York. She met Raft at the World's Fair, to which she'd gone with a party of friends. They'd met often enough in Hollywood, said hello, how are you, and passed on. Their circles didn't touch. Norma was a ruling member of the smart set; George picked his friends where he found them. Gary Cooper's one. But for every kindred spirit among the stars, he counts a round dozen among grips and extras.

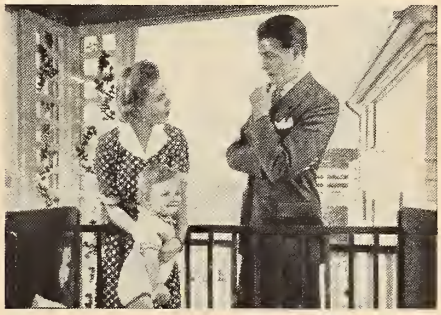
MAYBE it was the carnival atmosphere. Maybe it was the moment of destiny. Whatever it was, something clicked that night between Raft and Shearer. He was on her boat when it sailed—along with a lot of others, including the Charles Boyers, the Eddie Robinsons, Madeleine Carroll, Roland Young. He spent seventeen days with them in the south of France and got back just under the line for a picture schedule. On Norma's return they became a constant twosome. And one of its most chattered-about.

After all, it wasn't a logical combination. George had never shown any liking for the glitter of Norma's world; she'd shown no disposition to step beyond its limits. What people lost sight of was that when a man and a woman are strongly attracted, lifelong habits are frequently tossed on the junkheap.



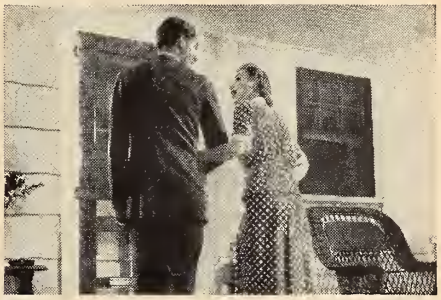
Not that Norma, when you saw her at racetracks and football games with George, gave any impression of a sacrificial lamb on the altar of friendship. On the contrary, she looked like a kid out of school, revelling in unaccustomed stimulation. George in turn attended diamond-studded premières, which he'd hitherto avoided. About social functions and the people who threw them, he'd had what amounted to a phobia. Now, outwardly imperturbable though shaky inside, he went to swank parties. He found himself liking Norma's friends—better, he was frank to admit, than he'd expected. They liked him, too. He's a man of no pretense. You take him as he is, or you don't take him. When he had something to say, he said it. When he didn't, he kept his mouth shut. By this time he'd moved into his Coldwater Canyon house where he and Mack confined their activities to the den and their bedrooms. Once in a while they'd each try one end of the living room sofa just to see what it felt like. Now he was using his house for the first time. Norma got him to give some dinner parties of his own.

Then there were the children. Wherever there are children, Raft feels at ease. He fell with a thud for the charms



"But he's not an incubator baby any longer!"

1. Funny, the way my husband took it as a kind of personal disgrace when our little Michael was born an incubator baby. He still hates to think of it. And now that Michael's so fine and healthy (even 2 oz. *over*weight!) Mike's always after me to "treat him like a man!"



2. The other day Mike was on a regular rampage! "Holy smoke! He's a nice normal baby—why treat him like a hothouse flower? Special this, special that—even a special laxative! You've got more special gadgets for that kid than—"

3. "Say—wait a minute!" I said. "Those 'special gadgets,' as you call them, are just what's made Michael a nice normal baby. Of course I give him modern things designed for a baby's needs. I give him just what the doctor tells me to give him!"

4. "The doctor says you shouldn't treat a baby's delicate system like an adult's. A baby needs things designed especially for him. He gets special foods, so naturally he should get a special laxative. The doctor recommended Fletcher's Castoria!"

5. "He said Fletcher's Castoria is made especially and only for infants and children. There isn't a single harsh purging drug in it. It's effective but mild. It works mostly in the lower bowel so it isn't liable to upset a child's tiny system."

6. Well, Mike looked a little sheepish when I tossed all those facts at him. And when he saw how Michael takes Fletcher's Castoria and loves the taste . . . that settled it. I haven't had a single laxative squabble since!

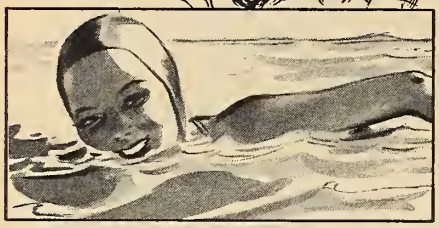
Chief ingredient of Fletcher's Castoria is senna.

Medical literature says: (1) In most cases, senna does not disturb the appetite and digestion or cause nausea . . . (2) Senna works primarily in the lower bowel . . . (3) In regulated dosages it produces easy elimination and has little tendency to cause irritation or constipation after use.



Senna is especially processed in Fletcher's Castoria to eliminate griping and thus allow gentle laxative action.

of young Irving and little Katharine. He took the boy to the ball games. He'd run out to the beach house when Norma wasn't at home to build sand castles with the baby.

My guess is that they didn't contemplate marriage, that each enjoyed the other's society without plans for the future. But your guess is as good as mine. While it lasted—a year—their feeling for each other was real, marked by acts of consideration, big and small. He never passed a shop window without hunting through it for something that might please Norma. Whatever her dinner menu, she always saw that there was steak for George, the only meat he cares to sink tooth in. There was a lot of talk at the studio about co-starring them in a remake of "A Free Soul." Nothing came of it though. And abruptly as it had bloomed, the romance faded. Sorry, I can't tell you why. George's picture still stands in Norma's living room. "It just seemed to end," he says, when he says anything. He thinks she's wonderful and claims that in his eyes she can do no wrong. Make what you like of it.

WHICH brings us to Betty. George always had what he calls a little crush on Betty. He took her and her sister to the bike races when she was sixteen. But for any sixteen-year-old George's feeling would be more strongly tinged with protective indulgence than romance.

She was still very young when she married Jackie Coogan. Raft was just one of the nice guys on the Paramount lot with whom she'd exchange a word or a gag or a laugh in passing. The little blonde's screen career didn't jell. Neither did her marriage. Calling a halt to both, she trekked east, pulled herself a plum in "Du Barry Was A Lady" and became one of those overnight toasts of Broadway. Blinders ripped from their eyes, the studios yelled, come home! She did, eventually—to the arms of Twentieth Century-Fox.

Raft visited New York during the period of her triumph. But he made no attempt to see her. Not George. "The whole town's on her trail. What chance would a guy like me have?" he said to a friend.

She returned to Hollywood and made "Tin Pan Alley." Noting that she never went out with the same man twice, George cannily deduced that she was heartfree and plucked up courage. Just a little. Not enough to approach Betty. He asked their mutual friend, Mary Benny, to sound her out and talk him up. The build-up proved superfluous. Betty promptly said yes. George as promptly phoned. Would she go to the Benny broadcast Sunday night, then on to Ciro's?

Now Betty's a good healthy girl. She never gets sick, take her word for it. So on the morning of her first date with George, she woke up feeling rotten. By midafternoon she knew she'd have to break the date. It almost broke her heart. She was afraid George might think it a stall. She put her mother on the phone to verify her own testimony that it wasn't. George said he understood. He said he was going to the President's Birthday Ball and would call her when he got back. She hung up the phone and wailed, "Maybe he's stalling me."

She knows better now. The Sunday after his return they went to the Bundles for Britain benefit and danced at Mocambo. On her doorstep he said, "I'd like to see you again."

"When?"

"Tomorrow night?"

"That's fine with me."

They used to hit the nightspots. Neither drinks, but both love to dance. Between dances they guzzle Poland water. Or George sends a boy to the corner drugstore for an ice cream soda, his favorite beverage. One day he asked her how about a ball game, and she whooped with joy. Now it's baseball on Sunday afternoons unless they drive down to Caliente for the races. On Tuesday and Friday nights they go to the fights. Virginia went to please George, Norma for the novelty; Betty goes because she's as nutty about them as George.

They haven't been seen at a nightclub in weeks. From "Miami" Betty hopped right into "A Yank in the RAF." When she works, she's in bed by nine. So she'd rather dine in slacks at the Canyon with George and Mack than bother to go out. She's happiest anyway running around in slacks but feels conscience-stricken sometimes because she thinks George likes to see her dressed up. She needn't worry. George's viewpoint is, what's it matter what she runs around in, she's always Grable. After dinner they play gin rummy. She beats him occasionally. And always legitimately. She won't let him let her win. It's he who watches the clock, gets her out by eight-thirty and home by nine.

He thinks she's more fun than any girl he's ever known—sunny-hearted, full of laughs, easy to please. She insists he can outclown her, only he's not so noisy about it. She calls him her straight man—or, to tease him, Sinister. He calls her Goodlookin'. She says he's soothing. She's never seen him excited or heard him raise his voice. Her tendency is to rush around. "Take it easy," he says. "Everything's under control."

ACCORDING to Betty, the world holds no kinder man. Recently she went to the hospital with an infected wisdom tooth. Her jaw was out to there. George assured her it wasn't swollen at all, or if it was, it looked lovely that way. Flowers arrived every hour on the hour. She asked for a book. He sent her eight of them.

Once she told him that she always took her mother to dinner on maid's night out. Once was enough. He's never forgotten that Thursday is maid's night out, never failed to ask Mrs. Grable to join them. He loves to give but hates the act of giving and will run a mile to escape a thank you.

"Think your brother-in-law'd like to go to the fights, Betty?"

"Why don't you ask him?"

"You ask him."

Or, "Here's some perfume I got for your mother. You give it to her."

It's come to be a running gag in the family. "Betty Alden," she says, "speaking for Miles Standish Raft—" He can't bring himself to hand even her a gift. "Go look on the table in the other room," he tells her.

For all her youth and gayety, I have a suspicion that Betty reads Raft more truly and values him more justly than any woman has done. She knows he has the only qualities worth a damn—those that make character. She also knows that somewhere along the line he's been hurt, and the knowledge moves her to a fierce compassion. Now and then she'll surprise a look in his eyes that she can't bear. "Who's been mean to you, George?" she cries.

Whether they'll marry, nobody knows. Not even they, since it doesn't wholly depend on them.

But George says she's made him happier than he's ever been in his life.

And Betty certainly hopes she'll never make him sad.

LIFE FOR HENIE IS TOPPING

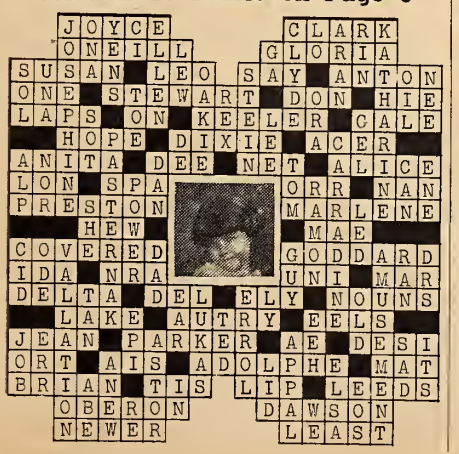
On the shimmering ice under the colored lights with the music, the glitter of expensive costumes, the brilliant skating of the troupe all forming a background for the special combination of speed, grace, rhythm and technique that makes her great, Sonja is magical. Topping caught the mood as soon as her first number was completed. He straightened in his seat. He wasn't bored.

More than an inarticulate admirer he judged her as one athlete would another. Great coordination of muscle and mind. Fearless. Not a nerve in all the hard flesh of her five-foot-two body. The girl was terrific! By the end of the show Topping was figuring out excuses to meet the little Henie. Then he hit upon it. He'd have to be the gentleman and thank her for the tickets. He owed her that. His friend would want him to. So Topping found himself in Sonja's dressing-room, and that was the beginning of that.



They went out to dinner several times but not the first night. No, Sonja saw to it that she didn't play "easy to get." White orchids, the snow maiden's favorite flower, found their way to her apartment, and then all too soon, the troupe moved on to St. Louis. "It just happened," said Topping, sucking his pipe stem, "that I had to go West on some business for the team." He squinted at the hills that rimmed the horizon and waited for the "Oh yeah?"

"Well, I did, and my trip took me to St. Louis, so we saw more of each other there. And then by chance the troupe went on to Pittsburgh where I had to go, too, on some business for the team, and I saw Sonja often there," he explained.

In April the campaign began. "We talked over getting married three months before we did it," he says. "You know, idle talk. Could we get along? What would our chances be for a successful marriage? We were in a party that went to Hawaii, and Sonja had a serious throat infection. She took her illness with the same sporting quality that she takes everything else. A man can't help but admire a woman like that. She is different from any other woman I have ever known.

"Ask me what traits I liked best about her, and I can't answer. Maybe it was her fearlessness and her complete independence. I know . . . men are supposed to like the clinging vine type of woman, but Sonja can be just as feminine as the next woman and more fun, if she wants to, but when she needs to be, she can be a hard-headed business woman. There's a lot of novelty in a woman who is completely contradictory."

She talks in big money, because she makes big money and handles it fearlessly, trusting a few close friends who started out to be business associates but proved themselves worthy of confidence. One of these is Chicago's Arthur Wirtz, who owns half of her carnival company and is owner of sports stadiums in several Eastern cities. So complete is her trust in Wirtz that they do business without a written contract.

In 1939 she told me that Wirtz was the "finest man I have met in America." She doesn't change the rating now that she has married Dan Topping. "That's something else . . ." she says, wrinkling up her nose into a bunny-like grin.

IT was at Wirtz's Chicago home on Lake Shore Drive that Sonja married Dan Topping on July 4th, 1940. The obvious thought is that they both gave up their independence on Independence Day, but that is far from fact. "And I'll tell you why," said Topping, crossing his brown-slacked legs.

"Neither one of us married for financial gain. We are independent financially, and it's not a question of 'what do I get if I leave you?' And 'what becomes of the money I've made while I was married to you?' If we do split, and I fervently hope that we never will, there will not be any bad temper stirred up because of property settlements. The way we are now, our marriage is based purely on community of interest and our affection for each other.

"Do you know that we haven't had a quarrel? And as it looks now there seems to be little reason for us to quarrel. Sonja is anxious to become a part of my world, and I'm just as anxious to fit into hers. However, there's one thing that I do stop at, and that's ice skating. I haven't been on skates since I stopped playing ice hockey, and I've never been on figure skates.

"On the other hand, Sonja says she is going to take up golf, which I have been playing since I was seven; and she has already taken to football like a real fan; she's seen twenty-five games this season. We both like to fish, and Sonja's great at it. We like to swim and we're building a Long Island beach house.

"In town we live in a suite at the Waldorf, and if we feel like a swim, we go to the airport where I keep my plane—I've been flying for years—fly down for the afternoon, take a dip and are back in New York to sign any letters that require my signature and to have dinner together."

This life plan runs along like fiction, and there are only a few things that could upset it. One is that a certain national defense measure known as conscription may take Topping, who is now in a deferred classification; and the other is that as paterfamilias Topping may ask the ice queen to give up her winter tours, which have been like life's breath to her since she turned professional in 1936.

Touring means jumps every week to all parts of the country; a wife whose waking hours are devoted to professional, not wifely, duties. Topping is too much in love—and so is Sonja—to stay in distant New York while the biggest woman box office attraction in sports history is touring the provinces.

"Besides, it's expensive to be separated from Sonja," he says with a quick grin. "Long distance calls four to six times a day and telegrams . . . it all runs into money. As it was, I had to miss being with her on her birthday this year."

There is no indication that Topping is readying himself to ask Sonja to make this sacrifice to their domestic happiness. He understands her feelings very well and respects them. He knows that she is young enough to be vastly thrilled by mob adulation. She's still under thirty, and he's about four or five years her senior . . . a Pennsylvania University footballer, by the way. Quit school in '29, the year the bottom dropped out of the market.

What he would like to see Sonja do is make one film a year. Make it in the Winter or Spring and have her spend from July to January in New York and at Long Island, for those are the months that professional football demands his attention. If that could be contrived, Sonja might have other duties to take her mind off the sweet thrill of flying across the ice on her firm, chubby legs and the intoxication of music and motion. Little Toppings, for instance. Sonja is agreeable to the idea of children, wants them very much and laughs at Winchell's premature prediction. She'll let him know, and gladly, whenever it's true.

If their common interest in sports and their love did not bind them together, Sonja and Dan Topping would still have an item in common. They are both pioneers in sports that have, since they helped launch them, caught the country's fancy. Sonja with her plushy ice revues revitalized the common snow sports of skating and skiing; made several million dollars; created a niche for her brother Leif, who since the overthrow of Norway, has been manufacturing snow togs for America's leading class stores.

Topping, in a less spectacular way, has focused public interest on professional football, and in the East the fad is healthy. "I've owned the Dodgers for eight years," he says. "The first four years were tough. It took time to get people interested; I had to build up the team. The last four years have been comparatively easy, and last year the team played to two million people."

THE fact that her husband is a good business man as well as a sportsman, adds immeasurably to Sonja's happiness, and happy she is. Never has her round-cheeked face with its mischievous brown eyes been brighter nor her compact little body any more slimly curved. "Thank heavens I didn't marry an actor!" she says. "I don't think those marriages can succeed, can they? Both in the same profession. Or is it possible?" She asks these questions out of fullest curiosity, but she wouldn't waste time debating them. For she is strictly a woman of action.

Sonja's house in Oslo—city of her birth—the one that she redecorated in satins and mirrors—is now in the hands of the Third Reich, and she has had no word of it. She thinks of buying with her husband a home in California. Lavish as she is in spending money and razor-keen about making it, Sonja still delights in giving her co-workers what they wouldn't buy for themselves. Now she has someone to give her gifts. Topping's latest is a sixty-five carat cat's eye ring mounted in simple gold setting. It's the largest in the world and was exhibited at the World's Fair.

Ask her if her meeting with Dan Topping resulted in "love at first sight" for her, she dimples and parries the question with "love by first sight. . . ?" And that's all the answer you get. It's against her Nordic ethics to undrape her emotions for the press. You can be sure, though, without asking, that life for Henie is simply Topping.

SERIOUS SIDE OF A SCREWBALL

and the average money-mad homo sapiens. The lure of filthy lucre did not drive Eddie into a search for this special vitamin oil. His motive was purely and solely a desire to contribute profit to the poor and to the ill. And that's not soap.

Eddie Albert's plan was this: He wanted to go to starving fishermen in Costa Rica and other Central American countries. Extract them from their poverty. Give groups of fishermen his money to buy boats and equipment. Let each establish his own shark-hunting business. Let each, for the first time, earn a living wage. Then Eddie would buy the shark-liver from his prospering fishermen, have the stuff processed and canned and sold in drugstores cheap enough so that any poor person, ill of health, lacking the proper vitamins, could become healthy for almost nothing.

"It was a great idea," admitted Eddie. "But it leaked out, and now several huge corporations have invested two million dollars in the same thing. They're going to market the stuff themselves. It'll be a service, sure. But it'll be more expensive now, and it won't help the fishermen. In brief, it wasn't exactly as I planned. Of course I can't compete. I just haven't the cash. But I may continue in this business in a small way."

We don't want to feed you any varnish about all of Eddie Albert's projects being purely philanthropic. They aren't. He likes, also, to involve himself in purely speculative stunts of longshot possibilities that bear the overtones of high adventure and excitement.

Thus when Ginger and Dana Lamb, California explorers who wrote a best-seller book a couple of years ago, came to Eddie with an idea for a hidden city hunt, he was all ears and bankbook. He backed Ginger and Dana Lamb—and showed us a letter he'd just received from them. They are, at this writing, in Southern Mexico, near Tehuantepec, seeking the Lost City of the Mayans, armed with Eddie's machetes and pistols, fighting stinging ants, chiggers, spiders, brush and heat.

As a result of this and other projects he's backed, Eddie receives a tremendous amount of mail every week from people who have inside information on hidden diamond mines, secret gold veins, unexplored ruins. The only thing he contributes to in these cases is the wastebasket. He told me about a letter he got from one old prospector. The man was a real oddity. "For full expenses paid

Answer to a maiden's prayer for her skin in summer

YOU know from experience that you can't be too carefree about your skin in summer. You can't mercilessly expose it to sun, wind and weather without protective care, and hope to escape such logical results as leather-dry, rough skin, oily shine, blackheads, or enlarged pore openings.

A happy answer to this problem of summer care has been found by thousands of outdoor girls and women. In two unique creams which contain the famous Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA TEXTURE CREAM. Here's a cream you'll really enjoy using as a night cream. It's dainty and pleasant because non-greasy! It softens and neutralizes accumulations often of an acid nature in the external pore openings of your skin. In addition it contains cholesterol which retains moisture in the skin and so helps to keep it softer, more pliant, and to relieve excessive dryness.

An ideal foundation cream. You'll love the smooth, even way powder and rouge go on over Phillips' Texture Cream. It prepares the skin for make-up by removing excess oiliness and softening roughness and dryness. It also acts as a helpful protection against sunburn and windburn.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA CLEANSING CREAM. The way this cream cleanses tells you it's different! In addition to loosening and absorbing the surface dirt and make-up, it penetrates the outer pore openings and floats away the accumulations which daily lodge there. It leaves your skin looking and feeling fresh and clean! Try this special cleansing care.

and ten dollars a week, I will find gold for you," he wrote Eddie. "I am a freak. I can walk over land, and when there's gold running beneath, I can feel it in my feet and it registers a special taste in my mouth." This amused Eddie. But not to the extent of drawing hard-earned money from the bank.

More than anything, Eddie Albert, who in his time even played stooge to a professional circus strongman, loves to invest in human beings. If he finds a person who is interesting, who has something to offer, but is down on his luck—Eddie is willing to put cash across the board on the person's future with no thought of return.

Another time, down at the docks, Eddie found a Spanish guitarist, a down-at-the-heel bum who had just finished a furlough riding the rods. This character had picked up across America rare folk songs that had never found their way into print. Eddie had the guitarist under his roof to record these folk songs and sent the wanderer off with a handsome sum of money!

Eddie's latest two-legged property is a tall, reedy Chinese boy from faraway Canton. The boy's name is Lin. He speaks poor English. Understands less. Eddie found him slaving in a downtown restaurant, thought the Chinese lad exceptionally intelligent and quick and hired him as a cook and aide de camp. "I've had a complete education on China and the Far East from Lin," Eddie revealed. "Some fellow! His father is Mayor of Canton. His grandfather built one of China's greatest temples. He causes me endless grief, though. Gets everything bawled up on the phone. He cancels my important appointments. Fixes up the ones I attempt to avoid. And last week got me knotted into dating two girls in one evening—at the same time!"

Today Eddie Albert rents a sprawling and untidy furnished home on a dead end street near Warners and Universal, with Janet Gaynor and Adrian and Mary Brian and her new husband for his neighbors. The house is cluttered with a hundred Albertisms—part of a philosophic book he is writing, an original Rockwell Kent on one wall, three bookcases he built for his records that range from Brazilian rhumbas to Beethoven, piles of magazines like The Nation and National Geographic and Modern Screen, a piano and violin (both of which he plays) and numerous texts on the art of emoting.

CONCERNING the art of emoting—from which Eddie Albert earns his bread, butter and popularity—he is no slouch. More important, he is no screwball.

He claimed his one consuming ambition was to portray Edgar Allen Poe on the screen. He wanted to do Poe in a film on schedule labeled "Annabel Lee." We uttered the usual objection—that he was a comedian, and a comedian couldn't play Poe.

Eddie Albert lifted the roof off his home. "The devil a comedian can't play Poe!" he exclaimed. "Why, the physical resemblance would be simple. A black wig. Moustache. A little simple plastic work. But more important, I'm sure I could do justice to the role in other respects.

"True, studios have considered Laurence Olivier for the part. Well and good. He's a polished actor. And he looks somber. But that's the rub. Cast Olivier as Poe, and you know it's a tragedy. It takes out the element of suspense and conflict. You'd expect a moody picture. You'd get it.

"But if they cast a person who is known to the public to be bright, fresh, alive, cast him as Poe, and then in the plot allow circumstances to put the old Indian sign on the actor, that would create suspense, frustration and finally, conflict and tragedy."

Eddie Albert elaborated with broad gestures.

"Listen, a good clown can play a serious part better than anyone else in the world, that is, if he's a good clown. Because anyone who understands the basis of comedy knows, also, the fundamentals of all fine acting. A funnyman understands the vital trick of acquiring audience sympathy, so that when frustration and sadness befall him, the audience loves him the more. I remember Joe Jackson on the stage. Oh, he was grand! Baggy. Forlorn. Hopeless. Shuffling out, staring at the audience and winning them over. . . . Believe me, that old saw about every clown wishing to play Hamlet need not be a gag. It might be an intelligent idea!"

WE tried to shift Eddie Albert to the subject of women. He was elusive. Admitted he preferred wandering around through saloons and getting into conversations with strange people over strong beers than attending inane parties with members of the weaker sex. If he had to go out with a woman, he preferred to attend a solid three-act play.

"Actually, I'm Hollywood's most ineligible bachelor," Eddie insisted.

Maybe. Maybe not. Anyway, we knew that many of the good-lookers in town and the women with brains went for him in a big way. We were told that Jane Bryan, before she married Justin Dart, was crazy about Eddie. And Jane Bryan never cared for a person unless the person had plenty of gray matter in the second story.

We even heard rumor that ten years ago Eddie had married his radio partner, a cute gal named Grace Bradt. He'd met her in Minneapolis. Broke into radio with her on a program he wrote in Cincinnati called "The Honeymooners." He'd even acted opposite her on Broadway in "The Boys From Syracuse." We asked Eddie about Grace Bradt. He said she was swell. Really a peach. Clever and smart and a honey. But marriage? "Why, she never wanted to marry me. She knew me and my goofy ideas too well!"

We then proceeded to inquire if Eddie had any special type he was looking for. No, none. "If I knew the type of girl I wanted to marry," he said, "I'd be married today. But I do want someone with a sound sense of humor. A girl who could make life exciting and have endless enthusiasm for the important things that captivate me."

From other sources we learned that the splendid actress, Margo, who had gone out with Eddie several times, filled the bill in many respects.

"One more thing," said Eddie, before we left. "If you want to know what I'm really like, well, let me write the ending of your article about me."

"Sure," we said. "That would be swell!"

Eddie Albert took a pencil, a piece of paper, and here, friends, is what Eddie Albert, The Serious, wrote about Eddie Albert, The Screwball:

"This is the way I would candidly describe Eddie Albert. The reason he likes some people and doesn't like others depends entirely on their enthusiasm for life. If certain people enjoy living—and they should, because, hell, it's a cruel, but crazy and marvelous world—then Eddie Albert likes those people, because Eddie himself has a boundless enthusiasm for living, and he loves this earth, and above everything, its dwellers!"

A

You must be a very gay and energetic type of person. If you are not, experience or age may have taken it out of you—but in spirit you remain the same.

You are very feminine, and unless we are greatly mistaken, you like much pampering and humoring. Of course, we all like attention—but you're inclined to reach for it.

You seem to put a lot of importance into "social standing," not so much attention to your budget and find it hard to be patient or concentrate on anything very long.

Inclined to be bored easily, sometimes considered frivolous and willful, there is nothing much the matter with you that a pocketful of money wouldn't easily remedy—but so say we all of us.

B

You are the kind of girl who can turn out a swell meal, be a marvelous wife and considered a perfect mother. You may not be married—but you have those capabilities just the same—and someone will undoubtedly discover them before long.

Feminine to the point where you'd like your own home and a family, and that in itself is unusual in these days—you are a little on the conservative side at times. You will always be a help to your husband—or future husband—and no one could ever consider you a drag.

You get pleasure out of humoring a man and making him forget his troubles; you have a nice even disposition and have about everything that one would want in a "good pal."

Well, well! Here's the practical, capable, efficient and diplomatic girl. You can take of a man without his even knowing anyone had done anything for him.

dwell a little less on the personal angle and remember that other people in this world who are having a tough time.

Incidentally, it wouldn't be too hard for you to neglect your personal appearance, let down in your zest for the spice of life or to become a little bit smug—so watch it and try to avoid these failings as much as possible—won't you?

AB

You're a little hard to satisfy, aren't you? When you come around, you rather expect others to take a back-seat and like it. There is absolutely no chance for any man to convince you that "woman's place is in the home."

A career for you—at least for a long while. Or if you do marry or are married, either pick him rich or make sure you can keep on working and maintain your outside interests.

You would have trouble running a three-room apartment without the help of a maid—even if you were at home all day long. We may be a little severe in this picture of you—but we are not far off—honest now—are we?

AC

You seem to be a sort of "dream-girl"—one in a thousand. Very sensible, practical and treating all your own and other people's problems with an understanding and sympathy that should have won you a host of friends before now.

Your friends find you a real good sport and good pal. You like variety and excitement, but with it all you can remember your obligations and limits.

Any man would find you an ideal mate and enjoy a serene kind of existence which isn't very often to be found. With all the desire for personal allure and glamour—you still believe that simplicity is the essence of good taste—and more power to you!

BC

No strings on you, are there? The main trouble is that you're too much business—over efficient. You could run a resort with less trouble than some girls have in keeping one room tidy.

Your budget is perfect, you save regularly, but it is just possible that even at an early age some people might think you had a "middle-aged" mental viewpoint.

If you will learn to take advice kindly, not talk so much, be less dominating, and in the presence of men (you know, the stronger sex) lean on them for a little more "support"—your popularity should begin to increase measurably. You may not like the idea—but believe us—it's good psychology.

ABC

You're a lot of fun—any place! You can take it as well as dish it out—and that covers everything from teasing to a hot-foot.

Inclined to be a little too extroverted (liking a lot of attention, being the center of attraction and slightly addicted to social climbing), it would take a mighty good man to make you decide on matrimony.

If you did love a man enough to marry him, you would certainly give him all the respect he deserves, but he'd never in his right mind call you a "homebody."

He will have to be broadminded, too—boy friend or husband—for you'll pay attention to whoever pleases your interest—when you please or where you please. It's a lot of fun, and we wouldn't want to change you for the world—but be careful, please!

XX

Have you heard the expression—"clinging vine?" That's you. Believe it or not, that's the type men fall for the hardest. They love it though, because it gives them the chance to make up your mind for you—most of the time, anyway.

If you are still single, it's an even bet that your budget is in a constant mess, you never know what to pick for lunch or dinner, find it hard to decide what to wear each day and find it even more difficult to select a movie to see on an off night.

If you like a man very much—lucky guy—you'll always be loyal, obey him like a pet, seldom hold an original thought in your pretty head (and why should you when it's a strong man's job, anyway) and sit around looking pretty much of the time.

They say it's a man's world—this troubled sphere of ours—but we need girls like you to keep ultra-feminism alive, and we are very glad you arrived at this classification.

ACCENT ON LOVE

you really look the way I think you do, or whether you're one of those mirages the desert throws up now and then."

They went to Chasen's for steak broiled over charcoal. Practically everybody in Hollywood who could afford a Chasen steak was there. And practically everybody who was there stopped to say hello to them, while they held hands under the table.

Ellen noticed that Si always listened graciously to what others had to say and vitalized the conversation by the things he had to say. She felt the same warm surge in her heart that she knew when her six-year-old son, Skipper, wearing a blue suit, a white shirt and a grown-up tie, recited in Sunday school.

It was strange that a girl who had made her mark as an actress should be as retiring as Ellen was six or seven months ago. It was curious she should have no wish to be the center of attraction herself but be well content to have the men in her life—Skipper and Si—monopolize it.

She wondered if Skipper would like Si. He was apt to be a little strange with the men she knew.

They met the next evening. Skipper, who came downstairs in his pajamas and dressing gown and moccasins, eyed Si with that frank look of appraisal that is only possible to children.

"Hi, there, fellow," Si said. "I've heard about you . . . been looking forward to this."

He talked to Skipper as if they were the same age, and Skipper straightened up to attain the stature conferred upon him.

"Like to ride?" Si asked.

"Yes, I do," Skipper said, "but I don't get to ride very much, so I'm not very good at it."

"How about coming to the Riviera Club with your mother and me on Sunday? I have just the horse there for you."

Skipper's eyes broke in stars like those sent up by the sparklers children burn on the Fourth of July. Ellen put her arm about his shoulders. And when her eyes met Si's over his tow head, she tried to look a little aloof and disapproving. Nothing had been said about the Riviera Club on Sunday. Si took much for granted. She might have other plans. But when he grinned at her, for all her fine, proud resolves, she relented instantly.

Two weeks later found Ellen and Si at Palm Springs again. They rode up in the hills. They shopped along the smart main street of the little town; bought dwarf cactus for her rockery and an old Indian silver bracelet. They drank Pyms at the Luau bar. And when they joined the rest of the crowd at the Beverly Derby after driving back to Hollywood, they were engaged, and they both looked a little serious and holy, the way kids look when they take their first communion.

The weeks that followed weren't always happy for Ellen. Si liked to dine out and have people around him. And Sundays—the only day they had together, since usually they were both working—Ellen found herself surrounded by the socially confident wives of the men with whom Si played polo. Always she seemed to be groping for something to say and so self-conscious and shy that her brain was practically paralyzed.

"Look, Si," she said one day, "I want to say first of all that I understand your wish to have people around you. You sit alone in an office all day banging a typewriter. When night comes you want society. With me it's different. I'm surrounded by people all day on the set. When night comes, I like to relax.

"The main point, however, is that I'm not up to the kind of life we're living. You see, darling, I'm not like you. I don't know what to say to people. And I have nothing in common with all those polo players' wives."

She smiled. "You know me, Si darling—I'm the girl who used to dole out chocolate nut sundaes in the candy store next to Graumann's Chinese. I never saw a steeplechase in my life, and I never cried 'Tally-ho,' or whatever it is you cry when you go after the fox. I'm . . ."

Si put his arm around her and drew her close. "You're a dope," he said. "My dope. If you never opened your beautiful mouth, people would be glad of a chance to sit and look at you. Thank God, you are the quiet type! We wouldn't get along if you weren't, I'm afraid, because I love to talk—and what would I do without you?"

HE gathered her closer. "Ellen, sweet, you do the best job of underestimating yourself of anyone I know. The best! You're Ellen Drew, a rising young actress with some pretty swell performances to your credit. You don't have to shine over a steak at Chasen's unless you want to. . . . The only thing is, I think you'd have more fun if you did go after the social spotlight sometimes! So let's see if I can't help you overcome some of that shyness. I should be able to. God knows I've never been self-conscious."

Ellen stood on tiptoe to get her arms around him. "If you only could," she said, "it would be so wonderful, Si!"

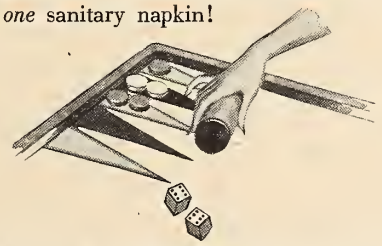
Nothing was accomplished overnight, but slowly Ellen changed. The publicity personnel at the studio noticed it. Previously when she had been interviewed, she had sat back quietly, smiled timidly and answered the questions that were put to her in a frightened rush. Gradually she came to be almost as interesting and amusing with strangers as with those she knew well.

The way Si helped her was simple enough. "You like people or you wouldn't be shy," he told her. "Fact of the matter is you like people so much you're put off by what they'll think of you—and consequently you don't let yourself go.

"Make up your mind there are bound to be those who won't like you or think as you do. You wouldn't get much from that group anyhow, because the chances are you wouldn't like them or think as they think, either. So! Say what you have to say as graciously as you can and follow your instincts as far as you can without working any injustice to others. And have fun!"

In the early spring Si's team played at Del Monte. The polo crowd, including Ellen and Si, went up the day before and stayed at Monterey where the sea foams against the dark rocks, and the night winds that have twisted the cedars into eerie shapes throughout the years make the inn guests grateful for the open fires that burn in every room.

"This is a gorgeous place," Si told Ellen when he bid her goodnight at the door of the cottage she was occupying. "I'd like to come here when we're married, if you like it, too."



"I think it's Heaven," she said.

Sunday was one of those days when the sun was warm, the breeze was cool, and the air like wine. Ellen had a new suit—beige—and so beautifully tailored that she looked as if she had been poured into it. With it she wore a large black hat and carried a perfectly mammoth black bag. Men and women both looked often toward the box where she sat with her party. Now, no longer withdrawn in shyness, she was one of the crowd.

The teams took their places for the last chukker. The wind was rising. Ellen gathered her beige topcoat about her shoulders. Only for a split second were her eyes off Si, but in that time his horse fell and threw him. Ellen gripped the box railing, but she said nothing. If the horse rolled on Si or kicked him . . .

"Si, Si," she cried. But only with her heart. The polo set remained calm about spills.

"If only," she thought, "the horse would run off before Si, with his unconscious dramatic quality, has a chance to jump on again—at least until he's sure he's all right."

The horse, on his feet now, looked around, and then as if Ellen's thought willed it, he spun about and made for the far end of the field.

A minute later Ellen was smiling at the flip remarks made by a famous horseman from the East and chatting easily about the best arrangements for dinner and the return home.

The next day she made up her mind to visit Skipper at the California Prep School where he's a boarding pupil. Si and she had visited him often on Sundays. And occasionally she had driven down to have dinner with him alone. But this was different. She went now because, Si's spill having shown her how very much Si meant to her, she was anxious to go ahead with definite wedding plans, and she wanted to tell Skipper all about everything before he heard gossip in a way that might make him feel jealous or resentful or left out.

SHE telephoned the school mother from her dressing-room on the Paramount lot first thing in the morning. "You dine early, at six, I know, and I'll do my best to be on time," she said.

Skipper began hanging around the main doorway at five o'clock. At five-thirty he began to fidget. At six o'clock when the dinner call sounded and he took his place at table, he had to blink back tears.

"David's mother is having dinner with us tonight," the house mother told the boys. (Skipper's real name is David Wallace.) "And, of course, you'll all stand until David has seated her."

At last there was the crunch of gravel in the driveway, and a car came to a stop. Skipper pushed back his chair and rushed to the door. And the house mother didn't stop him. A moment later he and Ellen entered the refectory, arm in arm. There was the scrape of chairs on the floor as the boys rose. Ellen smiled at all of them, made her apologies to the house mother, and took her place beside Skipper. He looked at her differently, she thought, but she laid this to her imagination and the purpose of her visit.

"Mommie," he whispered soon enough, unable to contain his emotion, "do you hear the boys saying your name—saying Ellen Drew? Last week we went to a picture show and you were in it."

Idolatry was in his eyes. "I was proud!"

Ellen didn't know quite what to do. Skipper had never before been aware of her in any capacity except that of his Mommie. "Did you like the picture?" she asked. "Did you think I did a good job?"

Later, when Skipper was in bed, Ellen read him a story. He hushed her, his finger on his mouth, during the most exciting part. "Hear that?" he whispered, nodding towards the room beyond the thin partition. "Hear that! They're saying your name again. They're saying Ellen Drew."

Ellen knew how right she had been not to set a wedding date or make definite plans until she had come and talked things over with him. Paragraphs would have appeared in the news columns. He probably wouldn't have seen them himself. But the older boys would have told him. And little boys are funny creatures. They get the strangest notions about things sometimes.

She smoothed his covers and took his hand. "I have something very important to talk over with you," she said. "Mr. Bartlett and I are hoping to get married. . . ."

Skipper looked very serious. "I guess you'd better," he said. "And quick, too! Before some other girl gets him. I've been thinking about you and Mr. Bartlett, Mommie. He makes you laugh a lot. And he takes you to a lot of places. So you don't get lonely while I'm here at school. And I'll be at school for a long time, I guess—for years."

She gathered him into her arms. "I think Mr. Bartlett's very nice," she told him, "and I had the impression you did, too. The three of us should make a very nice family, I think—don't you?"

"You bet," he said. He was sleepy now. He had to rub his eyes violently to stay awake.

Ellen kissed him and turned out the light. "Goodbye for now," she said. "Let's plan a picnic next Sunday—you and Mr. Bartlett and I."

It's a two-hour drive from Covina—where the Prep School is—to Hollywood. But it seemed no distance at all to Ellen. Her heart was singing.

Si's car was parked in her driveway. And she found Si reading in the living room. "Darling," she said, rushing to his arms, "I told you I was going to see Skipper tonight."

"I know," he said, "but I figured you'd be home early, so after dinner with the gang, I dropped round to say good night."

"Skipper thinks it's wonderful I'm going to marry you," she told him. She knew that was what he was waiting to hear.

His face brightened. "Now I can tell you what I want for my birthday," he said.

Immediately she was interested. His birthday came in July, and she had been wondering what on earth she could give him that he would really like. "What?" she asked.

"A wedding," he told her.

Ellen laughed. "That's the kind of present I like to give," she said. "Something I can use myself."

like and yet so very unlike their own."

For Conrad Veidt to be sheltering one of England's evacuées is in itself a paradox, but politics and changing creeds defy tradition. At one time Veidt was a leading character actor in his birthplace, Germany. He won recognition in "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" in 1919, and has had an enviable film career ever since. In 1931 he cut all ties with Germany and became a British citizen, offering his personal fortune to Britain at the outset of the war.

The evacuées—don't ever call the British "refugees," not while there's left a spear of grass, a tiny rock, that could be called England—are considerably scattered throughout greater Los Angeles. Some of them are kept in almost cloistered seclusion, their hosts refusing to give out names, ages or any information regarding them.

The brothers Warner, for instance, brought over nine or ten children, offspring of their exchange employees in England, and Mr. and Mrs. Hal Wallis (Louise Fazenda) are guesting several and giving their own child an opportunity to acquaint himself with English modes and manners. The children of English actor Robert Donat (Academy Award winner for 1938-39 with "Goodbye, Mr. Chips") and their mother are living quietly in Beverly Hills, almost in retreat, in a rented Spanish-type house, and Joanna, John and Brian, whose ages range from ten downward, attend a local elementary school "for the duration."

Mrs. Donat has yet to be lured into conversation with the press, and she sends word by way of her Negro butler when reporters punch the doorbell that she is in America as a "private person," and that she has promised Mr. Donat, who is in England, that she will remain a "private person" as far as interviews are concerned.

LESS reticent is the family of Gracie Fields, a cozy clan that fills their L-shaped house to overflowing. There are Gracie's two sisters, Betty and Edith, and their families. Betty, who is Mrs. Parry, and her husband and son Tony are not really evacuées, having been in America on and off for four years. Edith, who is the wife of Comedian Douglas Wakefield, came over in September with their two youngsters, Douglas, nine, and young Gracie, a little blonde girl of seven.

The thirteen-day trip across the Atlantic on the Duchess of Richmond with the battleship Revenge convoying it was not without excitement, although most of the world's attention was directed across the Channel on the other side of the tight little isle. The Wakefields sailed at the moment that Dunkirk was being evacuated, and the fighting fleets—air, land, sea—of both sides were engaged otherwise than in patrol of the Atlantic.

For the children, especially children that young, the visit to America is a great thrill. They enjoy the three-hour movies and hamburgers, although Mrs. Wakefield admits they don't get many typically American dishes from her cook stove. "I cook English," she says. "That's the way I was taught."

Across acres of shining homes to the North in Santa Monica is the home of sister Gracie, the mill girl from Lancashire who became an English music hall favorite. At the moment she is touring America in personal appearances for British War Relief. But in her house is the rest of the Fields clan—squabbling, making up and loving it. There's brother Fields, and wife Dorothy, and son Michael, aged six. Yes, there's Momma Fields, too, full of pride in her theatrical brood. And Poppa Fields.

Little Gracie, big Gracie's namesake, looks up at the ceiling from where she is lolling on her back on a white-fringed rug and says, apropos of nothing: "My room at home has stars on the ceiling."

Patricia Morison's cousins, the English Ursula and Dennis Skeats (they're on her mother's side), are older, nineteen and fifteen, and they bury their homesickness in educational pursuits. Ursula has enrolled in an art school and is studying painting. She and Patricia are also studying sculpture at home.

Dennis thought he wouldn't like American schools very well. In the first place he was away out in front in the matter of math. The American kids were in rompers, mentally, when it came to doing sums. This proficiency gave Dennis time to look around and get his bearings, and then he discovered football. He found it was "simply ripping" and as much sport as rugby. That put Dennis in right with the pigskin-and-chrysanthemum set, and now he finds America to his liking.

In some instances total war has brought career opportunity for the youngsters. Roderick Andrew McDowall is one. Steven Muller, an expatriate of Hamburg, Germany, who is more British in accent and thought than Basil Rathbone, is another. Both have found their way into film work, although Roddy has the edge on Steven. He has eighteen English-made films to his credit, the last being "This England," a cavalcade of the Empire that was made under shellfire. Roddy is now with Twentieth Century-Fox, has appeared in "Man Hunt" and will be seen as Huw in "How Green Was My Valley."

HE lives with his capable mother and older sister Virginia (she's thirteen) in a Beverly Hills house with garden. They have an Irish gardener, but he's very pro-British, which pleases Roddy, who is intensely patriotic, proud of his Scotch blood and English antecedents, and who wears a flaming red plaid tie of the Tribe McDowall.

Roddy had his baptism of shell and incendiary fire bombs before he sailed for America from Liverpool last autumn. He made "This England" at Rock Studios outside London and scurried with the other actors to shelter when the air warnings sounded. He treats the whole business with the stoicism of the child and the male.

"It was a nuisance," he says. "We'd just get started on a scene when the sirens would blast out, and we'd have to run for it. The Jerries seemed to fly on time-table schedule, and no matter what we started to do, we were always interrupted in the middle of it. Finally the men asked if we couldn't work right through the alarms, but that couldn't be done, either.

"At home Mother took the mattresses from our boat—they were made of rubber and springs and were very cushiony—and spread them under a staircase on the first floor, but first she propped up the stairs with a big trunk—just in case. . . . Then, every time the air raid alarm sounded, we all rushed to sit under the stairs. But first we shut the door leading to our shelter and piled pillows against it.

"We had a maid who became so annoyed at being taken away from what she was doing that she begged not to have to sit with us," said Roddy with great appreciation of her indifference. "When she would join us, she flopped down and said, 'Now isn't there something that needs mending? A dress, Miss Virginia?' She couldn't be idle."

Roddy and his mother and sister keep in constant touch with daddy Thomas Andrew McDowall, whose dangerous job it is to see that ammunition rolls in his fleet of trucks. Daddy never forgets to send a wire on special occasions, and especially after a bad blitz. When Roddy started "Man Hunt" (he thinks Walter Pidgeon is great, by the way), there was a cable from T. A. Andrews of the PDQ Transport and Garage Company that warmed his son's heart: "Daddy expects that your performance this day will be a beauty."

The other career child in this round-up of evacuées is Steven Muller, who has already Anglicized his given name and probably will do the same for his surname any minute. He is a rabid Anglophile, and his serious, brown-eyed child's face shows deep anger when he talks of the country of his birth, Germany, that would allow a man to serve as a soldier in World War I, give him an Iron Cross for bravery and later toss him into a concentration camp, as they did his lawyer-father. The Muller family, father, mother, Steven and Norbert ("Nobby," fourteen months younger than Steven), is now united in Hollywood.

Steven has an I.Q. of over 150 and a persuasive Latin charm—his mother was born in the Rhineland and is of Italian descent. As a very young lad (he is now thirteen), his family took him on summer trips throughout Europe, and he learned to speak Italian and Spanish. He, his mother and Nobby fled to England two weeks before war was declared, and the youngsters were placed in a school-master's home in Chesham at the time of the Children's Evacuation. There Steven embraced English with great fervor, and, hearing him talk today, one would swear that he was a Britisher. However, America will be his home from now on.

His pervasive charm and sharp intelligence have already won him a spot on a CBS program, "Smarty-Party," and he has become the matinée idol of the Coast half-hour. Steven's film career budded in the childhood sequence of "Adam Had Four Sons," and he now has an agent. He finds Hollywood a little strange, has an intense disapproval of women in slacks and finds sport in hiking and tending his superior stamp collection which, through heil and high water, he has managed to keep with him.

Not all of the children have a hankering for film careers. Twelve-year-old Ursula Greig, daughter of an English bookseller, said firmly when someone told her she should be in pictures: "Ridiculous! I cannot dance, I cannot act, I cannot sing. I'd be perfectly idiotic and useless on the screen—as are many others we see there, in my opinion." This is typical of the appraisals of Hollywood given by the evacuées, who are not at all swept off their feet by cinema glamour.

HOLLYWOOD, with its usual generosity, and with a nod to the publicity it would get out of it, made one fine gesture toward entertaining the war-time house guests. A commercial photographer, Art Carter, with several advertising accounts (Ford Motor, B-Bar-H Guest Ranch, National Broadcasting Company) thought it would be a great idea to round up a dozen or more of the evacuées and take them out to have a look at America's natural wonderland, the desert.

"I took a few of our own orphans, just so there'd be no squawk," Carter explains, "borrowed ten cars from the Ford people, arranged with the Ranch to put the kids up for three days and then invited a few of NBC's stars to look in on us."

Benefit-minded Bob Hope was one of the first to respond. He and his wife and Mr. and Mrs. Jerry Colonna spent several days with the evacuées, and Irene Rich not only devoted several days to them but outfitted all the children with "chaps," high-heeled cowboy boots, plaid shirts, scarves, sombreros. Other stars who joined them were Martha O'Driscoll, Preston Foster, Cowboy Actor Monty Montaigne. Even if the blank cartridges which were to be shot off in the mock stage coach robbery didn't arrive in time, the kids thought that the whole show was ripping.

What caught at the throats of the show's sponsors was the little lad who, after the children had retired on the first night, marched down to the desk clerk and asked him a question. "Please, sir," the child asked, "at what time do the bombings start?" That really made them think about these wartime evacuées.

Thirty-six-year-old Phil Harris, who acquired his southern accent in Nashville, Tennessee, where he was raised, was married to Marcia Ralston, attractive Australian Columbia Pictures player, for exactly twelve years and nine months! They decided to divorce in their unlucky thirteenth year. This split becomes final in September. And as soon as it does, Phil will remarry Alice just to make sure they are legally wed, since barristers question the validity of all hurry-up Mexican marriages.

Incidentally, Phil Harris and Marcia Ralston have a young adopted boy, and insiders state that Alice would give anything to have him as a stepson. She's wild about the youngster, recently bought him a crate load of special toys —and the boy, in turn, has a crush on Alice.

The handwriting on the wedding wall this time looks good, since both Faye and Harris are musicians, and both expect to continue their careers in Hollywood.

Brown-haired Phil, for many years famous as a crooner of love songs and reputed as a bandstand wit, originally took music lessons from his father in Nashville. He made his radio début many years ago, on Rudy Vallee's program. In fact, it was Vallee's enthusiastic plugging that aided newcomer Harris in landing his first big orchestra job at Manhattan's Hotel Pennsylvania.

The long arm of coincidence and Rudy Vallee also touched Alice Faye. A remarkable thing. For just after Vallee helped Phil Harris to fame, he also gave a hand to Alice. In the early days she was an ordinary chorus girl kicking her tootsies in George White's very naked Scandals. And the legend has been that for years she was silently in love with the fabulous Vallee. At any rate, Vallee was brought to Hollywood along with the George White girls to star in a big cinema production. Alice's only job was to lead her chorus girls in singing before the camera that hit tune, "Oh, You Nasty Man." But at the last moment, the Big Name of the show, Lillian Harvey, suffered a fit of ordinary temperament and said she didn't want to play in the Scandals.

"What am I going to do for a leading lady?" moaned the producer.

"Well," said Vallee, "I know a cute little girl in the chorus who could play the part."

So Alice Faye, just like Harris before her, was pushed up the ladder by the ever-generous, star-making Rudy Vallee.

When the blonde 29-year-old songstress was first introduced to Phil Harris, the sophisticated baton-waver at his night-spot, the Wilshire Bowl, it was an immediate "take." They began going around together nightly. For many months previously Alice had been half-heartedly playing the field. Going out with this fellow and that fellow. But her natural reticence, the complexity of her inferiority, the weight of her loneliness, kept her home the bulk of the time. With extrovert Harris she found her release. He was her kind. He talked her language.

They went to Charlie Foy's intimate restaurant in the Valley and ate in a shadowy corner. They went to the dazzling and rowdy-dow Palladium Music Hall next door to NBC and jitterbugged and twirled to Glenn Miller's music. She called him Baby. He called her Honey. They didn't want fanfare, and they avoided photographers and crowds. They lived near each other in Encino and went for long brisk hikes in the blue hills. They went riding. They went dancing. They went a little crazy. And it was spring. But, of course, that had nothing to do with it.

For a long time Alice had been begging Zanuck for a vacation. She'd been working hard, pushing hard, was very nervous. Suddenly her three months' vacation was granted. She'd planned to go to New York with her mother. In all her years in Hollywood she commuted to New York, the old Tin Pan town, where she felt relaxed and at home. But now, at once, she was confused. A chance for a vacation in New York. And fun. Yet she was going steady with this Phil Harris. Also fun.

She went to New York finally, through the Panama Canal on the mighty and mammoth S.S. America. She would see the latest shows, buy the newest dresses, visit the oldest friends. She stayed in New York exactly three days. Each of these days she phoned Phil Harris. She missed him madly. He missed her badly. She returned to Hollywood.

He was dividing his time between the Wilshire Bowl and a personal appearance on the stage of the Paramount Theatre. At the theatre she appeared nightly backstage and sat in the wings watching him and waiting to go out with him. At the Bowl she was at a front table regularly.

Finally, on her birthday Alice Faye received two presents from Phil Harris. The first was an engagement ring. The second was a recording Phil had made of his own voice crooning softly over and over and over, "Will you marry me, Alice?"

A week before she decided, she was in NBC, sitting in the control booth watching her Phil broadcast with Jack Benny. During the program, Harris began making fun of Benny which prompted Jack to ad lib that one classic line. He pointed up to blushing Alice in the glass enclosure and, nodding toward Phil Harris, remarked:

"You know, I just can't understand what Alice sees in that guy!"

The audience roared.

But apparently Alice sees plenty. For while she loves to read best-sellers, Harris enjoys Hemingway's books and Noel Coward's plays. She loves bowling more than any other sport, and he, too, likes to spend time at the Hollywood Recreation Center shooting at the ten pins. Alice likes to be carefree, to dress in slacks, to stay up late when not working, to hum songs, and Phil also prefers the easy and unorthodox jam session life.

Above and before everything, Alice Faye has always wanted, always desired, a husband who could bring to her love, companionship and music. Phil Harris will give her that love, that companionship—and certainly, now at last, she shall have that music!

LIPS THAT LURE

lines that add so many years to your appearance. Pucker and purse your lips every time you can. Whistle as often as you dare without shocking all your friends and relatives. Blow hard and soft by turns—when you are in the privacy of your own room. By such surprising antics are soft, lovely lips developed. Open and close your mouth, first vigorously, then gently, many times a day in odd, spare moments. Chew gum for at least a little while each day. This is a marvelous loosener-upper of lip and mouth muscles. And here is an exercise which, if practiced faithfully, will help correct a drooping mouth: Put a little finger in each corner of your mouth and pull gently toward your cheeks. This will not stretch or injure delicate tissues if it is done with care.

Another lip-prettier is the exercise of reaching out with your lips to bite an apple or some other edible held just out of reach. This forces lips to take a very beneficial exercise. A deep rotary massage with well-creamed fingertips around the edges of your lips each night and morning is another most effective loosener-upper.

And don't worry about the shape of your lips. If they are soft and expressive, a few lipstick tricks will do the rest, easily. Besides, lip shapes are interesting indexes of character. For instance, a large mouth is an indication of courage, generosity, understanding and good nature—four pretty priceless virtues. A well developed lower lip shows love of luxury. Center fullness in the lower lip suggests protective instincts, such as all good parents have. Sympathy and patience show in fullness of the upper lip. Good judgment, kindness, charity and common sense all lurk behind firm, full, well-proportioned lips. Rosebud lips imply a youthful, even childish disposition.

But now a word about the art of lipstick make-up. When you sit down at your dressing-table to apply your lip rouge, try to visualize your lips as a structural part of your face to be fitted and related to the rest of your physiognomy—as well as to your own personality. Let your lips express YOU—the very best side of you.

If your face is oval, make your lips full and natural-looking and not too daring in color. Oval, you know, is the ideal face shape, and lips to harmonize must never be extreme in any way.

If your face is round, rouge your lips into rather wide curves. This will give the illusion of an oval face.

If your face is long, lips should be fairly wide, especially the lower one, and the color should be carried all the way out to the corners.

If your face is square, curve your lips with a strong bold line. Tilt them upward just a bit at the corners, too.

If your face is diamond-shaped, stress the center of your lips with extra color, outline them with soft curves and use colors of medium intensity.

If your face is heart-shaped with a broad forehead and narrow chin, shape your lips also something like a heart, using a medium shade of rouge.

If your chin is broad and your forehead narrow, make up your lips to look full as well as wide.

If your nose is short and turns up piquantly, a wide upper lip should accompany it. If your nose is long or large, though, emphasize your lower lip. If your lower lip is a lot fuller than the upper, round out the latter to more nearly match and balance it.

To make your lips appear wider, extend color right out to the very corners. (Be sure it doesn't cake there, though.) To make lips look shorter, shade off the color just before you reach the corners. Color concentrated at the center makes lips look narrower. And do extend your lip rouge far enough inside to leave no sudden break in color when you talk.

To make them fuller, extend the color just a trifle beyond the edges. To narrow their appearance, keep the color just inside their natural line. To avoid chapping, "undress" your lips at night—take off all make-up with soap and water, cream and facial tissue.

Whether your lip rouge comes in stick, cream or liquid form, always apply it last of all your make-up. Whenever possible, start with a perfectly clean face, freshly washed with soap and water and cleansed with a good cream and tissues. You can't expect perfect results if you put new make-up on top of old.

Do your upper lip first, then press both together firmly. This transfers excess color to your lower lip and helps prevent that artificial look.

A long, fine-haired lip rouge brush or a special red make-up pencil can be used to good advantage to outline your lips, especially if you want to actually change their shape. Draw your outline with one of these, then fill in with your lipstick, paste or liquid lip rouge. This make-up technique may be a bit involved for ordinary everyday wear. It does require a little time and skill, but it's well worth the effort for important or extra-special occasions. No matter how you apply your lip rouge, be sure to soften the edges with a tissue or your finger, for nothing will make you look harder or older than a rigid line around your lips.

After finishing the upper lip, shape your lower one carefully. Blot off extra coloring from both with a clean tissue and "set" the color with a light film of powder over all. If you don't like the mat finish that this gives, add a tiny drop of cream—or just moisten your lips.

Skill, not speed, should be your aim in lip make-up. Don't try to change your type. Study your face; then dramatize your best points and play down your poorest. Lips that lure are softly, artfully natural looking. They speak of grace and charm and warmth—not hardness or artificiality.

It's every girl's duty to present a fresh, dewy face, even on sultry summer days. You can keep your skin clean and lovely by always using Phillips' Milk of Magnesia two companion aids to beauty, the Cleansing Cream for a thorough job of loosening and absorbing surface dirt, and the Texture Cream as a good skin softener and make-up base. This latter removes excess oiliness or softens roughness so that powder and other cosmetics smooth on easily and last for hours. Both neutralize excess acid accumulations on the skin.

If your fingernails are brittle and unhealthy, don't make excuses for them. Instead, let Mayfair Nail Culture help you get them back into condition. It includes two preparations which, used together regularly, will restore nails to their natural pliancy and correct irritating cuticle conditions. It's extremely beneficial to your nails after your hands have been in water, and can be used both before or after applying nail polish. Why not try Mayfair Nail Culture today?

times they'll let you come fairly close. To Cagney that's a major delight, as snuffing their lives out seems a major crime. Unless a man's hungry. Really hungry and with no other means of getting a meal.

If rabbits are killed anywhere on his property, whoever's responsible takes care that the boss doesn't know it. He won't even let them destroy snails. Standing beside a rosebush with the gardener, he picked one up, examined it closely and set it back where he'd found it.

"I'll get some snarol," said the gardener.

"Don't bother—"

"But they do a lot of damage."

"Let 'em live," said Cagney. "They probably do good in some other way."

You can't be associated with him for long without realizing the intensity of his repugnance to the destruction of life. Not that he forces it on you. He's no crusader. But it's part of him, as the fiber is part of cloth. While the Coldwater Canyon house was being built, Chuck Griffin, his secretary, heard the police dog yelping at the foot of a tree 'round which some workmen, almost as excited as the dog, were gathered. One of them was about to hurl a stick of wood but waited for Chuck to get in on the fun.

Up in the branches two scared raccoons huddled close to each other as if for solace, rigid with terror at the hubbub below.

"Better break it up, boys," said Chuck, "before Cagney comes along."

"Why, what's the matter? We just want to get 'em down for the dog."

"Well, I'm telling you. If Cagney sees this, he's likely to beat the tar out of you."

They thought he was kidding. He shrugged. "That's the way he is. Just a funny guy."

When he did come along, the funny guy locked the dog up in the garage until in their own good time the raccoons beat it.

Most of us like one animal or another—horses and dogs that respond to affection. We may think that deer are beautiful and raccoons are cute. But few of us get worked up over fish. Cagney doesn't make eyes at them, either. Yet life in whatever form is sacred, and for years he refused to let anyone fish from his boat, yielding only under pressure to the jeers and pleas of his friends. He managed to ruin fishing for his brother Bill.

Bill Cagney, Jim's producer and manager, was a fisherman of parts. Had anyone told him that the day would come when a few words were to make him quit the sport, he'd have grinned derision. For four days on end once he sat in a boat casting, impervious to a lovely girl on the bank who kept waving him to come ashore.

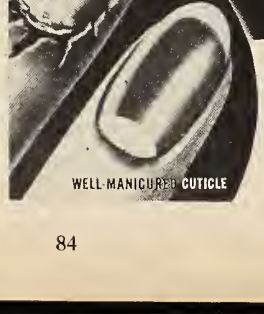
He and Jim had sailed to Catalina. About to land, Bill had said: "I think I'll stay and catch some fish for dinner."

"I wish you wouldn't fish from the boat, Bill—"

Bill flapped a weary hand.

"Okay, I've only got one thing to say." Jim picked up a gaff. "Proportionately, that hook to the fish is about as big as this gaff to you. How'd you like to get it through the side of the face, in the eye maybe, and be played back and forth through the water that way for ten minutes? All right, don't tell me those fish don't feel. Their nerves are as quick as ours—"

"Go away," murmured Bill. "You're breaking my heart."



JIM went. Bill stayed and fished and reeled in his first catch. Removing the hook, he found himself wincing, most uncomfortably conscious of the gaff through his own eye. "Damn!" said Bill, and threw the fish back. From then on he was through. "My brother stuffed me inside a herring's skin," he explains in what passes for self-disgust.

Animals are dependent on human good will, which to Cagney's way of thinking makes humans responsible for them. About people he feels otherwise. He doesn't believe in coddling. He thinks the greatest kindness one human can do another is to help him toward self-dependence. He himself was bred to the school of hard knocks, economic and physical. He thinks they buttress the spirit and build character, that unless we're trained to stand up to them, they will destroy us.

He's no sucker. He won't fall for whiners or chiselers or the female who takes advantage of being one. If you're out on a limb through your own folly, he's likely to let you find your way down yourself on the principle that you'll eye the next limb twice before leaping. But the boys on the lot know that when they're in real trouble—an operation that can't be paid for, a sick child, a job desperately needed—Jim will take care of them. "See Bill," he says. Bill has standing orders. Jim prefers it that way. It saves him from squirming through the bog of embarrassment into which thanks plunge him. To let the right hand know what the left does is almost worse than keeping both in the pockets. There was no fanfare when he and his wife adopted their redheaded three-year-old. Against his efforts the bare fact leaked out. He's seen to it that there's been no further leakage.

His understanding is not confined to the checkbook. Newcomers playing with him bless his name. They don't even have to be newcomers. Co-starring in "The Bride Came C.O.D.," Bette Davis said: "I thought I knew something about acting. There's my professor." Ann Sheridan drew her first major part in "Angels With Dirty Faces." She was jittery as a jello. They started with a scene in which she slapped Cagney. She couldn't get it right. Having slapped his face crimson, she tried to fake it for rehearsal, and every time she faked it, Mike Curtiz, the director, yelled.

Cagney stopped the slaughter, took

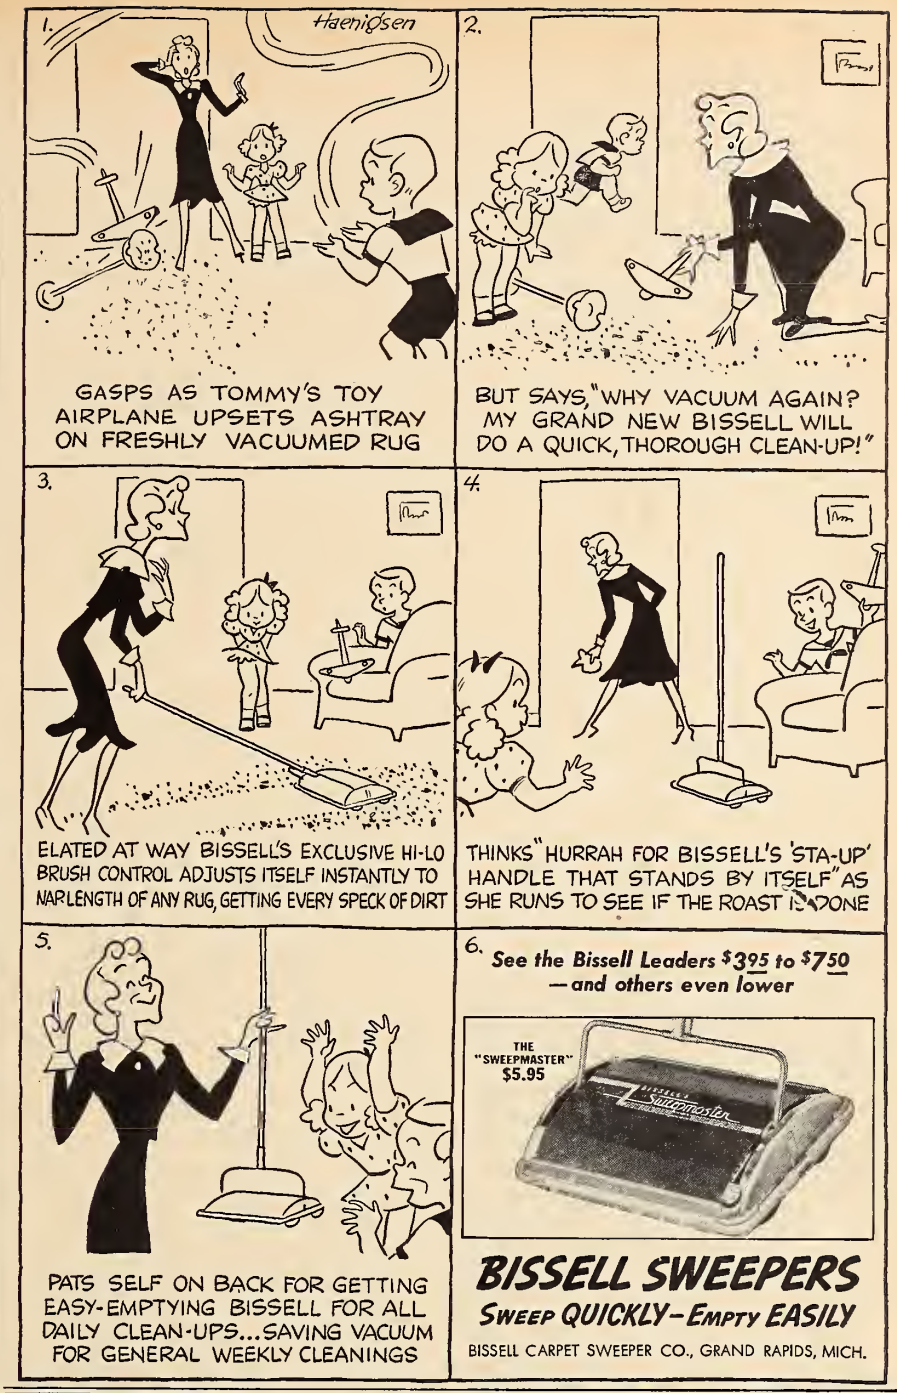
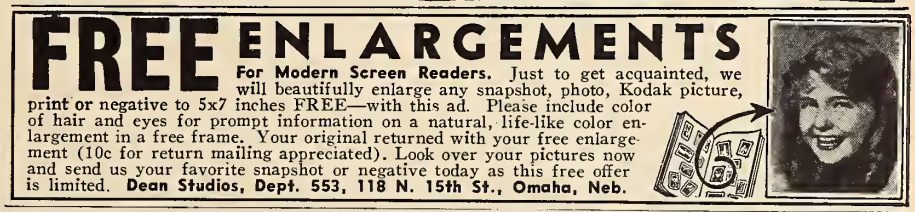
Ann off to the sidelines and rehearsed her quietly for fifteen minutes. Then he pointed to the camera. "See that thing, honey? There's plenty of film in there. Spoil a hundred feet, and there's always another hundred left. So just take it easy." They all profited from that. Ann lost her nervousness, and Curtiz got his scene in one take.

Arthur Kennedy was brought from New York to play Cagney's musician brother in "City for Conquest." Jim had asked for him on the strength of George M. Cohan's assertion that he was the finest young actor on Broadway. On the morning of Arthur's first test, Jim dropped in, grinned hello, good luck and goodbye. "Anyone else," says Kennedy, "with the best intentions in the world would have driven me nuts, sticking around, talking, encouraging, trying to be nice. He did just enough—showed a friendly interest, which was what I needed—and got out."



When he gathers at Chasen's with his pals—Frank McHugh, Pat O'Brien, Allen Jenkins, Ralph Bellamy, Spencer Tracy (the Irish Club, they call themselves)—his tongue wags freely. On the set he's quiet, listens more than he talks. The chair beside him soon finds an occupant. "How's the wife? How's the kid?" asks Jim. His queries are never perfunctory. He knows that the kid's been teething, that the wife's just back from a visit with her folks. His memory for names and faces is precise. He associates not only the name with the face but the human being with both. "Did your husband get over that operation all right?" he asked a woman visitor to the set. She stared at him as if he'd pulled a rabbit out of her nose. He'd met her husband briefly in Chicago five years earlier. What had stuck in his mind was the thing which had lain uppermost in the other's mind—an impending trip to the hospital.



HE can find no excuse for discourtesy—especially when shown to those who are in no position to talk back. He's the antithesis of the fellow who bawls out the waiter—a performance, incidentally, that makes him see red. Visitors on a Hollywood set have little more than a nuisance value. They stand around gaping, they cough in the middle of a take, they make the temperamental nervous. So when people want to ensure friends a thrill and a cordial reception at one stroke, they steer them around to wherever Cagney's working.

He treats them as a host treats a welcome guest. When they leave, he sees them to the door. If they gibber, as they're likely to do on their first encounter with a movie star, he does his very best to put them at ease. "Isn't it a lovely day?" was all one tremulous lady could find to gasp. Instead of letting it lie like an egg, he picked the day up and went on from there to days in general and California's in particular, not to mention the nights—till he'd restored to the lady her poise and spirits. For which she remembers him in her prayers.

The supposedly tough Cagney neither smokes nor drinks. He used to be interested in the fine points of boxing. Now he rarely goes to fights—only when he's invited and feels he can't beg off. He doesn't enjoy watching green kids take a shellacking. His tastes have turned him toward other and gentler arts.

He writes verse and makes etchings, but is shy about showing his compositions in either even to his intimates. He loves Persian miniatures. If you know them at all, you'll remember the goats arrested between leaps in postures enchanting and absurd, knees bent, cloven hoofs pointed like a ballerina's. Cagney keeps goats for the sole pleasure of watching them run up the hillside and hit that pose.

He's sometimes a riddle to his nearest and dearest. Walking in Beverly with Bill, he grabbed his brother's arm as the latter moved to take a short cut over the spring grass.

"What's the matter? You've done that half a dozen times before. Still afraid someone's going to yell get off the grass?"

"Let's go 'round. That's alive. No sense in trampling it."

"You slay me," sighed Bill, going around. "How about the rabbits trampling your cabbage patch?"

Jim grinned. "Any time you need grass in your diet, go ahead and take the short cut on all fours."

There's one look of Jim's that requires no explaining. Bill has caught it often. They may be laughing together when down it comes, pitying, still and baffled, cutting off laughter like a pair of shears. Then Bill looks around to see what's eating him now—some blind man tapping his way along the boulevard, a dog with his tail up but a leg gone. It may be something as simple as a girl in a cheap new hat which calls glaring attention to her scuffed shoes and wilted spring suit.

"Look at her. She's got two dollars in the world to spend, and that's all she's got."

Whatever his private reaction, Bill registers protest. "She's happy. She loves that hat. She figures it looks snappy, she's got a date with a boy, she's going out tonight, and where the devil are you going tonight?"

Not that he thinks to persuade his over-sensitive brother. But drawing a smile, he feels the glow of some minor achievement.

A man of perception and few words, having met Cagney for the first time, said to the friend who'd introduced them. "I like him. He's a fellow you'd want alongside if you were in trouble."

And that, as well as any single phrase can, sums up the kind of a hairpin Cagney is.

IT'S A HECK OF A SENSATION

players, all right—they were in the cellar in the Southwest Conference—but they couldn't hire any. And he couldn't seem to think of any campus jobs I could get to support myself. I shrugged my shoulders and started out the door to head on West. Maybe the fact that I could depart so blithely got under his skin. Anyway, he called me back and said he had just thought of a job I could have. So I went to Rice—for seven years."

He played fullback on the Freshman eleven, which mopped up all opposition. The next year when the same team became the Varsity eleven, Rice started getting on the sports pages. Jim played end until a crackled knee benched him. He was out of competition when Rice won the Conference championship in 1934. But he can always say that he took part in The Reformation.

"I signed up for the pre-med course when I entered. I wanted to be a doctor. I had very high ideals. But the going was too tough, working my own way, so I had to give up the doctor idea.

"'Now what?' I asked myself. Cold reasoning told me that the smart thing was not to get set in any one line but to be pliable. I had seen plenty of fellows train themselves for certain definite professions and then not be able to get any jobs in those professions—and not know how to do anything else. . . . I decided I wanted a diversified education, to be able to mix with all kinds of people. I took everything from animal husbandry to child psychology with the idea in back of my mind that if I could mix with all kinds of people, I could be a salesman.

"And it's lucky that I went through with the idea of being pliable because, when I got out of college, the only job in sight was that of a roughneck in the oil fields. I slung iron around for three months." He grins reminiscently. "You never know what you can do till you try.

"Then I got a job with General Motors in Houston. The head of the GM office there knew me at Rice when I played football and basketball. He was one of the people I hit for a job when I got out. He said then that when something opened up, he'd send for me. A lot of other people said the same thing. Only he remembered.

"I started at the bottom—collecting delinquent accounts—and worked up to sales promotion manager."

That took approximately two years, at the end of which time he was entitled to two weeks' vacation. Jim decided to spend it in Hollywood.

"I looked over Hollywood a few days and decided I liked the place. Then I went out to M-G-M to see talent scout Hinsdell. 'I want to ask you two questions,' I said, '—after you take a look at me.' He raised his eyebrows and said, 'Yes. Go ahead.' I plunged. I said, 'Discounting whether I have ability or not, how do I stack up physically? Would I photograph as anything?'

"He thought I was nuts. He asked me, 'What's on your mind?' I told him. I said, 'The second question depends on your answer to the first one. The second question is: How does a guy who has never acted in his life learn how to act?'

"He found out that I wasn't a nut, and luckily for me, he was a Texan. He got a kick out of this blunt Texan barging into his office and coming right to the point.

"He said, 'Go back down to Houston and get yourself a diction teacher and get in some Little Theatre plays. Come back a year from now, and we'll have another look at you.'

"The next year I came back. Again, on my vacation. I wasn't burning any bridges behind me."

By this time, Hinsdell was at Paramount. So Jim went to Paramount.

"I walked in on a Monday afternoon—to face this talent-scout array. I had nothing to lose so I wasn't afraid of them. I showed them my one newspaper clipping and my photograph. They said they liked me, and if I would stay around for six weeks and take some lessons in screen acting, they would give me a test. I said, 'Oh, no. I'm here on a two weeks' vacation from a good job. I'm not going to toss up that job on a gamble. If you don't want me, I'm going around to other studios.'"

When he blithely started out the door, they reacted like the business manager at Rice. They decided they had a job for him, after all. They gave him a con-

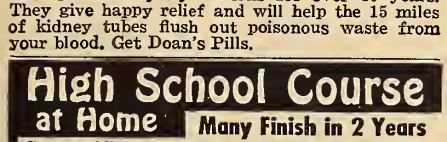
Tired Kidneys Often Bring Sleepless Nights

Doctors say your kidneys contain 15 miles of tiny tubes or filters which help to purify the blood and keep you healthy. When they get tired and don't work right in the daytime, many people have to get up nights. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder. Don't neglect this condition and lose valuable, restful sleep.



When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may also cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

tract without a test. On Wednesday his salary started, and he wired his boss that he wouldn't be back. He had become a movie actor—named James Craig.

"Three weeks later I was playing the lead in a Harry Sherman Western, 'Thunder Trail.' For two years I played nothing but Westerns. I'd be considered for a part in some straight dramatic picture, and then somebody would always ask, 'Have you had any stage experience?' and that was the end of my being considered. I got tired of answering 'No,' so one night about 11 o'clock I pulled out of Hollywood and headed for New York."

He made the rounds of all the Broadway booking offices and all the Broadway producers and finally talked himself into a part in Guthrie McClintic's "Missouri Legend." McClintic, the producer-husband of Katharine Cornell, never hires people who can't act. The fact that he hired Jim was a testimonial that Jim, by this time was an actor. . . . Columbia caught a glimpse of him after he had been in the play three weeks, overpowered him with an offer and rushed him to Hollywood to make some serials.

"After six or seven of those I transferred to Universal where I did six or seven quickies, including one called 'Zanzibar,' which wasn't good but wasn't bad. It played Hollywood, which was something.

"That was how Director Sam Wood happened to invite me over to RKO for an interview along with five hundred other guys, when he started looking for someone to play Mark in 'Kitty Foyle.' We talked about everything but the part and the picture. I still don't know what made him pick me. All I know is that I'm glad he did."

He personally scoffs at this romantic appeal. "I won the girl in 'Kitty Foyle,'" he says, "but I haven't kissed the girl yet. And the only kissing I get to do in this picture is a little old peck on the cheek."

But the fact remains that mash mail is beginning to arrive by the carload. A fact that inspired an over-enthusiastic press-agent to rumor a few romances for him. Jim squelched the rumors immediately with a public announcement that he was a happily married man with a two-and-a-half-year-old son. But ask him about the real romance in his life, and he says, "We don't talk about that." Apparently there is an agreement that he won't bring up his marriage if other people don't bring up phony romance rumors.

The baby's name is James, Jr., but Jim calls him "The Bub."

One thing Jim will never be, if he has anything to say about it (and he'll have plenty to say about it), is a Glamour Boy. "Audiences like to see real people," he says. "It makes it easier for them to visualize themselves in the same situations. I'm going to stick to Kipling's motto: 'Don't look too good nor talk too wise.'"

He lives just as he did before his big break—and still wears the same clothes including the same-size hats. His idea of "going out" is still a visit either to the neighborhood movie or to a baseball game. He has no use for night-clubs. He likes to be able to get up at 6 A. M. to shoot a little golf before going to work.

He worked methodically to get in the movies. But he's convinced today, "You can't get in the movies just for the money and make good. Somewhere along the line a little acting bug has to bite you and give you the urge to do a job well just for the sensation of doing a job well. You can't always do it, but when you can, it's a heck of a sensation."

Dr. Ellis' WAVE SET

did all sorts of things—peddled paintings, tended the art gallery, hustled trays in tea rooms and finally posed in the pink for the paint and palette boys. "I was knee deep in Bohemia," recalled Dorothy, "and sometimes it was pretty sticky."

Just the same, she gradually got around to leads in the Carmel Little Theatre's offerings doing "The Night of January 16th" and "Cradle Song." Then suddenly came contact with Hollywood and—boom!—the headaches began.

Checking back, Dorothy seems to have a talent for getting tangled up with geniuses. Maybe you remember a while back when Charlie Chaplin had had his first spat with Paulette—right before he started "The Great Dictator." Charlie was lolling around Carmel, a little bit on the loose. He went to the Little Theatre one night, saw Dorothy doing her stuff, and the next thing Hollywood heard Chaplin had found a new protégée. She was young and she was beautiful, and to Hollywood that, coupled with Chaplin's well-known tastes, spelled romance. The newspaper boys got busy.

Well, most of them couldn't find anything beyond a rumor because that's all there was, but one enterprising newshawk from a San Francisco sheet hopped down to Carmel and made Dorothy a proposition. If she'd tell all lurid details about the flaming Chaplin romance, said he, he'd be happy to give her reams of publicity. "There isn't any romance. I'm sorry," said Dorothy.

But the fellow wrote the story anyway—a masterpiece of imagination. He also printed a picture of Dorothy taken from her shady lady part in "The Night of January 16th." He just labeled it "Dorothy Comingore," as if that was the way Dorothy went around all the time. And what he hinted about her and Charlie Chaplin was scandalous!

Warner Brothers' casting king saw the item and wrote her a note. Send a picture, he said. Dorothy collected all her life class model proofs, snipped off the heads and forwarded the torsos. "Come at once for a test!" Warners wired.

HA! Ha! laughed Dorothy. "What will I use for money?" she wired back. They sent her that, shipped her down, lodged her at the very fancy Town House, with limousines, with chauffeurs, with everything, in fact, but a part in a picture.

Came the christening then (they tagged her Linda Winters), seventy-five bucks a week, and Dorothy settled down to being a studio stock contract player, than which there is nothing worse if you get the type of exasperating go-by Comingore got.

For when her legs had been properly snapped from every conceivable angle, and all the bathing briefies lensed on her curves, it came—the axe. "No particular promise as a personality" was the report.

She kept in bacon and beans with an extra job here and a bit there around town. She did a Poverty Row quickie and made $150 which looked like a fortune but didn't last like one. Then to her amazement, her agent got her on another stock player studio list—this time at Columbia. Soon Dorothy discovered why.

"What did I do there?" said Dorothy. "Well, my hands were starred in inserts for all sorts of important pictures. The back of my head and other rear views got a good many breaks, too. Then, of course, the bathing suits. Oh, I kept busy. I worked every day and all day. But I didn't do anything, if you get what I mean."

Dorothy finally forged upward and onward to a part in "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." She was one of a bunch of extra tootsies who met Jimmy Stewart at the station. She said "Hello!" under the expert direction of Frank Capra. Which reminds me.

When "Citizen Kane" was first run off in Hollywood, Frank Capra saw it. Someone asked him how he liked Dorothy Comingore. "Great!" replied Capra. "You know she worked in some of my pictures." He didn't say what Dorothy did.

Well, the noble experiment at Columbia finally blew up when Dorothy's option arrived. Her $55 a week was supposed to go up then. It didn't, so Dottie resigned.

SHE went to a Hollywood party shortly afterward feeling particularly ornery. She was busted, discouraged, and her attitude was pretty much what-the-devil. Richard Collins, a young Hollywood writer, singled her out, and they bantered over cocktails. When he told her he was a studio writer, Dorothy cut him short.

"I don't want to have anything to do with you!" she snapped. "I don't want to have anything to do with anybody connected with a studio!"

"Oh, but you are going to have something to do with me," replied Richard. "You're going to marry me." And that's what Dorothy did, although it did take a little persuasion, courting, flowers and things.

In fact Dorothy was Richard's loving wife the night she stepped out on the blind date with Orson Welles. She had bucked enough again to be faintly career-conscious, and she certainly needed publicity. As for Wizard Welles, he'd just come to town with much fanfare, and his press agent knew he had to keep it up in the gossip columns.

They went to a Hollywood première, and the beard said approximately ten words all night. "Good evening, Miss Comingore," and later on, "Good night—and God bless you." It seems he'd already met Dolores Del Rio, and the whole affair was just a chore.

The news photographs came out afterward captioned, "Mr. and Mrs. Orson Welles"—and considering the fact that both Orson and Dorothy were married—but to different people, you couldn't call it a big success. Still—look what happened three months later:

Herb Drake, the press agent who'd staged the blind date, found his boss in an exasperated dither one day. He wanted a leading lady for the début picture he'd finally gotten around to making. He definitely did not want a Hollywood star. He didn't know whom he did want. "Why not try that Comingore girl you stepped out with once?" suggested Herb Drake. Orson looked blank at that, because he'd forgotten the whole thing. But Drake nabbed Dorothy and practically shoved her into Citizen Welles' office, who in turn impatiently shoved the part of Susan Alexander at her, saying, "Study this for an hour and then come back and read it—"

She returned in an hour, read the entire part, and the Wonder Boy of Broadway rose up in his chair. "That's the most intelligent reading I've heard yet!" he cried. "You test tomorrow." It was as short and snappy as that. And so was One-take Comingore's test. In fact her test is right in "Citizen Kane" today!

The production of Orson's first film, as everyone knows, was a free-for-all fight and a mixed up mess from start to finish. And Dorothy was right in the middle. On top of all that she made the whole picture with a madonna's halo around her head. Dorothy's baby arrived in January, and Dottie finished "Citizen Kane" in December. Orson Welles is not one to let a little thing like the progress of life bother him when he dips into a drama. Nor for that matter was Dorothy, even if she did feel—er—uncertain most of the time, having her first baby and her first real role at the same time.

As for the other upsets:

A battle raged around Dorothy's part. Orson had signed Dorothy. But the studio had signed another actress. Result, it was six weeks before Comingore—who could certainly have used it—got a look at a check.

THEN, she'll tell you, the side against her planted a certain assistant on the set to spy on Orson's goings ons and make life miserable for Dorothy in particular. He refused her a dressing room, so she had to dress off the lot—the leading lady, mind you!

Worst of all, of course, was the suspense when Dorothy's one great chance was on celluloid, and—it was announced that "Citizen Kane" would never, never be shown, because it trod on important toes. Well—put yourself in Dorothy's place and try to imagine how Cinderella felt when the coach started turning back to a pumpkin!

And as I said, the only thing that kept RKO from dropping Dorothy's contract in the civil war raging around Kane was Orson's protests. "You can't do this," he raged. "Canning my leading lady before my picture's even released. It's not only a slap at her—it's a poke in the nose for me!"

So—you can see it hasn't all been beer and skittles even lately for Cinderella Comingore. However, she's survived the strain like a peach in a thunder storm.

Outside of sitting professionally pat with ace loanouts looming in the next deal, such as "Jane Eyre," "Sister Carrie" and "Valley of the Sun," Dorothy is having a swell time around the house with her baby and her husband, with spare hours devoted to the good books she devours constantly.

For Comingore knows enough about both art and show business to realize that there's no place like home. You can have Bohemia, the night clubs and Gay Hollywood. She's a home girl. Yes—and she likes to cook—now that she doesn't have to for a living.

The main interests in her life are whether or not one Judith Melinda downs her milk like a good girl and what kind of furniture to get for her house.

For quite a while the living-room was pretty bare and empty. It still hasn't a rug—but that's on order. Dorothy could have filled it with flimsy stuff long ago. Instead she bought just one piece—a big, solid and expensive divan. That's where we sat.

I said it was mighty comfortable, and Dorothy said, "I decided I'd rather have one good piece than a room full of junk. From now on every one I get will be good, too, or I won't get any."

She was talking about furniture, of course. But she was looking out the window toward Hollywood.

Quality, not quantity—that's Dorothy Comingore from now on out. And, offhand, I'd say she had something there.

the embittered old lady, James Barton as the beaten mountaineer, Marjorie Main as the blind lady, and Marc Laurence as the idiot boy, all characters that will live.

Boiled down, the movie resolves itself into a series of sharp and true character portrayals in an over-preachy and somewhat gabby story, magnificently photographed in breath-taking color. Credit is due the keen direction by Henry Hathaway.—Paramount.

★★★ She Knew All the Answers

There was a chance for something extra-special here in the way of movies, but uneven writing made it just so-so.

Joan Bennett is a showgirl who is about to marry a wealthy playboy, John Hubbard. But John's guardian, Franchot Tone, disapproves and threatens to cut the lad off without a cent. What good is a wealthy playboy without a cent? So Joan goes to work on Franchot by finagling a job as a phone operator in his Wall Street office. Yeah, that's right. She falls for Franchot and leaves John dangling.

Joan is decorative and animated in her role of the showgirl; Franchot drops his usual restraint to deliver a bang-up farce job; Hubbard is in the groove as the rich dawdler; Eve Arden scores sharply as a chorine, and William Tracy is made to order for the office boy spot. Directed by Richard Wallace.—Columbia.

★★★ Adventure in Washington

At one time this movie intended to call itself "Senate Page Boys," which would have been a better title. By any title, it remains a routine story of boys under the Washington dome.

Herbert Marshall and Virginia Bruce are the "names," but Gene Reynolds is the real star from the standpoint of delivery.

He has the best part, and he gives it the most.

The story revolves around young Reynolds, a kid born on the wrong side of the tracks, who is brought to Washington by Herbert Marshall, his Senator, as a page boy. He is a tough kid, ready to fight, ready for anything—except discipline. He is, of course, a troublemaker for a long time, but the other youngsters are so decent and fine that he eventually gives in, knuckles under and becomes one of the mob. Then there is a leak on the Naval Appropriations Bill. Gene gets in a spot, and the film ends in a mock trial in the Senate chamber, with the page boys taking over the senatorial tasks and meting out justice. Hokum? Sure, but it's entertaining.

Marshall as the Senator is one of the movie's disappointments; it is obvious miscasting; Virginia Bruce is excellent as a newspaper gal, even if there never was such a newspaper gal in the world. Director—Alfred Green.—Columbia.

★★★ Caught in the Draft

The thing that skyrocketed Hope to the very top of the column is the fact that he has been given some good solid stuff to act out; in this one he is simply set down among a bunch of soldiers, a bunch of uniforms—and a bunch of old jokebooks. He plays the role of a movie actor who gets hooked into the army, falls for the colonel's daughter, Dorothy Lamour, and—well, that's all the story there is. From here on it's one joke after another—most of them funny, even if you have heard them.

Hope is assured and pleasant; you can't help liking the guy. Dorothy Lamour hasn't any sarongs to wear this time, but she does manage to get in a bathing suit shot, and no one ever denied that she's photogenic. To help the merriment, Bob is surrounded by Lynne Overman and Eddie Bracken, both of whom manage to get in some laughs without jeopardizing Hope's center-of-stage. No songs. Directed by David Butler.—Paramount.

★★★ One Night in Lisbon

Thanks to Madeleine Carroll and Fred MacMurray you will probably want to see this otherwise "so-what" picture.

Once upon a time this was a polite British parlor comedy entitled "There's Always Juliet." In order to give it excitement and scope, it has been moved to a present-day background, with the war sort of vaguely zooming along in the background. The movie, however, remains a polite British parlor comedy.

Madeleine is an English lassie of quality in the British government service, and Fred is an American aviator who flies planes to Europe. They meet in a shelter during an air-raid, and he goes immediately on the make. That's about all the story there is. Madeleine is exactly what you expect her to be, and Fred is a bit better than he has been in the past. Both are perfectly cast, and Virginia Van Upp, who wrote the last three or four movies for this couple, has supplied them with some smooth chatter.

John Loder manages to do an excellent acting job as Madeleine's British suitor. His part calls for no histrionics, which makes it even more remarkable that he manages to stand out. Extra strong support is given by Pat Morison, Billie Burke and Dame May Whitty. Directed by Edward Griffith.—Paramount.

★★★ Billy The Kid

"Billy the Kid" is not the finest cowboy picture ever made, but it comes close to having the best scenic shots ever seen as background, and it has lots of action to the tune of good, hard riding.

Robert Taylor plays the part of Billy the Kid. There is no attempt (at least, this reporter doesn't believe there is) to make the story historically accurate. It is a whitewashing of the legendary bandit's character via the now popular movie method of explaining that he was out getting revenge.

Such story as there is tells of his switch for a moment to the righteous path. He goes to work as an honest cowpuncher for Ian Hunter. But Gene Lockhart's gangsters mow Hunter down, so Taylor goes out for solitary vengeance. Brian Donlevy, Taylor's boyhood friend and Hunter's foreman, regretfully has to pump Taylor full of lead to stop the carnage.

The acting is grim and positive in the way of pictures of this type; nothing subtle about it. The Technicolor is only pretty good. The direction by David Miller is sure-footed.—M-G-M.

★★★ Lady From Louisiana

Here is a surprise for you. Altogether unheralded, it's a peacheroo, and the fact that it was turned out by one of the smaller studios, Republic, is news, too.

This is the story of the rise and fall of the lottery racket in New Orleans many years ago. That means it is a simple gangster film in essence, but the colorful and authentic background, plus A-1 performances, move it way up.

John Wayne is a young racket-busting attorney who cleans up New Orleans after a tough seven-reel struggle. Ona Munson is the Southern belle with whom he falls in love before he learns that her pappy is the racket promoter, Ray Middleton. And this Middleton gent, by the way, turns in what may well be one of the very top acting jobs of the year. He's an eye-opener! Henry Stephenson is fine as a polished gent of the old South, and Helen Westley does her swell matriarch act over again.

Thinking it over, it's the physical production that is outstanding. It all looks so authentic and exciting—and the finale, showing the Mississippi rising, bursting through the levees, is incredibly good. Directed by Bernard Vorhaus.—Republic.

★★★ Her First Beau

Buried under the title is a very extra special good movie. It's fun from the first second. Jane Withers and Jackie Cooper make a swell team; neither of them has ever been more likeable.

The story deals with two families living in a small town, one with a son, one with a daughter. There is a big party, the girl's first evening dress, a forbidden night flight over a dangerous lake in an untried sail plane and all sorts of other boy-girl items.

Jane dons long dresses and grown-up hair-do for the first time here and does it ingratiatingly. There is nothing to choose from in either of their performances; Jackie is as good as Janey, and vice versa. An extra good support cast includes Edith Fellows, William Tracy, Martha O'Driscoll, Una O'Connor, Josephine Hutchinson and Jonathan Hale. There is love and warmth in the direction by Theodore Reed.—Columbia.

★★½ Strange Alibi

A fast-moving plot with a neat trick finale makes this a good entry in the cops and robbers derby.

With practically no waste of footage, the story delves right into a big city crime wave. Arthur Kennedy, a young copper, frames himself into a spot where he allegedly is ready to rat; the racketeers take him on as one of the mob but give him more than he bargained for. They maneuver him to the point of his getting sent up for life on a phony killing rap. He has to break out of jail, having lost face all around, in order to prove himself innocent and point the finger at the tough hombres.

Tempo of suspense is maintained neatly, and the yarn really gets you, phony elements and all. This Kennedy lad, by the way, is the one who should benefit most from the film. He's plenty okay. Joan Perry doesn't get much to do. Jonathan Hale is best in support. Directed by D. Ross Lederman.—Warners.

★★½ Affectionately Yours

These things happen once in a while, so you needn't get too upset about it. All the pictures can't be good, can they? This one has Merle Oberon, Rita Hayworth and Dennis Morgan in the top rungs, which should have guaranteed it, but—maybe everybody was just trying too hard.

The story is one of those fluffy now-I'm-married, now-I-ain't affairs. Morgan is a Hollywood idea of a foreign correspondent, and his wife (Merle Oberon) wants peace and quiet; so she divorces him and is about to marry Ralph Bellamy. That's swell with newspaperwoman Rita, who wants Dennis for herself. But it's not okay with Dennis, because he still loves Merle. So you have seven reels of Dennis convincing Merle that she still loves him.

Bellamy, of course, has been playing the other man part so long that he fits it and can say his lines with his eyes shut. James Gleason and George Tobias get some good laughs in support. Lloyd Bacon's direction is spotty—Warners.

★★½ Rookies On Parade

Although it lacks star power, this pleasant little musical should satisfy you. It packs laughs, has pleasant tunes.

Bob Crosby has the lead and shows once more that he is deserving of better things; the kid'll be giving brother Bing a race for his money one of these days. Cliff Nazarro (with and without doubletalk) scores neatly; Eddie Foy, jr., is a rare good comic; William Demarest and Marie Wilson contribute their share of fun, and Gertrude Niesen sings.

Crosby is cast as a disgruntled songwriter who gambles away his bankroll and that of his girl friend (Ruth Terry). Then he gets called to the army and, after more sulking and difficulty, turns over a new leaf, produces an army camp show and is regenerated. Orchids to Director Joseph Santley.—Republic.

★★½ Shining Victory

"Shining Victory" is the story of a doctor's research in psycho-biology. His earlier discoveries are stolen by another doc, so he's forced to begin all over again. He falls in love with his assistant, learns the fallacy of his previous belief that there is no room for sentiment in science. Just as he is ready to succeed on both the romantic and scientific fronts, a jealous neurotic burns his lab. The act of saving his records costs the girl's life.

Not very pleasant, is it? As a play named "Jupiter Laughs" it wasn't very successful on Broadway. It is completely unrelieved by humor in its film version. But the production and acting are astonishing. James Stephenson turns in a distinguished rendition as the doctor. Geraldine Fitzgerald's performance as the girl is one that will linger in your memory. Barbara O'Neil, Montagu Love and Donald Crisp are all above par. And remember the director's name, Irving Rapper. He's terrific.—Warners.

★★ They Dare Not Love

Someone went haywire in the conception and production of this picture, so that poor Martha Scott and George Brent never stand a chance. It's completely a matter of poor writing and unimaginative directing.

This is one of the anti-Nazi yarns, always difficult to do on the screen, because the theme hits most of us too close to the heart-line to be taken any less than very seriously. In this case, the story's unreal and movieish.

Besides Scott and Brent, both of whom struggle valiantly, other actors who go down with the ship include such swell thesps as Paul Lukas, Roman Bohnen, Kay Linaker and Egon Brecher. Directed by James Whale.—Columbia.

Even if your Face is not your Fortune—

HEARTS WILL SKIP.. if your Smile is Right!

Smiles gain sparkle when gums are healthy. Help keep your gums firmer with Ipana and Massage.

COMPLIMENTS and popularity—a solitaire for your finger—phone calls, dances and dates. Even without great beauty they're yours to win and possess. Just bring your smile to its sparkling best and eyes and hearts will open to you!

Beauty, you know, is only smile deep. A sparkling smile lights the plainest face—lends it priceless charm. Without one, the loveliest face is shadowed! Help your smile. Never forget—a smile, to be sparkling and attractive, depends largely on firm, healthy gums.

If you see "pink" on your tooth brush—make a date to see your dentist immediately. You may not be in for serious trouble—but let your dentist make the decision.

Very likely he'll tell you your gums are weak and tender because today's soft, creamy foods have robbed them of work and exercise. And, like thousands of modern dentists today, he may very likely suggest "the healthful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage."

Use Ipana and Massage

Ipana not only cleans teeth thoroughly but, with massage, it is especially designed to aid the gums to healthy firmness. Each time you brush your teeth massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums. That invigorating "tang"—exclusive with Ipana and massage—means circulation is quickening in the gum tissues—helping gums to healthier firmness.

Get an economical tube of Ipana Tooth Paste today. Help keep your smile charming, attractive, winning.

"A LOVELY SMILE IS MOST IMPORTANT TO BEAUTY!"

Beauty Experts of 23 out of 24 leading magazines agree

Yes, of the nation's foremost beauty editors, representing 24 leading magazines, 23 agreed that a sparkling smile is a woman's most precious asset.

"Even a plain girl," they said, "takes on charm and glamour if her smile is bright and lovely. No woman can be really beautiful if her smile is dull and lifeless."

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S
The LION'S ROAR
Published in this space every month
The greatest star of the screen!

How many of you are Greer Garson conscious? Last year about this time she came into her own in the charming "Pride and Prejudice." This year, she is fulfilling every golden promise in "Blossoms In The Dust."

Together with the personable Walter Pidgeon and supported by such deft delineators as Felix Bressart of "Ninotchka", Marsha Hunt, Fay Holden and Samuel Hinds, Greer's portrayal of Edna Gladney becomes a performance to press in a book.

★ ★ ★ ★

The film itself is an ambitious undertaking. It is the story of a glorious woman whose contribution to humanity provided a fountain source for Ralph Wheelwright's pen.

★ ★ ★ ★

As the gallant Edna roams the Lone Star State and "rings every doorbell in Texas" we are alternately moved from despair to joy, sharing her heartaches, cheering her triumphs.

★ ★ ★ ★

What a fighter she is! The battle she puts up for the problem-child is as heroic and thrilling as any battle in a famed war picture.

★ ★ ★ ★

But then, of course, Mervyn LeRoy directed it. He brings to "Blossoms" the same ept understanding that marked his "Waterloo Bridge".

★ ★ ★ ★

Here it is—the august presentation of August. "Blossoms In The Dust". Produced by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, under the guiding hand of Irving Asher.

★ ★ ★ ★

Anita Loos wrote the screen play. Indeed, the best requisites for the good scenario are that it be fast—and loos.

★ ★ ★ ★

In wondrous Technicolor for added majesty.

OLD KING COLE calls it "something worth calling for"

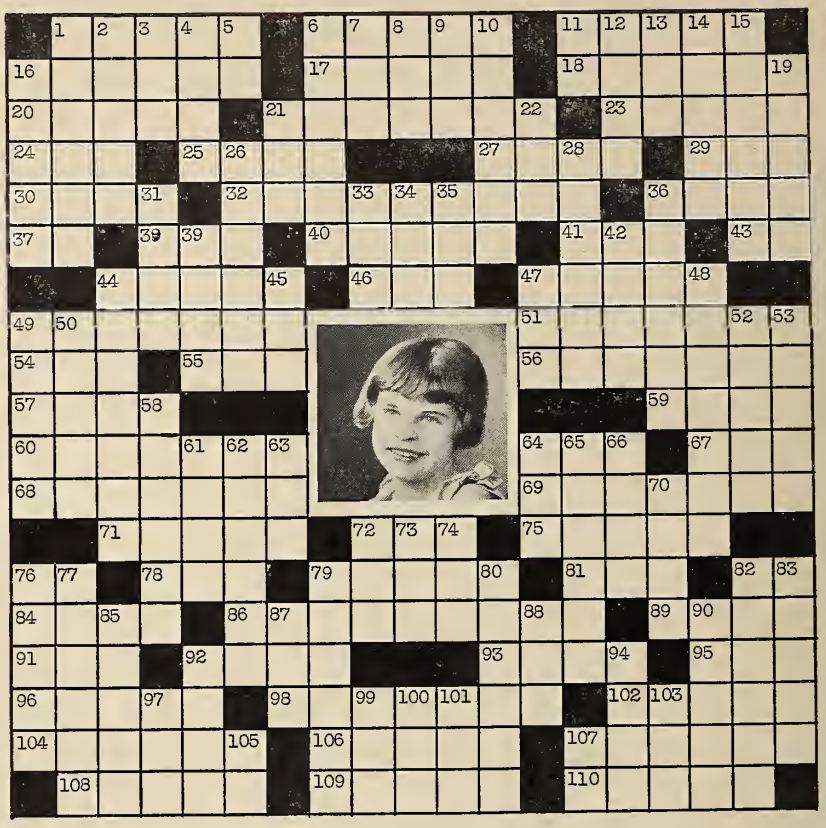
Now Old King Cole was a merry old soul, and he called for his pipe, his bowl, and fiddlers three. Then he shouted extra loud for Dentyne—(that delicious chewing gum that helps keep teeth bright).

That made the fiddlers hopping mad. "How come you call extra loud for Dentyne?" said they.

"Because it's extra good," laughed Old King Cole. "You see, it has a really different flavor—a warmly satisfying goodness, and it's mighty refreshing. Besides, Dentyne's pleasant firmness helps keep your teeth naturally sparkling. Try some."

And the fiddlers, sampling delicious Dentyne, were so delighted they played the merriest tune imaginable.



(Moral: You will feel merry too when you chew Dentyne. You'll enjoy its sparkling flavor—and the way it helps keep teeth bright. Notice Dentyne's handy flat package too).

Francis Lederer

Born Frantesek Ornstein, Prague, Czech., Nov 6, 1906. Son of a poor leather merchant . . . washed windows, swept floors and did display work to finance his education in dramatic school . . . first American role was that of an Eskimo . . . keeps fit in completely equipped gym . . . mad about music . . . neither drinks nor smokes . . . fells listeners with his Czech accent.

Vivien Leigh

Born Vivien Harley, at foot of Mount Everest in Darjeeling, India, Nov. 5, 1913. Never walks, always runs. Collects classical records. Always plays Bing Crosby discs while learning her lines—says it calms her. Owns only one evening gown. Has naturally curly hair. Hates street make-up. Wears only lipstick. Never drinks except before going on stage —then sips champagne for courage.

Diana Lewis

Born Diana Lewis, Asbury Park, N. J., 1919. Wears three-inch heels to make her look taller. Eats too many sweets but never puts on an ounce. She's wed to William Powell who brings her a present every night after work —usually jewelry. In return she stuffs him with his favorite strawberry shortcake! Wears white to show off her fabulous collection of jewels. Loves pussy willows, cocoanut and dancing.

Margaret Lindsay

Born Margaret Kies, Dubuque, Iowa, Sept. 19, 1914. Attended American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York. Broadway was in a lull, so she left for London. Got experience and an English accent, with which she stormed Hollywood where she played in "Cavalcade." Still gets a thrill out of giving autographs. Is always on time. Hates frilly clothes. Adores greyhound races.

MOVIE REVIEWS

BY WOLFE KAUFMAN

Greer Garson as Edna Glodney and Felix Bressort as Dr. Breslar with one of the babies in "Blossams in the Dust." The original Mrs. Glodney devoted her life to finding homes for Texas waifs.

In "Lady Be Good," song writer Ann Sothern gets hearty congratulations on her latest song hit from Reginald Owen. Beside her is Robert Young, who plays her on-again, off-again spouse.

BLOSSOMS IN THE DUST . . . . ★★★★

Here's some of the most poignant acting of the season, a brilliant performance by Greer Garson and a picture that you won't forget.

It is difficult to tell you about this movie in a capsule synopsis and make it sound anything except maudlin—which it is not. The producers have managed to tell you a sob story full of every old homily that ever was—and yet make it sound like brand-new stuff. A lot of it will appeal directly to the tear ducts, but it is not bathos and all of it is in good taste.

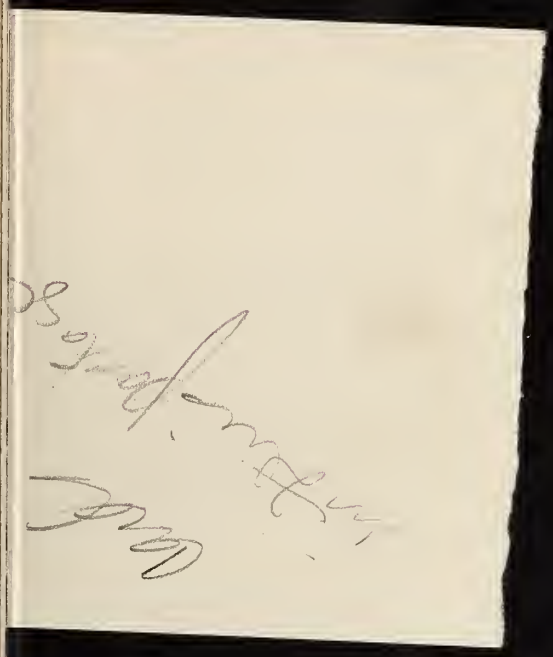
It is a screen biography of Mrs. Edna Gladney of Texas . . . how she lost her baby, learned she couldn't have another and devoted her life thereafter to finding good homes for parentless children. Later she broadened the battle, managing to do away with the legal stigma of illegitimacy on birth certificates, marriage licenses, et cetera. It was not an easy fight, but Mrs. Gladney lived to see herself victorious.

What makes it a worthwhile film is that the writers managed to tell their story in terms of human drama. It is never a preachment; all the steps of the yarn are related via homey, human interest anecdotes that string together into one whole. It is a dramatic biography and a good one.

Outstanding in the acting division is the work of Greer Garson who undoubtedly will win—or come very close to winning—the Academy Award for this job. Not far behind is Walter Pidgeon in the male lead. There's strong support by Felix Bressart, Marsha Hunt and Sam Hinds. The Technicolor photography is exceptionally lovely. And save a nod for the sure, discerning and tasteful direction by Mervyn Le Roy.—M-G-M.

LADY BE GOOD . . . . . ★★★★

This one adds up to a swell show, a great performance, a new star, and a heck of a good time all rolled into one. The new star is Ann Sothern. She sings—and how!—and acts in a brand new way; there simply isn't anyone on the screen today to compare with her.



You will recall that "Lady Be Good" was a one-time musical. Well, Metro has thrown away the old story and shoved in a new one. It's a synthetic but amusing story, and it moves along at a very fast pace.

The plot is a very simple one. Ann Sothern and Robert Young are married. They also write songs together—Bob dishing up the tunes and Ann the lyrics. They are a perfect team and their songs click. They click so well that Bob gets a swelled head, goes for the society racket and doesn't do any writing. Ann gets a divorce. They both go to pieces. They get together again. They click again. They get divorced again. They are both unhappy again. They get married again.

Doesn't sound like much? Well, it is. And swell fun! Especially as handled by Sothern and Young. Eleanor Powell is right near the top in honors as Ann's faithful girl friend, and John Carroll is not far behind as Eleanor's boy friend. Much better than average acting support is turned in by Red Skelton, Lionel Barrymore, Reginald Owen, Rose Hobart and Phil Silvers.

Miss Sothern does most of the singing. She's best in the title song, "Lady Be Good," but does very well, too, by "The Last Time I Saw Paris."

In the dance end, there is Eleanor Powell in top form and the Berry Brothers, a surprisingly agile negro trio. A deep and sincere bow goes to Norman McLeod who deserves praise for his intelligent direction.—M-G-M.

★★★½ In The Navy

There's no sense trying to detail the plot of a comedy film and even less so with one of these Abbott and Costello goulashes. It is simply a great big blob of humorous routines wound around the two funny men, plus some singing by the Andrew Sisters and Dick Powell—and some romancing (none too seriously handled, thank goodness) between Powell and Claire Dodd.

The picture starts with a very good gag and ends with another one. A lot of laughs are sandwiched in between, the outstanding hunk of business probably being when Lou (the fat boy) dreams that he is captain of the ship and in charge of naval maneuvers.

Just to prove that we are critics, always wanting fudge sauce on our ice cream, it might be pointed out that the musical score is not very much and that there isn't a single outstanding song in the film. That's a handicap for the Andrew gals. Dick Powell is excellent in support, Claire Dodd is a luscious dish who ought to be seen more frequently, and Dick Foran stands out among the other players. Very neat pacing by director Arthur Lubin.—Universal.

★★★½ Man Hunt

Sheer melodrama from the first minute to the last, this is the picturization of a grim narrative competing with the blaring headlines of your daily newspaper. It establishes instant suspense and an intense pitch when a big-game-hunting gent (Walter Pidgeon) becomes the object of a deadly hunt by the Gestapo after he almost potshots at Hitler successfully.

The picture has a strong sense of actuality throughout its greater part, traceable almost directly to the magnificent acting of Pidgeon and George Sanders, plus the sure skill of Fritz Lang's direction. Some of the suspense is so astonishingly taut as to almost hurt—and is most reminiscent of the suspense in "M," an earlier picture of Lang's made in once-happy Germany.

It is an eight-reel chase, really; the picture starts off with Sanders, head of the German police, chasing Pidgeon and continues until he gets his man—though not as successfully as he had anticipated. There's a startling finale with a timeliness that cannot be described.

In all departments the picture is outstanding. Beyond the unbelievably good work of Sanders and Pidgeon, there is a surprisingly good piece of acting by Joan Bennett as a Cockney girl. You've never seen her in such a good role. An interesting and important screen debut is that of Roddy McDowall, an English lad who seems destined for a very important future. Very fine support is handled by John Carradine, Roger Imhof, Frederick Worlock, Heather Thatcher and Egon Brecher.—TCF.

★★★½ The Big Store

In order to take this reviewer's word about a Marx Brothers picture—any Marx Brothers pictures—you've got to reach for your salt cellar. Because as far as we are concerned, the Marxes just can't be bad. We're suckers for their every little movement and gesture. So when we tell you that this is the best Marx picture in a long time, you can shrug your shoulders and sniff if you want to—but it's still a doggone good movie.

"The Big Store" is not an arty movie.

MUM

TAKES THE ODOR OUT OF PERSPIRATION

It is plain, ordinary, down-to-earth, up-(but not far)-from-the-gutter comedy. A laugh a minute. If that's the way you like movies, this is your dish.

The story? Ah, yes, the story. The Marxmen are turned loose in a department store where they are engaged to protect the life of the owner. They nab the villain for the finale, and Wolfe J. Flywheel (Groucho Marx) turns to the audience and says, "See, I told you in the first reel that this guy is a crook."

So that's the story and you can imagine some of the antics this involves. Anyway, it's all fun. And sprinkled in between, in healthy sloshes, is a lot of swellegant music. The direction by Charles Reisner is fast-paced and top-notch.—M-G-M.

★★★½ Moon Over Miami

This is a remake of "Three Blind Mice," which you probably don't remember, and it shouldn't worry you. It's pretty hard to recognize in its new finery. It is an outstanding musical comedy, almost all the credit going to the exceptionally fine musical score. An excellent cast headed by Don Ameche, Betty Grable, Robert Cummings, Charlotte Greenwood, Jack Haley and Carole Landis doesn't hurt, either.

The story is not too much, but serves the purpose. Only trouble with it is that it has been used so many times before. Nevertheless, the writers have stuck some very amusing dialogue into it, and it won't annoy you.

Betty Grable and Carole Landis are car hops who decide to go on the make for a million. They get a small bankroll and blow it all on a fancy set of duds for Betty, while Carole hides her beauty in shabby clothes and specs. Charlotte Greenwood is their aunt and gets a lot of laughs out of her role when she poses as their servant to fool the doughboys.

Both girls are fine, although Betty gets the best of it because of better material and a couple of extra special hotcha dance numbers. Don Ameche and Bob Cummings are the lads who are picked on by the designing dames as the most likely marital prospects, and both are okay. Jack Haley is amusing as a waiter. Directed by Walter Lang.—TCF.

★★★½ Underground

Heavy, harsh melodrama, this, spun at a gripping pace. It is an intense yarn of today and whether you enjoy it or not, you will remember it.

Located in Germany, the story has to do with the underground movement whereby a brave few of the German people are trying to deliver their brethren from slavery. Now all this may be wishful thinking; there may be no such movement in Germany, and there may be no such brave and daring souls —but it is nevertheless good, solid and frequently shocking movie material. It has an authentic ring which, perhaps, is even stronger than the truth. Movies have a way of doing that on occasion.

The story tells about two brothers in modern Germany. Philip Dorn is the chief of the underground movement, while his brother, Jeffrey Lynn, is a loyal party member who lost an arm at the battle of Dunkirk. The climax is reached when Jeff unknowingly turns in his own brother to save a female member of the renegades, with whom he is in love. He hadn't realized that his brother was mixed up with the movement. When he sees the brother tortured and beaten, the full impact of his deed strikes home. He takes his brother's place in the secret work.

Kaaren Verne, the girl, is a recent Austrian import, and this is her first American movie. She has looks and she seems to have intelligence, too. We'll have to see more of her work before we predict, but she is apparently headed for important parts. Mona Maris does an excellent supporting job, and Martin Kosleck turns in another of his frighteningly cold jobs as the Gestapo agent. He can get more meanness into his eyes without even trying than anyone since Joe Von Sternberg in his heyday.—W. B.

★★★½ Out of the Fog

For about half an hour at the beginning of this picture, it looked as if it were going to be the top film of the year. The possibilities were there—a good audience movie with real artistic merit. Then the writers and producers began cheating on the story and it winds up just a good movie.

Why the title was changed from the original "The Gentle People" will always remain a mystery. It was a good play under that title, and the subject matter still concerns itself with some lovely, meek, gentle folks who can take just so much — and then they stand up and punch back.

John Garfield is the tough hombre who exacts bitter and nasty toll from Tommy Mitchell and John Qualen, a couple of peace-loving citizens. When he drives them to the very brink of desperation, they decide to kill him.

Ida Lupino is as good as you know she can be in the role of the girl although her characterization is too neurotic to arouse the audience sympathy she deserves. Garfield is as good as he has ever been, and a bit meaner as the toughie than most toughies are. A change of pace would do him good; why don't they give him a comedy or romantic role for a change? Mitchell and Qualen —well, you know how very good they both are. Eddie Albert is just himself as Ida's boyfriend and George Tobias steals his usual allotment of scenes in comedy support.

The direction by Anatole Litvak is tasteful and discerning, and there is a special nod due the exceptionally fine photography by James Wong Howe.— W. B.

★★★ Tight Shoes

Here's a neat surprise item, a picture that didn't figure to be very much from advance indications but turned out to be a swell time-killer. Good, amusing nonsense with plenty of action and a few sweet performances. Binnie Barnes and Brod Crawford are the names you will go away with.

Anything goes for laughs in this screwball affair based on an incredible Damon Runyan yarn. The fact that you never stop to realize how silly the story premise proves that the going's good. You never get a chance to think.

The story tells, in flashback form, how a pair of tight shoes changed a gangster into a shoe clerk and a shoe clerk into a successful politician. In the sequel, another pair of tight shoes pairs off the right couples at the altar after they seem to be headed the wrong way.

Crawford as the gangster is unbelievably good, the only member of the cast (or in the world, for that matter) who can talk Runyonese and make it sound like it's a language used by humans somewhere. Binnie Barnes, playing without restraint as the moll, is delicious. We didn't know she was anywhere near as good as this. John Howard is cast against type and is fine as the clerk, and Anne Gwynne supplies decorative romantics. Neat directing by Albert Rogell. —Universal.

★★★ They Met In Bombay

Here is an interesting example of an old, old theory of ours: it's not what the movie's about that counts; it's who's in it. If this movie had been made by some other studio or with less important stars, you would have said, okay, so what? But it happened to be made with Roz Russell and Clark Gable, so it's super-elegant.

The two stars are in top form here, playing throughout with a neat tongue-in-cheek, let's-have-fun effect. They're both jewel thieves in the Far East, and a slicker pair of flimflam artists you never saw. Working independently, they are hot on the trail of a fabulous gem owned by Jessie Ralph. Naturally there's a great deal of now-you-see-it, now-you-don't. Naturally, also, love rears its beautiful head from out of the plush jewel boxes and they both reform. And live happily ever after.

It's a fairy tale, sure, and not a very convincing one, but it's a lot of fun because the two leading actors are so very much at home in their roles and seem to be having such a good time. They occupy most of the footage, by the way, the best support being offered by Matthew Boulton as a Scotland Yard agent and Reginald Owen. Directed by Clarence Brown. M-G-M.

New Loveliness can be yours— Go on the Camay "MILD-SOAP" DIET!

This lovely bride, Mrs. Frank Morell, Jr., Mt. Vernon, N. Y., says, "I'm really thankful that I went on a 'Mild-Soap' Diet. All my friends tell me how lovely my skin looks—and I'm sure it's largely due to Camay and the 'Mild-Soap' Diet."

Try this exciting beauty idea—praised by lovely brides—based on the advice of skin specialists!

SO MANY WOMEN dim the beauty of their skin through improper cleansing. Others use a beauty soap not as mild as it should be. "My constant beauty care is Camay and the Camay 'Mild-Soap' Diet," says Mrs. Morell, a bride whose lovely complexion makes her an expert.

Leading skin specialists we've consulted advise a regular cleansing routine —daily cleansing with a fine, mild soap. And Camay is not only mild—but milder! Yes, milder by actual test than ten other popular beauty soaps. That's why we say, "Go on the Camay 'Mild-Soap' Diet."

Every single day—twice a day—for 30 days—give your skin Camay's gentle care. Don't miss a single day. It's the regular cleansing that will help you in a few short weeks to see a more appealing skin.

"SUGAR and SPICE"

Bette Davis lunches at the studio commissary while finishing Warner's "The Bride Came C.O.D." She'll top off that vitamin-filled beet salad with quick pep-giving pastry, pineapple flavor.

—THAT'S WHAT THE STARS EAT ON THE SET, REVEALS ROY EARL, WARNER'S PASTRY CHEF

BY NANCY ARCHIBALD

Rich chocolate fudge cakes and brightly-iced pastries are eaten by such slender charmers as Olivia de Havilland, Rita Hayworth and Brenda Marshall at Warner's studio commissary. Even the more serious stars like Bette Davis and Ida Lupino indulge their liking for sweets while working on pictures, reveals Roy Earl, Warner's famous pastry chef.

This culinary artist modestly declares the girls go for his delicate creations because they seek quick-energizing sugar to replace the vitality consumed while emoting on the set. It seems that, far from fearing fat, the stars must guard against the loss of several pounds a day while at work. But a glance at one of Earl's tempting trays of fluffy cream-puffs and glistening éclairs assures us it is more than dietary interest that appeals to these de-lovelies' appetites.

Chef Earl is kept mighty busy catering to the various tastes of his pet actresses, and like any master chef, he outdoes himself for those who really appreciate his delectable desserts. Bette Davis prefers a selection from among his French pastries, particularly those with a pineapple-glaze topping. A fine fruit tart will make Olivia de Havilland happy, while walnut cake trimmed with a scoop of pistachio ice cream delights too-thin Ida Lupino.

Priscilla Lane falls for fudge cake every time. And it's chocolate éclairs—often two of them with a glass of milk—for Brenda Marshall. Ann Sheridan likes to finish a salad-plate luncheon with one of Roy's extra-special charlotte russes. The calories in this dessert really mount up, but remember, Ann is an active young woman, filling her free hours with tennis during the day and the more muscle-exercising types of rumba in the evening.

If you lead a strenuous life and manage to pack in plenty of exercise each day (simple housework is better than any sport or course in setting-up exercises you could name), you can safely include a rather rich dessert in your menu. The government's recent nutrition survey shows that we have not been eating enough vitamin-content food in the past few years. So take this opportunity to have the goodies you long for—but don't forget fruits, green vegetables, meat and fish dishes.

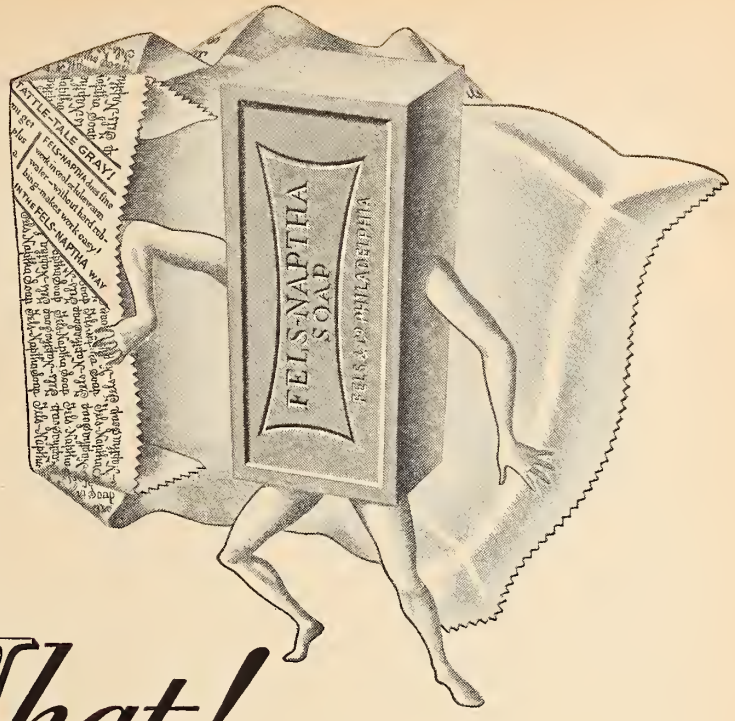
CHOCOLATE SPICE CAKE

2½ cups flour
4 scant teaspoons baking powder
¼ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon each of nutmeg, cinnamon and mace
2 squares unsweetened chocolate
½ cup shortening
1¼ cups sugar
2 eggs, well beaten
1 cup milk
½ teaspoon vanilla

1. Sift flour, baking powder, salt and spices together.

2. Cream shortening thoroughly and blend in sugar and well beaten eggs. Melt unsweetened chocolate over double boiler and add to sugar mixture. Add vanilla and stir in well.

3. Add flour alternately with milk to egg mixture and beat until batter is smooth.



4. Line greased baking tins (using 2 fairly deep tins or 3 shallow tins, according to the number of layers desired) with wax paper, making "ears" with which to lift out cake when it is baked and cooled by cutting 2 strips of paper about 2″ wide and putting beneath lining paper so they cross in the middle and hang over the sides about an inch.

5. Fill prepared tins with batter and bake in a hot oven, 375° F. for 15 minutes. Turn the oven off and allow to bake from 3 to 5 minutes more. Remove, cool and ice.

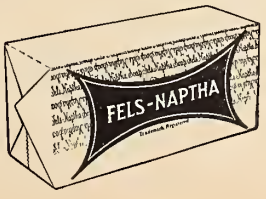
MAGIC CHOCOLATE FROSTING

2 squares unsweetened chocolate
¼ teaspoon vanilla
1 can sweetened condensed milk
1 tablespoon water

Melt chocolate in double boiler. Add sweetened condensed milk and stir over boiling water 5 minutes until it thickens. Add water and vanilla. Spread over cake and serve when cool.

What!

NO DISHES?



You have just bought a piano, a living-room rug, a fine watch, or some similar, substantial adjunct to your home or your scheme of living. What extra inducement was "thrown in" to influence your choice?

The answer, of course, is—nothing. In fact, you'd be suspicious if something extra had been offered! You are satisfied the article itself is worth the price you paid.

Most Fels-Naptha Users feel the same way about laundry soap. They know that a bar or box of Fels-Naptha Soap is worth every penny of the purchase price—in extra washing energy. They don't want any other extras "thrown in."

STIRLING HAYDEN

Nine out of ten American girls would give an eyetooth to be stranded on a South Sea Island with handsome 6' 3", 210-pound sailorman Stirling Hayden. Lucky Madeleine Carroll, his co-star in Paramount's "Bahama Passage," is sole gal to score thus far! Born 24 years ago in Montclair, N. J., Hayden lost his heart to the sea during summer vacations along the Maine coast. When family fortunes dwindled, he turned to fishing with Gloucester salts and shipping out to all four corners of the earth. Highlight of his career was buying the ex-Kaiser's yacht for a passenger service between Boston and Panama. A shipwreck off Cape Hatteras and financial low tide brought this venture abruptly to a close. Hollywood doesn't faze him one bit, and he looks upon it as just another adventure of which his life has been full. He still likes the sniff of salt air and wants to make his home aboard a boat in Santa Monica harbor, from whence he'll commute to his studio.

MARLENE DIETRICH

She may be "Legs" to you and you—but Marlene Dietrich is "Mamma dear" to her 16-year-old daughter Maria. Maria can't remember when her famous mother came over from Germany in 1929 and started the vogue for emerald green fingernails and mannish suits—for zombie-like make-up and slinky foreign cars—but if she could, she'd just say, "How cute." In Maria's eyes, Marlene—in spite of a 12-year separation from her husband, in spite of Mrs. Josef von Sternberg's $600,000 alienation of affections suit, in spite of innumerable studio feuds—can do no wrong. She knows her too well; knows what good cookies she can bake and what fine stitches she can sew. She's seen her digging in the garden sans phony eyelashes, her two-inch nails covered with old gloves. She's worried with her about the citizenship exams, been thrilled when Marlene got all the names of the presidents straight on the test and became a full-fledged American in 1939. She knows she'd even break a date with Jean Gabin for the premiere of her Warner Brothers' killer-diller, "Man Power," if Maria's school play were on the same night—which is going some—for there's a man, and there's a picture!

ANN SHERIDAN

At 12, chubby, freckle-faced Clara Lou Sheridan was the Texas terror. A war-whooping tomboy, fiercely proud of her Indian blood, crazy about baseball, disobeying everyone but her adored dad, whom she called the "Boss Man." Now she's 27. The face is familiar, so're the freckles—but the torso's terrific and the name is Annie. She's got oomph and a new something called "televoomph." She wears a slew of expensive barbaric jewelry, drives a shiny Cadillac, wears black and white orchids, gets a hundred proposals a month and has a beau who's rich and handsome. She's glamour on the half shell, but she's still Clara Lou at heart—afraid of only two things in the world, flying and cops. It'll take more than that cataclysmic jump from sophomore at Texas State Teachers to Hollywood star (via a beauty contest) to turn that carrot top of hers. In spite of a $4,000 mink coat and a lot of diamonds, she's the same noisy, unsophisticated kid she used to be—a screaming maniac at a baseball game, a ten-year-old at a Gene Autry movie, a dirty-faced "crew" on boy friend George Brent's boat—but, nevertheless, a gorgeous power house in her latest film for Warner Brothers, "Navy Blues."

MICKEY ROONEY

If you ever find a phone message saying Rhett Butler called, you can bet your boots it was Mickey Rooney! If and when you go out with him, you'll step out in style on Mick's $50-a-week allowance (salary: $5,000). You'll meet gobs of his non-pro chums and autograph hounds and leave the night club on the stroke of 12. Back home, get him to give out with one of his original compositions on the piano or drums. If you have a daytime date, you're in for some stiff competition, whether it's at cards, golf, badminton or tennis. He's tops at 'em all! You'll have a slick time cruising around in his station wagon or custom-built blue job, riding his horses and paddling in his pool. Warning: You're expected to join him in 5 hearty meals, then trot around 36 holes of golf to counteract the ravages. If it's romance you're after, there's not much chance—at the moment he's Valerie Thou's. By the way, don't forget to mention his new picture, M-G-M's "Life Begins for Andy Hardy."

GLENN FORD

Today critics hail him as a "young Paul Muni," and he nonchalantly lunches at the White House and "21" club. Yet not so long ago, Glenn Ford was twirling a searchlight atop a theatre in return for free passes to the movies. When he entered films in 1927, his total salary of $20 barely covered the cost of a dress suit for his role! Twenty-five years ago he started out prosaically enough in Quebec, an only child burdened by a prissish name, Gwyllyn, and an indiscreet capacity for ice cream. During high school he wrote and announced for radio, and upon graduation simultaneously joined 7 group theatres and provided his daily bread by modeling and selling paint. He's never had a vacation and is now working in Columbia's "Texas." If there's anything in this world he hates, it's theatre-goers who rattle candy wrappers and those Hollywood dandies who prance down the street in ascot scarves. Unwed, he lives with his mom, who keeps his rangy six-foot frame up to its 165-pound quota.

CLARENCE BULL

ANN RUTHERFORD

Ann Rutherford's a showgirl from way back! She made her stage debut in kindergarten, retired at 9 and made a comeback at 13! She was discovered for movies by her present manager, who liked her radio sound effects (from baby's gurgle to wild screams). He gave her a screen test which resulted in a myriad of rough-ridin' Westerns when she was only 16. Her efficiency is absolutely unparalleled—she designs her own togs, does her hair and manicures her nails. Hunts down antiques and cooks the world's best potato pancakes and sausages for her famous Sunday morning feeds. On the set of M-G-M's "Life Begins for Andy Hardy" she doesn't stay put a minute; models in clay in her dressing room and knits all over the place. She keeps things moving in the duplex she shares with her grandma, mom, sister, 12 canaries, 9 parakeets and an assortment of turtles. Drives neighbors crazy practicing on her trap drums. When she's positively physically exhausted, she turns to poetry-writing!

The Countess Explains.

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

Socialite Alexis Thompson was a one-time suitor. Gene always wanted to marry a "nice guy" regardless of his social or financial status.

Night of their elopement she signed her name in the plane register as "Miss Belle Starr," title of her current picture with Dana Andrews. Next day she had to leave on a location trip to Acoma Rock.

"I married my husband because I loved him. I waited to be sure and I am sure. I knew what I wanted and now I have it. I wanted my own life, the husband of my own choice and my own home.

"I love my parents dearly. I wish they'd understand. I think they will eventually—when they know my husband as I know him. But until then our happiness comes first. That's all that counts."

Of course, it's the oldest story in the world. Shakespeare cribbed it from ancient yarn-spinners and sang the sweet sorrows of Romeo and Juliet. Héloïse and Abélard had the same classic trouble. So did Young Lochinvar and his bonnie bride. Getting more up-to-date, so did the Duke and Wally.

So the other day it happens right in Hollywood. And here I am listening to the old, old story from a young lady who is telling her side of it. Not the side in the daily newspapers. Not the family side. Not the "Gene has gone Hollywood" side. But a love's-eye version from jubilant Juliet herself. I mean the Countess Cassini. Née Gene Tierney.

She is sitting on the floor in slacks blithely ripping up love letters from old beaux (and the stack is high), while across the rumpled room sits her Romeo, a pleasant, likable, mannerly guy who just doesn't look like the dark, sinister pictures he takes. It's a three-way Information, Please, between Count Oleg Loiewski Cassini, his bride and your inquiring reporter. And the Countess has never glowed more beautifully, never looked happier, never seemed surer of herself. What's more, she has never sounded more sensible.

Now that may seem a spot preposterous in the face of the outraged family scene which has been stormed up in headlines. Especially since all the scene's props stack smack up against the lovers in favor of the family frown. For instance:

Here is a twenty-year-old American girl, notably willful and headstrong, who has tossed over the approved conventions of Eastern Blue Book society to seek a beglamoured Hollywood career against her parents' wishes. And there she meets a suave foreign sophisticate, title, accent, dark moustache and all, who turns her silly young head with his treacherous wiles and marries himself into reflected fame and a fortune.

"You want the true story?" repeats Gene Tierney after me. Her gray French-Irish eyes are flashing a bit now, but she can't keep them that way. Because every time she gazes at Oleg, they turn soft and dreamy. If it isn't love, it's an Academy performance. I cough discreetly, and the Countess returns to earth, the stale love letters and the business at hand.

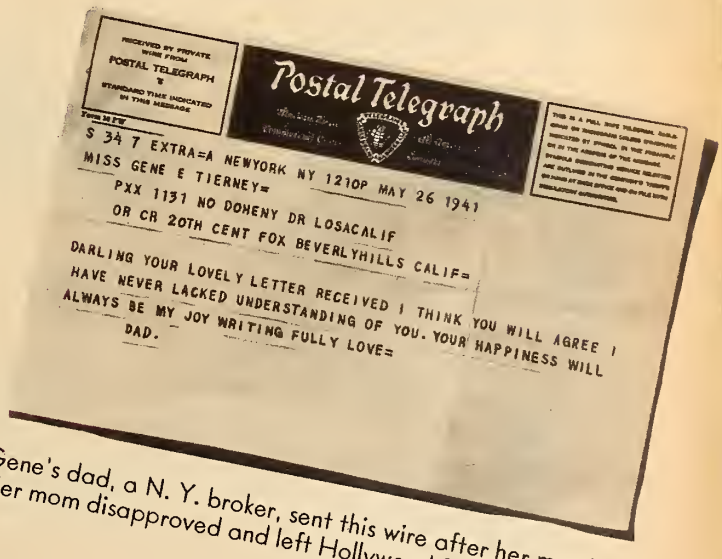
"This wasn't any hurry-up marriage," she states with a misunderstood sigh. "I wasn't swept off my feet. Our marriage was thought over, talked over and pretty thoroughly analyzed before we took the plane to Las Vegas. In fact, we were almost married once before, but we decided we were being hasty.



"Why," asks Gene, knitting her pretty brows, "do people insist on treating me like a child? I've been going out with men since I was fourteen. I've known all kinds—Yale boys, New Yorkers, actors, business men and playboys. Americans and foreigners, too. Which, by the way, aren't so awfully dazzling to me. I was educated abroad, you know, and I've traveled a lot. I've been in love before. I've been engaged before, too. I've had lots of dates and lots of beaux in Hollywood. Why not? I'm young and I like fun. But men, polished or unpolished, don't leave me breathless. Only the man I've been waiting to find. He does. Darling," says the Countess Cassini in French to her groom, "maybe you'd better leave the room. You might be embarrassed."

So Oleg smiles and strolls out. That leaves us alone, and I quickly learn a few things about this Count Cassini, which I will right gladly pass on. He isn't Italian as his name sounds. He's Russian. His folks are from the Ukraine. His grandfather, Count Arthur Cassini, was the Czar's ambassador to Washington when Teddy Roosevelt was head man there. His mother was a friend of Alice Roosevelt's. His brother is a Capitol newspaper columnist today. Oleg himself was born in Paris, educated in Florence and pursued a designing career all over the Continent, ending up with the famous Patou in Paris. Then New York and now Hollywood. He has been there a year. So has Gene Tierney, almost to the day.

"We met over eight months ago," recalls Gene, ripping up a note from Mickey Rooney, "and I think we've loved each other ever since. I knew I loved him, because when I got home at (Continued on page 89)

Fred Astaire's "THREE

BY JERRY ASHER

FROM DAVID NIVEN, NOW SERVING

A little over a year ago David Niven answered his country's call. Today he is serving as a Major in the British Army. Despite the darkness of the hour, in David's letter there still remains evidence of the nostalgic humor that so endeared him to all his friends in Hollywood. And especially to Fred Astaire.

FROM LADY CHARLES CAVENDISH,

The tradition of the Astaires is now theatre history. Adele and Fred teamed in childhood and danced their way up to world acclaim. Nine years ago Adele became Lady Charles Cavendish and went to live in Ireland and England. Brother Fred came on to Hollywood and remained to further his brilliant career.

FROM GEORGE GRIFFIN,

Over fifteen years ago, George Griffin applied for the job of valet. Fred was doing "Gay Divorcée" on the London stage at the time. Except at interrupted intervals, George remained on. A World War leg injury brought on recurring hospitalization. Rather than be permanently bedridden in a strange country, George asked to go home to his people. Fred Astaire, with his usual loyalty, has kept the contact alive. The blank spaces in George's letters are the deletions made by censorship.

LETTERS FROM LONDON"

Since that first day eight years ago when Fred Astaire arrived in Hollywood, he has remained reticent about publicizing facts on his personal and private life. Not that there have been any deep, dark secrets. Any great unsolved mysteries. On the contrary, Fred has remained singularly untouched by the vicissitudes that ofttimes flourish with fame and fortune. In all modesty Fred has never believed that people are really interested in things that concern only himself. However, being in a position where he receives many letters from the other side, he feels that there are those who might be interested in some first-hand information. In selecting these particular "Three Letters From London," Fred reveals a cross section of life that is a great lesson in courage to us all.

THE ARMY IN GREAT BRITAIN . . .

Boodles

Dear Old Fred:

Many thanks for your lovely long letter from Aiken and damn and blast you for the picture of the sailfish!

I am afraid I have been simply terrible about writing lately, but I have been in one terrific rush. Married life I just couldn't enjoy more. Prim is a wonderful girl. I know you both are going to like her. Incidentally, she has been to about a dozen pictures in her life and has only seen me in one movie—"Wuthering Heights!"

Since Dunkirk we have been reinforcing the battalion. And being one of the old boys with some experience, I was taken away and put into a special job with M.I. (don't laugh) Military Intelligence. Naturally I can't tell you anything about it as I have not yet been intelligent enough to find out what I am trying to do! At least I have managed to be in all the worst Blitz we have had, including three months in London without a day or night off during the worst period.

Prim is working in an aircraft factory, which is quite a big step from the Quorn and the Cottesmore. Things are getting pretty interesting again right now and we are all set to be invaded. I think he is bound to have a crack at it and if he does he will use (Continued on page 94)

Darling Fred:

Well, a nice "Blitz" was staged for me last night. I know what it is like now. This is my first and I must say I've never had such an opening night in my life. Really Fred—it was hell!

I arrived in town from Derbyshire and dined with Foxie, Dotty, Averill, Tony and an American journalist named Greig. We had our dinner in a private dining room on the 9th floor of the Dorchester and in the middle of eating, a waiter came in and said that if we would like to see some fireworks to look out of the window.

So we switched off the lights and at first I thought it was a 4th of July display—the flares first and the red glows in the distance. Then explosions. Anti-aircraft guns booming and the whole works. But when two or three huge fires were started—enormous red glows in the sky—I began to get jittery. And even more so when one of those suction bombs exploded nearby and my ears went funny. That all took place between 10 and 12. So we decided to go below.

The lobby was full of people. Everyone we know. They all go there because it seems safer (Continued on page 94)

FORMER VALET, NOW CONVALESCING IN LONDON. . .

White City Estate, Westway,
London, W. 12, England

Dear Sir:

Thank you very much for letter received this week. It certainly is a great help to me and I appreciate it very much. Have now been in hospital for just on two months. I do a lot of walking but the knee just won't bend. Mr. Turlong told me my hip was okay and that I would be walking ordinary if the knee had not gone wrong. Am feeling in very good health otherwise. If I could just be back working for you again that's all I would ask.

The family and myself do not go to any shelter. We sleep on the floor, as do many other people. We have all our glass, china, etc., packed away. The bombers have been pretty active around here. Mother was pretty sick once when a bomb dropped across the road and shook this building just like a quake. Incendiary bombs have dropped just outside our window and on our roof, but they were soon put out. They don't explode—just like a firecracker of the roman candle type. About fifty were dropped in less than ten minutes. If they had been proper bombs, well, I would not have been writing this letter. Last Saturday people were arriving for the dog racing meeting when the warning (Continued on page 95)

Gloria the Glamorous

BY IRVING WALLACE

Gloria Swanson—that sweet tradition blaster—has put a bomb under Hollywood's long-cherished ideas about oomph!

Hollywood had an unshakable idea of what a glamour girl should be until just a few months ago when Gloria Swanson came along.

According to the best movieland tradition, the perfect glamour girl was supposed to be the frosting on the cake of entertainment—very young, largely decorative and certainly unserious.

The appearance of Gloria Swanson, back to the cinema wars with her wares, has changed all that. For, though a glamour girl is supposed to be very young, Gloria is already forty-three and still a dazzler. And though a glamour girl is expected to be largely decorative and certainly unserious, Gloria Swanson possesses shocking ideas about a woman's mind being as vital to her future as her appearance.

When she came out of New York, via the Panama Canal, to Hollywood, she brought with her the new definition for glamour—herself. That, and not her so-called comeback, was the news.

Yet, while Hollywood was willing to revise its old ideas about glamour, Hollywood remained positive about one thing—there could never be a glamour gal who had worked in a factory. And Gloria Swanson walked into town admitting she not only worked in a factory, but Allah be praised, she owned one!

This is no "comeback" story, for after all, how could Swanson come back when she'd actually never been away? In 1920 she was "Zaza." In 1929 she was "Sadie Thompson." In 1934 she was the "Music In The Air" with John Boles. In 1941 she is Adolphe Menjou's wife in RKO's "Father Takes A Wife." But in these two decades she'd never been entirely out of the public eye. Year in and year out, the Swanson legend remained. New York's best-dressed woman. America's most outstanding woman. Et cetera. Always newsworthy.

So, students, instead of the "comeback" stuff—this is merely an experiment—a word effort with a live subject to show you that it is possible to be glamorous though brainy.

The most amazing thing about Gloria Swanson, of course, is that darn factory. We asked her about it the other day.

Gloria's ditched her famous slinkiness for animation. Veteran of four marriages and innumerable romances, she's currently fascinating Danny Winkler, Jean Rogers' ex.

Back in the '20's, tremendous headdresses made Gloria look skyscraper-ish, but she's Hollywood's tiniest actress. Spike heels jack her up in RKO's "Father Takes a Wife."

"Well, maybe it is a trifle odd," Miss Swanson admitted. "But, of course, it doesn't seem so to me. You see, when I was just a youngster, I would go driving with my girl friends. On one such afternoon we were all making wishes on objects we would like to possess in life. We were driving through a town, and the girl on my right said, 'I'd like that.' It was a home. Today she is happily married and has a home. The girl on my left said, 'I'd like that.' It was a window of clothes. Today she has her clothes. At the outskirts of town I pointed and said, 'And I'd like that.' It was a huge smoking factory. . . . And today, in Queens, New York, I have my factory! Simple?"

Well, it wasn't so simple to us. We demanded an explanation. First of all—why a factory?

"I've always been natively curious," admitted Gloria. "Believe it or not, but for years my favorite magazine was Popular Mechanics. It must have been in my blood, this attraction to the mechanical. My grandfather was a great experimenter. (Continued on page 81)

"Mummy"—as her chums call her—has been front-page stuff since 1917, when she eloped with Wally Beery. She's had more newspaper linage than any star.

Nowadays Deanna and Vaughn Paul can talk of nothing but their new Brentwood roost overlooking the Pacific. Her favorite topic's their playroom papered with giant postcards from her fan clubs!

Sturdy (6' 1", 175 pounds) Bob Preston and his young actress-wife, Catherine Craig, whom he wed in Nov., 1940. Bob's the most generous soul alive; always grabs the check!

During tiffs with "Big Boy" Williams, Lupe Velez frequently dates John Shelton. She always surprises strangers with her husky unbroken English, so unlike the shrill gibberish in her movies!

A YANK IN HOLLYWOOD

Besides his New York farm, Bob owns a Cal. estate complete with riding horses and station wagon!

BY JEANNE KARR

DON'T LET MONTGOMERY FOOL YOU—HE'S CASUAL ONLY ON THE SURFACE!

Bob Montgomery talks lightly, feels deeply and acts by the measure of his feelings, not his words. His mockery is idealism in reverse. A passionate champion of social justice and the democracy of his forefathers, he hates with bitter intensity the forces working against both. He translates his bitterness into irony, his ardor into action. With nothing to gain and everything to lose professionally, he led the organization of the Screen Actors' Guild and remained its president during the first three critical years of its existence. He's still a member of the board, although he can't devote as much time to it as in former days.

In 1940 he joined the American Field Service Corps in France and drove an ambulance under fire in twenty-hour shifts till that country fell. To vent an intolerable anger, he transferred one of his war experiences to paper in the memorable "Letter to a German Hero," which Collier's was proud to print. Now he's absorbed, heart and energy, in the fight for freedom. President of British War Relief in Hollywood, on the board of Free French War Relief, he also campaigns for the American Field Service and the Red Cross. Hatred of Hitlerism drowns any minor hates.

Love of what this country stands for is rooted in the old American stock of which he was born. For generations the Montgomerys lived in New York's Putnam County. The family home was lost when Bob's father died, but the son's nostalgia for the scenes of his childhood endured. Twelve years ago he bought an old farmhouse of the salt-box type, built of white clapboard in 1810 and standing a few miles from his own birthplace in one hundred and eighty acres of woodland. A kitchen wing was added, electricity and plumbing installed, farmhouse furniture of maple and pine ordered from Virginia. To Bob this is home as no other place can be. He spends three or four months a year there—in the fall, if he can manage it. The true Easterner, what he misses most in California is variety of season. He can stand a springless year in the land of eternal spring, but to lose out on autumn with its sparkle and riotous color is to lose an essential part of the color of life. "I could wax lyrical on the subject," he says, "but allow me to spare you." Traveling with two children, two servants and two dogs, the Montgomerys call themselves Sanger's Circus on the March. The children are Elizabeth, eight, and young Robert, three. The servants are Connie and Otis. The dogs are a French poodle and a Labrador retriever, both males, but they get along fine, thanks. Last year they stayed East till after Thanksgiving, celebrating with all the old-fashioned ritual. During their absence, the place is left to a caretaking couple who have an apartment over the garage.

To create an illusion, the house they built in Holmby Hills is as nearly as possible a replica of the Eastern house—early American of white clapboard and stone, with a fireplace modeled after one of the vintage of 1620. The houses have twin weather vanes in the form of a pheasant—the form having originated in Putnam County, famous for pheasant shooting. Robert, Jr., has already been entered for the Pawling school which his father attended. Both he and Elizabeth are blonde and blue-eyed. "Part of the time," says Bob, "they look like me, part of the time like their mother, depending on which of our (Continued on page 68)

ACKGROUND FOR ROMANCE

Lamour with Mitch Leisen, who directed one of her few films with a U. S. A. setting. She's been in so many sarong sagas, she's learned to speak Malay!

Dottie married Maestro Herbie Kay in 1935. They separated in 1938; he sued for divorce on the grounds of desertion a year later.

If Dorothy Lamour returns from Hawaii as Mrs. Gregson Bautzer, she won't surprise her friends. Those who know her best say she's in a "marrying mood."

If she returns ring-free from her month-long vacation in the Islands, they won't be surprised either. Apparently nothing this sarong girl does is s'wrong, so illogical that her friends can't understand it. And her.

That's one of Dorothy's special talents, the ability to develop strong partisanship in her friends. Sex, they tell you, isn't Dorothy's prime appeal. To them, she is the perennial, incorrigible child. And they cherish her for that.

The truth in what they say is best proved by the reaction to Dorothy's native-girl screen characterizations. Give any other girl the nude deal Dottie's had, and she'd find herself with a burlesque queen rating. Not Lamour. That childlike quality, which her friends know so well, keeps her torridest antics out of the Hays office.

But to return to Dorothy and her private life. Hers and Greg's is the story of two people who are good for each other; two people who at the time they met felt a great need for the friendship, the affection that they could give each other. That they could laugh and dance and dine together was the finest thing that could have happened then to either of them. Whether they marry or not, these things are beyond conjecture, and these are our story.

No matter what happens, one thing stands out above all else in the Dorothy Lamour-Greg Bautzer romance, and that is that for the past year or more Dorothy has known the kind of happiness she wouldn't willingly trade for her whole star-spangled career. She has been the focal point for the undivided attentions of young Bautzer, and his rating as one of Hollywood's better beaux is absolutely blue ribbon. His routine—flowers, phone calls, more flowers, the theatre, the clubs—is the envy of his fellow bachelors.

He came into Dottie's life at a moment when she needed romantic diversion, relaxation from the demands of career and personal heartache. She did as much for him with her childlike gaiety and charm. He, too, had tasted bitterness. Just the comradeship and fun that Dorothy could give was what he needed.

To reconstruct the scene of their meeting, visualize the plushy interior of Ciro's on a crowded night in May, last year. The crimson-satined dining booths with their seven-foot backs were filled with diners, all engaged in the confidential chatter of the table-for-two. The suede-walled foyer was alive with the crackle of taffeta and the swish of silk, and into this perfumed melee walked the Lamour, exquisitely gowned, perfectly coiffed, on the arm of suave Wynn Rocamora.

By definition, Wynn is Dorothy's personal manager. But that's a feeble phrase to express an interest in Lamour that stretches from plans for her future (he'd like to see her do a modern, stylized "Carmen") to the kind of clothes that she should buy. He even worries about her personal happiness.

It was this subtle Pygmalion who saw in the milk-mild Lamour of 1935 eloquent proof that there'll always be a Cinderella. Here was the embodiment of all the film success stories, he reasoned. A girl who had known the pressure of poverty in her New Orleans youth and who had worked in an office and as an elevator girl in Field's Chicago merchandise store to support her mother.

Here was a girl whose first glimpse of the tinsel heaven of the theatre came when she won an audience singing contest at the supper (Continued on page 79)

THAT TOP-SALARIED RADIO COMIC JACK BENNY'S A MARTYR TO THE CAUSE OF LAUGHS!

"Look," said Buck Benny, the pride of NBC, "couldn't you change the title a little? Like 'It's No Fun to be Funny Except Once in a While When They Fall for a Gag You Didn't Think Was So Hot or on Sunday After the Show When You Feel Relaxed and Want to Stay Up All Night?' No? Too long, huh? Why don't you use initials?"

Benny's reputed one of the most brilliant worriers in the business, a non-stop nail-chewer, a chronic crosser of remote bridges, the pessimist par excellence. He even worries over the charge of worrying. Unable to refute it, he tries to play it down, as witness his attempt to tamper with our title. Get him cornered, and he'll admit that he worries exactly as much as he ought to worry, no more, no less. "If I didn't," he explains, still on the defensive, "I'd be in the ash can."

There are those who would have you believe that, shorn of the capacity to harass himself, he'd pine away. In proof of which, they offer a story of the days when he formed the fiddling half of a vaudeville team. One morning the phone jangled him out of slumber. His agent was on the line reporting an engagement. Only half awake, Jack heard the name of a town thirty miles away and mumbled okay. At the booking office later, he learned that another state boasted a town of the same name, that it lay some three hundred miles from Broadway, and that he'd committed himself to board a train for the hellhole that night.

He returned to the hotel, packed violin and bag and marched like a herald of doom into the room of his friend, George Burns, where the gang forgathered. There he paced for two hours, biting his digits and the dead end of a cigar, fulminating on the eccentricities of agents who couldn't talk English, city fathers who lacked the wit to invent their own names for their own one-horse burgs, phones that rang or didn't, trains that moved and stopped, jackasses who went into vaudeville for a living. At the end of two hours, Burns picked up violin and suitcase, deposited them in the hall, propelled his friend out by the back of the neck, locked the door and yelled, "Now enjoy yourself."

Legend has it that the last heard from Jack was a plaintive, "All right for you—" floating back through the transom as he trudged trainward.

He says it's a canard. I found him at Twentieth Century-Fox, his head in Kay Francis' lap. Recumbent on a garden bench, the capacious skirts of "Charley's Aunt" fell back from his trousered legs where he'd crossed them. Kay's white hand cradled his gray-ringleted wig. Gorgeous in rosy chiffon, sparklers at ears and throat, she bent to kiss him. One. Two. Three. Cut! She lifted her head. He stayed where he was. "Again?" he suggested. He didn't seem to be worrying.

As a matter of fact, he can take his movies in stride. They hand him a ready-made script. If a scene isn't right, they do it over. Physically wearing, he still considers movie-making a lazy man's dream of paradise compared with the nervous strain of putting on a radio show. For that show he's responsible—to NBC, to Jell-o, to the agency, to his cast, to millions of listeners. It's his baby, his headache and his crown jewel. He's built it into a national institution of six flavors, which he carries on his back. To the world at large he is J-E-L-L-O.

All week long the show goes on in his head. You may think you see him driving his car or swallowing his dinner. Actually his mind is writhing somewhere in gagland. A friend buttonholes him in a parking lot. Jack mutters an absent excuse me, I didn't mean to bump you. Mary's private game is to count how many times she can ask him a question before he hears it. The record to date is thirteen. They were in bed one night, Mary reading, Jack thinking. She closed the book and asked him to turn out the lights. He got up, touched the switch and went back to bed drawing the covers round him. Her wild burst of laughter finally roused him to awareness.

"What's the matter?" he cried in alarm.

"The lights," she could only whimper between spasms. "You went to the switch—and got back into bed—and the lights are FULL ON!"

Seven days and six nights of the week are haunted, leaving one evening clear. With the termination of the second broadcast on Sunday, Jack's spirits soar, and he wants to stay up all night. First to be sure, there are always post-mortems. (Continued on page 73)

The Brodels (that's Joan Leslie's real name) have a perpetual ping pong match going. The weekly winner—usually Joan—acquires 7-day ownership of the gold cup Joan was given at last year's National Orange Show. They also bowl a lot, but poorly.

They've lived in this tiny house 3 years; plan to build a new one with more room. Mary (tall and dark) shares a room with Betty (the oldest but smallest Brodel), and Joan shares one with her mom.

Joan's impersonations are priceless. She used to wear fake bangs to do her Hepburn one, but a comedian chum borrowed them to use as a beard —that was the end of them. These bangs are real.

SIXTEEN and UNKISSED!

Lank-limbed Gary Cooper stalked across a Warner sound stage in the hobnailed boots of Sergeant Alvin York and paused to stare gravely down at the girl who smiled back at him with dancing, 16-year-old eyes. "Don't let them glamourize you, Joan," he said quietly.

That's one bit of advice Joan Leslie will treasure most among her memories of the fabulous period that began with her 16th birthday on last January 26th. A long-term contract, a sleek new car and, best of all, a chance to play Gracie Williams, Gary Cooper's lovely Tennessee child bride in "Sergeant York"—coming in one ecstatic lump, they might have addled older heads than Joan's. But hers is safe. Breath-taking, overnight stardom has done nothing to spoil this cinematic Cinderella who's made one of the hardest grades in the world without benefit of Hays-tabooed sweaters, leg art or jumping through publicity hoops.

To understand why this is so, you've got to go back 14 years to a night when a 2½-year-old toddled onto the stage of a big Detroit theatre and brought the house

She was an accordion virtuoso at 5 but is now out of practice. In spite of the elegant, brilliant-studded instrument, can only remember 2 pieces—"Dinah" and "When a Gypsy Plays His Violin."

Warner's fashion editor christened her "Leslie" last year, but she's still not used to it. Averages about 100 letters a week—mostly from West Point and Annapolis. She was just voted National Buddy Poppy Girl and given an overseas cap.

down piping "Let a Smile Be Your Umbrella." The baby Thespian was Joan Brodel, youngest daughter of an Irish bank teller. Sisters Mary, 6, and Betty, 8, were already kiddie show veterans, and the revelation of Joan's precocious talent made a family trio inevitable.

For the next few years, proud Mother Brodel lavished all spare family funds on singing and dancing lessons, convinced that some day her brood would be famous. And a wise investment it was. When Mr. Brodel and his bank job parted company in the '29 crash, the girls were able to cash in on vaudeville offers. The family unstaked and struck out, first for New York, where bookings were skimpy, then to Canada, where the three sisters played, sang and danced before Toronto, Montreal and Quebec night-clubbers. Joan unleashed a flair for mimicry with amazing impersonations of Hepburn, Garbo, Zasu Pitts, Jimmy Durante and Luise Rainer. No one suspected the tall, pretty youngster of being only 9.

From Canada, the family made a long jump to Miami, where an Eastman Kodak scout got excited over Joan's lovely bronze hair and hazel eyes, featured her in a series of color ads. And that temporarily spelled doom for the Brodel sister act. Back in New York a year later, M-G-M's Ben Altman strolled into Ben Marden's Riviera where the three youngsters were busy entertaining, singled out 11-year-old Joan, signed her up for six months and whisked her out for a bit in Garbo's "Camille" before the family could catch its breath.

That looked as though part of Mrs. Brodel's dream might be taking shape, but it wasn't. M-G-M told Joan to go home and grow up. They would send for her in a few years. She went, glad to be back with Betty and Mary. But vaudeville was dying, engagements scarce for a girl trio. Betty began taking solo jobs. Mary modeled for Powers. Joan puttered around for two years, made a few movie shorts, then, tired of waiting for M-G-M, trekked back to Hollywood with Mary and Mrs. Brodel.

THAT MEREDITH MAN

BY JAMES RICHARDSON

Meredith's latest flicker is "Tom, Dick and Harry" with Ginger Rogers. Before turning actor, he sold neckties in Macy's, wrote obituaries for a Conn. newspaper and sailed the sea as a gob!

Franchot Tone, Olivia de Havilland and Meredith are a constant trio about Hollywood. Buzz rarely carries money with him. Has two valets, Woods and Malcolm, to take charge of finances!

Buzz's phobia to cameramen is second only to Garbo's! Above, caught off-guard with Fay Wray, Cesar Romero and Mrs. Lewis Milestone. Only 33, he's twice-divorced and plays a wide field.

On the subject of B. Meredith, his past, present and personality, B. Meredith is very realistic and bitingly frank. Which is rare and unusual in a profession where most men prefer back-slapping to any other form of exercise, swallow their own press notices daily instead of food and consider the best music to their ears their own names.

Burgess Meredith, on the other hand, doesn't think he's much. He has a candid picture of himself, how good he is, how bad he is and what to do about it. As a consequence, he has become a great performer with the stratosphere the limit to his future.

For example, most thespians regard their directors as one regards an appendix, a useless object which should be removed. But not Burgess Meredith. He puts almost his entire performance in a director's hands. He feels that in any debatable decision the director of a movie or play should be dictator. "I think," he has said, "the less creative an actor is and the more he obeys his director, the better off he will be." And following this credo Meredith has come along from success to success.

On the subject of his personal appearance, Meredith is again realistic and candid. He knows his head is physically big for his body, that his hair is longish, unruly and scrambled. He knows his eyes are wide and questioning. A friend was once asked to describe Meredith. The friend flipped, "Buzz Meredith? He looks exactly like a startled chrysanthemum!" And he does.

A FIVE-YEAR DIET OF HOLLYWOOD POWER AND GLORY HASN'T TURNED BUZZ'S HEAD ONE FRACTION OF AN INCH!

I recall recently sitting in the backyard of the sprawling home Meredith rents with Jimmy Stewart. We got to chatting about appearance, about the importance of the facial contour to the average actor. I expected a bit of goo from Meredith, but instead he sat up in his beach chair and gave it to me from the shoulder.

"When I was on the New York stage, I never had any special handicaps," he said. "Everything was darn smooth. It was one hit play after another, which was lucky. But in Hollywood after my first few pictures, I learned I did have a handicap. My face.

"Well, look at my face. Not exactly pretty in the accepted cinema sense. Oddly enough, my looks weren't important on the stage where the audience was at a distance, but they got in my way in the movies. You see, the camera suddenly replaced the audience; it moved to within a few feet of my face and enlarged it many, many times. And, alas, not being as handsome a fellow as Ty Power or Bob Taylor or Errol Flynn, I learned I wasn't the leading man type and soon ran into difficulties obtaining suitable roles. In fact, honestly, I think I've done quite well out here considering my so-called limitations."

Very true. From "Winterset," which he did with Margo in 1936, to "Tom, Dick and Harry," which he did with Ginger Rogers in 1941, Burgess Meredith, wonder boy of the New York legits, has run the gamut from putrid to peachy pictures and emerged with his record and his talents and his modesty surprisingly unscathed.

Finally, though Burgess Meredith is today residing in the lap of material luxury, and though it is rumored his RKO contract will be paying him $3,500 a week by 1945, Meredith has not lost his head. He has not forgotten the old days when he sold cheap neckties in Macy's in New York, and when he lived for seven days on a diet consisting of free samples of shredded wheat.

"In those days when I didn't have a nickel for a cup of coffee, I knew it wasn't going to last," reflected Meredith, and then with a wave at his expensive surroundings, "and now I'm not so sure this is going to last either!"

For the key to Meredith's personality, one must first unlock the door to his past and take a hurried peek at the events, natural and unnatural, that went into his development.

Today Meredith is referred to variously as Buzz or Bugs for no reason at all. Those names were adhesived to him about the time the first big milestone in his life occurred—his entrance into Amherst College, where noses were rumored to be as high as scholastic standards. With his tuition and his room rent paid by an affluent uncle, Meredith thought school would be easy sailing. He was interested in dramatics and thought he would have time to devote to it. He was wrong. Because money was necessary for food, for books and for other survival expenses. And there were no jobs available. So Buzz Meredith quit Amherst, determined to earn enough to return and study acting. Somehow, he wangled a job on the staff of the Stamford Daily Advocate. To say at this late date that he was the star reporter would be a plunge into fiction. He worked as a newspaperman until the afternoon he was sent to cover a sensational suicide and came racing back with a front page saga—all the facts, all the details, all the bloody information—everything, except the name of the man who killed himself! That was when Buzz Meredith's journalistic career ended.

To this day, however, Buzz has retained much from his adventure as a reporter. In his acting it has enabled him to detect good and bad writing, which few actors are capable of doing. It has helped convert him in his workaway life into a lucid thinker and a bright talker. Above all, it has given him a great talent for describing things. In 1936 he was asked to describe his first visit to Hollywood. His journalistic training came in handy, and à la Ben Hecht he went to town, to wit:

"The greatest moment of excitement came (he wrote) when we sailed in our airplane past the Sierras, and there below us was the endless, grassless, geometrical stage set that is Los Angeles, Hollywood, Beverly Hills, Greta Garbo and Mickey Mouse. Thrilling it all was, rimmed about by the foaming, cudgeling Pacific Ocean, which expressly cools the perspiring brows of California's cinematic giants.

"California's airplane landing fields are immeasurably long. But later on we learned that California malted milks are bigger, California hopes are higher, fruits are riper, breasts are fuller, limbs are tanner, art is lower, but sales are mightier than any like area in the world!"

LUCKY FOR JANE RUSSELL THAT THE HAYS OFFICE CAN NEVER CENSOR DAYDREAMS!

CENSORABLE JANE

When a girl's really in love, she can take Hollywood or leave it. That is, if she's a girl like Jane Russell.

Of course, right now the shoe—Jane's Cinderella glass slipper—is on the other foot. The question at this point is: Will Hollywood take Jane Russell, or leave her?

Because the brunette beauty whom multimillionaire Howard Hughes found in a dentist's office, starred without further ado in "The Outlaw" and touted as a new raven-haired Jean Harlow, is tied up in the doghouse along with her debut picture. Hollywood's Hays Office says Jane's costumes are too revealing (just as "Hell's Angels" Harlow's were too "comfortable"), and they're holding back the necessary stamp of approval.

All this will probably be ironed out before you read these words (million dollar pictures just don't land on the Hollywood shelf, low necklines or not). But even if Jane Russell's buxom charms are discreetly veiled enough to earn a Hays blessing, that's no guarantee she's headed for Hollywood fame and fortune. Both "The Outlaw" and the well-photographed Jane Russell may be hits—or they may be strike-outs. Such things have happened before in Glamourland.

Either way, it's all right with Jane. She's twenty and in love. And that is all that matters.

Jane Russell's nails are unbitten, and her thick, wavy hair is sleek and unshorn. In fact, she's in the pink and just as happy as a lark. Why wouldn't she be? It's the good old summertime, she's not working, and her best beau, Bob Waterfield, is with her every single spare minute that he has.

Before she was cast as Jack Buetel's sultry "kiddo" in "The Outlaw," Jane's sole claim to fame was that she'd been Class Historian in 1939.

"I've got plenty of time to daydream," Jane sighs with a white, luscious smile. "And I'd rather daydream than do anything in the world." Jane doesn't dream about star dust, either.

The last time I saw her, she was stretched out on the beach, a honey-tanned Venus lost in her favorite sport. The Pacific breeze played with her long, dark hair, and her brown eyes languidly watched Bob Waterfield, a husky six-foot UCLA quarterback, as he worked out on the beach rings and parallel bars.

"What are they going to do about your picture?" I asked. The whole town was talking about the Hays ban on "The Outlaw."

"I don't know," said Jane, not even turning her gaze. "Isn't Bob graceful?" she said.

Another time I ran into Jane on the shores of Lake Sherwood, high in the Malibu mountains. It was on a holiday, and a bunch of girls and boys in old clothes were picnicking and fishing, giggling and eating hard-boiled eggs and watermelon. Lake Sherwood is no plush movie resort; it's a popular picnic ground, and the bass fishing is swell. Southern California's hoi polloi dotted the banks, and right among them I spotted Jane. Her hair was bunched on top of her head. She had on a rumpled old skirt and sweater and was padding around barefoot while this same tall, husky guy cast flies into the lake.

Jane was just finishing "The Outlaw" then. (Continued on page 70)

CALL ME "DUTCH"

RONNIE REAGAN BLACKENS THAT BOY SCOUT REPUTATION OF HIS!

"Nice Guy" Reagan has pangs of conscience when he neglects his fan mail and has never refused an autograph in his life.

BY DAVID CHANDLER

Mrs. Reagan (Jane Wyman) was christened Sarah Jane Folks. Is nicknamed "Dynamite." She paints, plays tournament tennis—is writing the Great American novel.

The Reagan baby is blonde with china blue eyes. She's god-mothered by Louella Parsons, who fostered Jane's and Ronnie's romance.

This fellow Reagan is a hard one to peg.

He's been in Hollywood for three years, so you'd think people would begin to have a fairly definite idea of what he's like. But all you're sure about is that everybody is fond of him. "Reagan's a swell guy," they say. "Ronnie's such a nice boy," they declare. Or, "He is the sweetest lad."

Now these are mighty poisonous words to utter about any young actor in Hollywood; they make him sound so insufferably dull. It were better that it be bruited about that the guy breaks every promise he makes, drinks to excess, is unbearably conceited and beats his wife.

The "good boy" legend probably grew out of the fact that in all his early films he was inevitably cast as the spotless hero. He was so shining and virtuous that one captious critic maintained that the strongest thing Reagan ever drank was a glass of buttermilk in "Code of the Secret Service," and at that he left half the glass untouched.

This, of all the snide attacks on Ronald Reagan, is what hurts him most. It was not so long ago that Ronnie was known from coast to coast as Dutch Reagan, one of the National Broadcasting Company's top sports announcers, and in that capacity Ronnie not only had to broadcast the big sports events but hold his end up in the customary celebrations after the event. Pat Rourke, the barkeeper, in Jack Dempsey's bistro across the street from the Madison Square Garden in New York, still recalls how Dutch Reagan, shy three dollars and forty-five cents for his bar bill, insisted upon offering a slightly-under-the-weather companion as a deposit till he had returned from his hotel, where he had forgotten his wallet in another pair of jeans. Dutch thereupon calmly lifted up the friend as if he were as light as a Teddy bear and handed him over the bar to the cashier's high stool.

Part of the blame, Ronnie thinks, for his purity boy reputation can be placed directly on his name. "There's something about the name Ronald that tickets me as a nice boy even before people know me. When I went on the air as a sports announcer, I took the monicker Dutch. The trouble with Ronnie is that it suggests a lad in velveteen knee-pants and a silk shirt with a dainty lace collar. But when I went to work for Warner's they wouldn't let me be billed as Dutch Reagan, so back I went to Ronald."

But most of the blame rightfully belongs to the man himself. Perhaps what Ronnie needs is a nice big dose of temperament. Maybe if he could storm into the boss's office one fine day and demand something outrageous—anything—and threaten to do something drastic and get himself suspended, it would help. He has never been known to turn down a part. "So-and-so is replacing Ronald Reagan in 'Saga of Tenth Avenue.' Reagan is now on suspension," is a story that has yet to be released. Ronnie has rated an A-plus in deportment at Warner's all his life.

And he deserves it. The afternoon we had lunch with him, for example, Ronnie had just spent a nice hot California morning posing in a full-length, fur-lined suit under a battery of lights for stills for "Flight Patrol." He had been living in the un-air-conditioned suit for the twelve weeks the picture was in the making, but now that it was over he had to make a few stills. All right. This is the end of it. Okay. So they kept him under the relentless lights for hours; they had him climbing in the plane, they had him climbing out; they posed him by the wings, by the tail, by the propeller and just looking up at the sky. And not a peep out of Ronnie Reagan. Well, at last it's over.

So along comes a photographer to Ronnie's table while he is munching a ham and cheese on whole wheat and says he's got an advertising tie-up picture he wants to shoot with Ronnie. "Why, of course," says Ronnie in that sweet, cooperative way of his. "What do I wear?"

"Your flying suit from 'Flight Patrol.'"

Ronnie uttered one tiny word of dismay, but one pretty-please from the photog and he promised to jump into that nice hot suit all over again.

Perhaps one of the reasons so few people know what Ronald Reagan is like is that he is not given to tooting his own bugle. If he got lost in Mexico (Continued on page 84)

The Reagans were married in January '40, after a whirlwind courtship. It was her third altar-trek, his first. Her engagement ring was a 52-carat amethyst.

Warner Brothers' "Million Dollar Baby," co-starring Dutch and Priscilla Lane, is his twenty-third picture in three years. It's his largest role to date.

ON THE SET WITH

"The Men in Her Life"

BY GREGORY RATOFF

65-year-old actor Otto Kruger's a professional violinist and pianist in real life.

LORETTA YOUNG AND CHORUS TWIRL AND WHIRL IN COLUMBIA'S NEW MUSICAL OF THE 1850's, ADAPTED FROM LADY ELEANOR SMITH'S BEST-SELLER, "BALLERINA"

"The Men In Her Life" is more to me than just another picture—more than an $800,000 gamble with film and expensive costumes of the 1850's and truly great talent. It is the realization of a dream I have had since 1932.

Let me explain.

Since childhood I have been insane about ballet. To me it has always been the most moving of arts. And unconsciously I had always been looking for just such a story as this. Here, I thought, was a great opportunity for my wife, Eugenie Leontovich, to interpret the role of Polly Varley, the London slum child who became Varsavina, most celebrated danseuse of her generation.

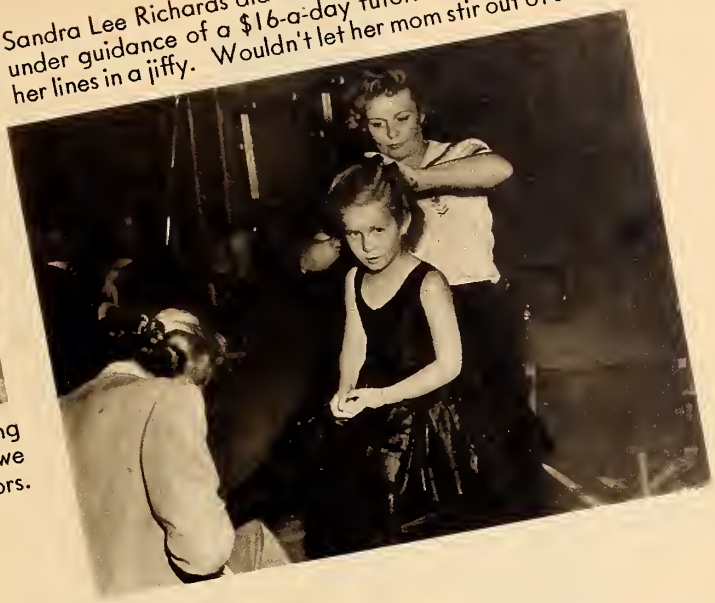
I myself was an actor then, and I wanted desperately to play the part of Rosing, creator of Varsavina, who loves and marries her, then dies tragically at the height of her career.

But that was nine years ago. I had no money for such an undertaking. Instead, I laid aside make-up and began directing pictures. I, who had been an actor, learned to handle actors. I learned how a camera and lighting can create moods. And always in the back of my mind was "Ballerina." I made "Intermezzo" and a picture called "Wife, Husband and Friend"—during which I first met Loretta Young.

Loretta, I found, had always wanted to be a dancer. Her hands and feet were amazingly graceful. I gave her a copy of "Ballerina"; told her that some day she would bring Lina Varsavina to life on the screen.

That day finally came five months ago when I took my cast and technical crew to an RKO lot in Culver City borrowed for the picture by Columbia. My stars were hand-picked: Loretta, whose 30 costumes (de-

Dean Jagger plays Loretta's rich American husband. Director Ratoff, by nature a hard master, took a liking to Dean and frequently encouraged him with "Zat is fine, Deanie!"



Sergei Tamoff, Loretta's personal dancing instructor, coached her for six months in N.Y., then came to Hollywood for the picture.

Conrad Veidt and Loretta became fast friends during production. Most of the cast and crew were in awe of Veidt's reputation as one of Europe's top actors.

Sandra Lee Richards did her schoolwork between scenes under guidance of a $16-a-day tutor. She memorized her lines in a jiffy. Wouldn't let her mom stir out of sight.

signed by Walter le Maire) and hats (Lily Dachè) cost $21,000; Conrad Veidt, whom I met 21 years ago; Dean Jagger and John Sheppard; Otto Kruger and my own Eugenie.

Our cameraman was brilliant Harry Stradling, borrowed from Alfred Hitchcock. Adolph Bolm handled ballet scenes.

With such a set-up, shooting went smoothly. True, Loretta had to stagger through 79 scenes under the weight of iron hoops. And in one scene little Bonnie Dane broke off her lines to point at a dog on the set and ask: "Now can I pet him?"

Cast and crew may tell you that I was a hard taskmaster coaxing and fuming until every shade of expression was right. But to me, details are important.

Have we made a good picture? I cannot tell. Of that you readers must be the judge.

Eugenie Leontovich, Director Ratoff's wife, says she can cook better than she can act; demonstrated by cooking borsch for lunch on the set.

Loretta receives around $75,000 for her work in "The Men In Her Life" and wears gowns valued at $1500! When she first took up dancing, Mae Murray staked her to lessons.

M-G-M's "Blossoms in the Dust" (in which she's a feminine "Mr. Chips") is her first Technicolor film. Above, with Walter Pidgeon and Pat Parker.

GAY DIVORCÉE

GARSON, THE SUPER CONVENTIONAL, HAS GONE A LITTLE BIT WACKY— AND YOU'LL LOVE HER FOR IT!

"Down and stay!" Greer gave the command as I came in. She was seemingly speaking to me; I didn't see a dog around.

Slightly startled, I sat down. I had expected to stay a while anyway. After all, I had been invited to tea. And unless you have eaten cucumber sandwiches by Garson, your palate has been cheated.

"Ohhh," Greer was laughing, "forgive me, I thought you were . . . I mean, I was thinking about my white poodles."

Was I in the right house? I was, of course, but this couldn't be the grave Greer Garson. It was Greer all right, but changed, I thought. Really sensationally changed.

It's not her body that has changed; it's her mind, her spirit, her attitude towards life. It's the gay and colorful gowns in her wardrobe; the cup of champagne she uses for a shampoo. It's that Hollywood has made her clothes-conscious, luxury-conscious, fun-conscious as she never was before. It's because she recently got her divorce and is free. Fundamentally, I am sure, it's because she is in love—with M-G-M executive Benny Thau.

Emerging from reverie, I came to and heard Greer saying energetically, ". . . the most exhausting morning. I'm literally leading a dog's life training those two white poodles of mine! Recently I sent them to a training school in the Valley where they are taught to do everything but cook. Now that I've finished 'Blossoms in the Dust,' I've been going to school with them. One of my jobs is to give commands in the tone of voice used by the trainers. I have to keep practicing the 'down and stay' command, so that I'll get the proper authority in my tones. That's what I was doing when you came in! I also have to climb ladders and canter across fields so that they will get the idea that they must obey me whatever I do. The upshot of it is," Greer laughed, "the dogs lie relaxed under the shade of an old pepper tree, while I take the rigorous part of the training. I also plan their diets," she added, "and design their haircuts, with the result that they usually look like anteaters!"

Seizing the question that was uppermost in my mind, I said, "Greer, you've changed a lot, haven't you?"

"Quite a lot."

"Why? How come?"

"Well, for one thing, I'm a lot happier than I was when I first came to Hollywood. I was ill then and worried about whether I would ever get a break. I had reason to worry. I didn't even see a camera for over a year. I began to believe no camera would ever see me!

"I came here on the strength of my London stage role as Mrs. Chips, but I didn't have too much hope that she would help my chances. The part was too gentle, I thought, not exciting enough—not glamorous.

Greer (with Colonel Kimberly) used to go in for "sensible clothes." Now adores ultra glamorous get-ups, featuring floppy millinery, giddy shoes and impractical gloves.

She was legally married to a British Government attaché for 7 years, but they separated 5 weeks after the marriage. Current serious beau is Benny Thau, Louis Mayer's assistant.

BY GLADYS HALL

"But now, according to Mervyn LeRoy who directed me in 'Blossoms in the Dust,' no one has to worry about glamour any more. He says that glamour, as we have commonly understood it, is dated, gone. The movies are now ushering in a new type in which feminine appeal, the bosomy, womanly kind, will be ninety per cent of glamour. Out go the vamps and sweater girls! In come the simple housewives!"

I recalled then what Mervyn had told me a few days before. "As Edna Gladney in 'Blossoms in the Dust,' Greer is just as alluring as was the old-time siren who heaved a sigh, stretched herself on a tired tiger skin and swooned when the man of her choice hove in view. Greer plays the majority of her scenes in a gingham dress and apron, up to her chin in babies. Yet she has two men madly in love with her and is admired by men of every description. It's all perfectly believable because she is more genuinely feminine than any type of woman you've ever seen before on the screen. And men will react to her because femininity to man is glamour."

"Last year," Greer continued, "I wouldn't let myself become attached to Hollywood. I'd keep telling myself, 'Don't be silly. There are other places just as important as this. If you don't stay here, what do you care?' Now, I can be honest with myself and admit that I would have cared terribly!

"If," Greer said gravely, "it weren't for the trouble on the other side, I would be completely happy now. I'm afraid, however, that my success and my feeling of satisfaction is ill-timed. You just don't feel you have a right to be happy these days. But," she smiled, "such amusing things have happened to me in the past months. The roof story, for instance . . .

"A few weeks ago I came home to lunch to find the roof of my house lying in the garden, a neat pile of tiles. Of the five people in the house at the time, only our butler knew anything about it. It seems a man came to the back door and asked if he might work on the roof. Thomas, assuming I had ordered some minor repair, gave his permission but didn't think to get the man's name or that of his company.

"We regarded each other with dark brown looks. Had the man made a mistake? Was it some other house whose roof he should have removed? We didn't know what to think. But the most amazing part of the whole affair occurred in the late afternoon while we were out. Just as silently as the roof had been removed, it was put back again. We can only conclude that it was either a mistake or that someone played a costly joke on us. I didn't dare leave the house for a week lest the same sense of humor get prankish with the plumbing.

"Then there's been the fun of redecorating and refurnishing the house. Mother and I did it all alone, entirely without benefit of a decorator. For four months we prowled around antique shops to find what we needed. But that wasn't work because we both love those old shops! Our greatest treasure was Napoleon Bonaparte's silver dinner service, with the imperial "N" and the Napoleonic coat of arms on each piece. Those cupids on that carved wood mirror over your head I found in an old soapbox in the back of one of the stores. Old clocks are my hobby. So we planned our entire dining room scheme around an old Empire clock we brought over from London.

"But," Greer laughed, "those four months nearly suspended our social activities. We couldn't very well ask friends to come and sit on the floor, even though it was covered with rose petals from the bouquets we placed all through the house.

"My new white carpets have been a pleasure, too, in spite of the problems they (Continued on page 86)

SCREEN SPECIALISTS

A foundation of specialized wizardry underlies Hollywood's routine miracle of daily creation. But in a town where no talent entitles you to be self-conscious, the specialists allow the Garbos and Gables to reap the spotlight. On the following pages, MODERN SCREEN contests the needless obscurity of such abundant gifts, presents three of the people whose inspiration helps oil Hollywood's sensitive machinery.

Hollywood wondered why a man of independent wealth like Buddy De Sylva should let himself in for the nerve-racking job of executive producer, which he took on at Paramount last February. He had three bulls-eye hits running on Broadway—"Du Barry Was a Lady," "Louisiana Purchase" and "Panama Hattie." He collects royalties from the countless hit tunes he started writing at twenty—among them such Tin Pan Alley classics as "April Showers" and "A Cottage Small." He could sit on feathers and watch the world go by, but he doesn't like feathers. His reasons for taking the job were two. He enjoys living in California and tackling tough propositions to see if he can lick them. His wife thinks he's silly to work so hard. But layoffs drive him crazy.

His Portuguese father was an actor. His mother was so young that people took her baby to be her brother and called him Buddy, which stuck. His real name is George, and he uses the initials B. G. as a sop to formality. He's responsible for twenty-four big budget pictures a year, decides on the film possibilities of stories, assigns script writers and associate producers, approves the selection of directors and stars, sees tests and rushes, attends sneak previews—which keeps his finger in the pie and his nose to the grindstone from start to finish. With Warners bidding against Paramount for "Lady in the Dark," he had an hour to report on the script. He closed his office, read it and reported yes. $283,000 were involved. That's not as high as it seems, because Paramount backed the stage show and got a kickback from it. Four nights a week he's at the studio till midnight but hopes to relax when the job tames down.

He has none of the stodginess of the traditional bigshot. His speech is brisk, his manner simple, his vitality stimulating. He's profoundly interested in world affairs, a discriminating reader who loves the subtleties of Ambrose Bierce and Max Beerbohm and a Sunday painter like Rousseau. Only Rousseau, he says a shade ruefully, didn't have to take scripts home to read on Sundays. His sole exercise consists in stretching what he calls a little rubber thing for a couple of minutes in the morning. He smokes not more than three packs of cigarettes a day and gravely attributes his success to a liking for Black Label and plain water. He loathes dancing and night clubs where music drowns out talk. His idea of a good social evening is food, conversation and Black Label at Chasen's in Hollywood or Moore's in New York. Now forty-four, he's been married for sixteen years to Marie Wallace, who used to be a Ziegfeld girl. She couldn't get him to stop working but did persuade him to give up driving because he went too fast. Though he never had an accident, he achieved the astonishing feat of driving all the way to Malibu once with his brakes on.

He thinks good films depend on good writers, actors and directors in that order. "The story," he says, "is all-important. How else can you get people interested?" The theory isn't revolutionary, but its practice is. Acting on it, Buddy, has started a revolution at Paramount!

Small, slim and brown-eyed, she looks like the kind of woman men protect and ranks with the top males in her profession. Blanche Sewell's the only woman at Metro who edits the big A's. Right now she's cutting "They Met in Bombay" and "Honky Tonk"—both Gable pictures, which gives you an idea. She works in slacks or dark skirts, with a white glove on her left hand to protect it from the thousands of feet of oily film that pass through her fingers in the course of a day. Celluloid being as explosive as TNT, she has to step outside when she wants a smoke.

As a high school kid, looking for a summer vacation job, she got it by bluffing. A couple of friends who worked in a film laboratory brought home some negative and showed her how to clean it, so she could say she'd had experience. Once she got experience, she knew what to do with it. From negative cutter, she became assistant to Allan Dwan's cutter, then to Marshall Neilan's. Neilan took her to Metro with him. Her boss was made head of the department, "so he made a cutter of me," she says with characteristic modesty, her greatest fear being that people may think she's more important than she is. She's pretty important. It's an axiom of the industry that a picture can be made or ruined in the cutting room.

She does for the film what a book or magazine editor does for a story. The daily rushes are run for her and the director; he selects his takes, she assembles them, shifts, adjusts, rearranges, times, goes over the first rough assembly with director and producer and so on da capo through the final sneak preview. She thinks the cutter's greatest hazard lies in dealing with people, and his greatest blunder in upsetting them. So she stays as far away from the set as she can, and when cornered by players who ask her how the rushes look, remains noncommittal. On a deadline she works through the night, and in any case never gets home before 8:30. Too tired to eat, she bathes, takes a glass of wine and reads herself to sleep.

She's married to Leon Bourgeau, a cutter at Metro. They spend Sundays riding, weeding the garden of their home in the valley and not talking shop. He scorns the red geraniums she raises; she points out in retaliation that the horses refuse to eat the carrots he planted for them. Mike, the darling of their joint hearts, is a schnauzer, called Pointer because he points at the icebox. Once every two weeks or so he parks himself beside Miss Sewell's car in the morning and refuses to budge. That means he wants to go to the studio and be fussed over by the whole personnel. She always takes him—afraid, if she doesn't, that he may not be there on her return. It's her sole superstition, believe it or not.

columbia banks on him

This is the man who designs the sets that Columbia builds. Next time you see the name Lionel Banks on "Penny Serenade," "Mr. Jordan Comes to Town," "Our Wife" or "Ladies in Retirement," you'll know what he looks like. The face is ruddy, the fringe round the bald spot sandy, the moustache red, the eyes behind the specs blue and merry. He beams in order to keep out of trouble —especially when dealing with business managers. They can't hit you, he says, while you're smiling at them. The scar on his nose was left by a windshield that got in the way of his face. He can't do a thing with his eyebrows.

In designing sets, his principal aim is to create the proper atmosphere for the picture. His principal headaches are not enough time and money. He consults with producer, director, cameraman and the business manager aforesaid. Told to build a fifty-room castle for $1000, his automatic rejoinder would be, "Nonsense, gentlemen, I need $1100." Twenty-five trained draftsmen work under his supervision, and he's responsible for the set from the time he makes his first layout till the time it's struck. This sometimes keeps him at the studio till 2 A.M. There were so many demands for the plans of his Blondie house that a replica was built in Los Angeles, from which orders were taken. Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan are modeling theirs on the house he designed for Roz Russell & Mel Douglas in "This Thing Called Love."

He says he started training for his job at two, by drawing pictures on his fingernails. He continued in the School of Architecture at U.S.C. and after graduation worked with George Washington Smith, outstanding residential architect. Through a friend he met Jack Warner, for whom he designed a house, a golf course, swimming pools and—for the family—the Sam Warner Memorial. His first studio assignment was a sound set for the first talkie, "The Jazz Singer." During a periodic shutdown at Warners, he moved to Columbia for two weeks and has stayed eleven years.

His own house is U-shaped, designed for outdoor living, with French doors leading from every room to the patio. He enjoys the short shorts in Collier's and brown and green ties—not because they complement the color of his moustache. His sons, Robin and Neil, are seven and eight. He rides with Neil and fishes with Robin. Robin hooks 'em, he lands 'em. Casual with money, he's dumped the whole problem into the laps of his wife and secretary. His secretary puts it into the bank; his wife draws it out. One point of dispute arose when he designed the interiors of their home. He wanted a small dining room table to fit the proportions of the room. Mrs. Banks wanted a larger one for practical reasons. He came home one day to find that the small table had acquired a leaf. And, of course, that's how it stayed.

Follow Hollywood's lead to simple, soft coiffures

Are you getting bored seeing the same old face peer back at you from the mirror day after day? Then why not change it and give it a bright, new expression with an up-to-date hair-do?

Because every minute is precious these days, hair styles are becoming more streamlined. The newest coifs tend toward shorter locks and subtle shaping to make hair easier and quicker to manage. Locks are swept cleanly from the temples into neat gleaming rolls or soft curls—and all furbelows and ringlets are kept close to the natural hairline. While elaborate coiffures are in the discard with other time-consumers, the season's new hair styles are as flattering and lovely as ever before.

Hats and hair styles have teamed up so you don't have to re-do your hair for every hat you wear. The smartest coifs contrive to conform with and flatter bonnets and, returning the courtesy, hats—from the generous off-the-face versions to pillbox numbers that jut forward—are shallow and small-crowned to sit lightly on the head and give full play to hair styles.

You can be your own hairdresser this fall if you select one of the simple, up-to-the-minute coiffures illustrated here. Greer Garson and Mary Beth Hughes like the pompadour in its modified version which isn't too high or difficult to keep in place. You can achieve this clean-swept wave with a few pin curls or curlers.

Eleanor Powell's gleaming coif illustrates the side pomp version which is so flattering to girls with well-molded features. You can set these rolls to hold firmly by pinning two rows of pin curls to a side, winding each row in a different direction. When the curls are combed out, they interlock and hold better.

You can give a long bob an upswept look by bringing up the side strands and folding them flatly against the temple, as done by Anna Neagle. Your back hair can drift into soft end curls or it may be brushed into satiny smoothness with the ends turned under as Mary Beth Hughes wears hers. Peggy Moran shows how attractive casual locks look when caught back with a barrette or tied with a ribbon. At night, tuck fresh flowers in your clasp.

The younger stars love bangs because they're so versatile. For evening Laraine Day wears long, wavy bangs, beginning high on her head and caught and tied with a demure ribbon bow. Her hair is brushed high in back and molded into soft curls. Many stars prefer large, puffed-under bangs that amount to a reverse pompadour, but you'll also see lots of straight, severe bangs, (Continued on page 95)

1. APPLY LIQUID SHAMPOO TWICE, RINSING WELL AFTER EACH TIME. 2. RINSES MAKE HAIR LUSTROUS AND VERY EASY TO MANAGE. 3. WAVE SETS, BRILLIANTINES AND TONICS ASSURE GOOD GROOMING. 4. SET YOUR HAIR WITH BOB PINS, CURLERS OR COMBS.

All new coifs that you and your hair stylist concoct are just so much wasted energy unless your hair itself is healthy and manageable. Look to cleanliness, stimulation and grooming for the basis of your hair beauty.

First and foremost you must get the habit of giving your hair at least one hundred strokes a day with a good, firm, long-bristled brush, always being sure to cover the full length of every strand. Brushing not only stimulates and exercises hair, it also does the important job of cleaning and polishing. Hold your brush at a forty-five degree angle—and brush upward and outward, lightly but firmly. Twist your wrist with each stroke in order to pull and exercise the full length of your hair right down to the very ends. Combing up and outward with a clean, long-toothed comb will accomplish much the same results. Begin your combing or brushing at the front hairline, work around the edge in a complete circle, then separate your hair by crisscross parts and brush each section—not more than an inch square—one at a time on both sides. Finish with another complete hairline encirclement just for good measure. The whole operation should take no more than five minutes once you've mastered the technique.

Of course, everybody knows that the general condition of your system definitely affects the quality of your hair. If your system lacks oils, nourishment or glandular secretions, your hair will show it in loss of lustre, "life" and vitality. Sometimes after an illness—especially one accompanied by fever—even greyness, baldness or excessive dryness or oiliness will result. However, these are unusual conditions due to extreme causes and should be treated by a physician or other kind of specialist. We're concerned with more or less normal hair problems—the kind that everybody shares and the type you can treat at home.

You see, out of tiny pockets known as follicles, your scalp manufactures hundreds of thousands of minute, horny shafts which we call hair. These are made of a substance similar to nails and cuticle and keep your head warm and protected as well as beautiful. Blondes are said as a rule to have the thickest count of hair—averaging about 140,000 to a scalp. Brunettes come next with an average of some 108,000 hairs to a head, and redheads follow with an average count of 90,000 hairs, these figures being more or less approximate.

Hair health begins at the scalp. A loose, thickly-cushioned scalp will grow strong, luxuriant, lustrous hair, whereas a tight, thin, rigid scalp starves your hair so that it is thin, lifeless and undernourished. This condition may result in premature greyness or baldness if not stimulated and encouraged by regular massage, brushing, tonics and oil treatments.

Normal, undamaged hair is full of elasticity and will stretch as much as half an inch. Injured or burned hair is more brittle and will break easily if not handled carefully. The hair itself has no blood or nerve supply, so that cutting affects neither its growth nor curliness. If the scalp itself has not been injured, every new crop of hair you grow (and this, of course, is going on constantly) has an equal chance to be vigorous, thick and shining. This should be of real encouragement to you who have had unhappy experiences with poor permanents, bleaches, or any other kind of hair injury.

One of the best ways of conditioning is simply kneeding your scalp until it tingles and massaging the base of your neck to bring your blood up. Relax tired, congested nerves by regular exercise—outdoors, when possible. There are excellent tonics on the market to relieve either excessive dryness or oiliness. And remember that vigorous, regular brushing and combing will do a great deal to normalize either one of these conditions.

Oily hair requires more frequent shampooing than dry hair. Hard and fast rules are very difficult to lay down. Shampoo your hair when it becomes soiled—no matter whether that is every few days or every other week. Climate, the cleanliness of your own community, the season of the year and your personal habits all are such individual problems that it is impossible for us to dictate set rules.

But we can tell you about a top-notch shampoo! There are three separate steps: washing, rinsing and drying. First, moisten your hair thoroughly with lukewarm water —soft water, if possible. Then apply your liquid soap or shampoo generously over your entire scalp, massaging it in with your fingertips. After the shampoo has been well-worked in and has done a good preliminary cleansing job, rinse your hair in warm water. Then apply your shampoo again, drawing the soapy ends of your hair between your fingers to be sure they are thoroughly cleansed. If your hair is particularly oily or dirty (Continued on page 88)

FOOT NOTE

No John Barrymore biography is complete without lurid tales of his days spent cartooning for a Chicago newspaper. The life-story writers will have you know that the Barrymore pen used vitriol instead of ink, and no pompous public official ever was safe from the sarcasm and ridicule "Jawn" stirred up with a few swift lines and sly shadings. One thing the boys never mention, though, is why Barrymore was finally fired. The reason was so out of keeping with the bombastic Barrymore tradition, they figure no one would believe it. One of his assignments was to illustrate a continued story written by a very important author. On the day the fifth installment appeared, the writer stormed into the office and excitedly demanded to know why all the illustrations accompanying his masterpiece showed the characters standing in tall grass! The peculiar pictures were causing so much discussion, the story and its message to the public was fading into the background. The editor summoned Barrymore and asked for an explanation. John, who'd hoped to take the dreadful secret to his grave, meekly confessed he had left art school three weeks before the course was over and had never learned how to draw human feet!

PLANE AND FANCY FLYING

Every time Jimmy Stewart gets a week-end leave and comes back to town, he spends the first day sleeping. On Sunday he dons his uniform again and makes the rounds, seeing all his pals. At Mocambo a few weeks ago, he and friend Hank Fonda were reminiscing about the day they lured Margaret Sullavan to a small airfield and persuaded her to go up in a plane for the first time. It was years ago, and the planes at that time looked like discarded boxes put together with piano wire. They got the pilot off in one corner and gave him $10 "to make it rough—just for a gag." Fifteen minutes after the take-off, Hank and Jimmy, watching the tiny plane, began suffering pangs of remorse. The pilot was outdoing himself, putting the plane through barrel rolls, Immelman turns and double loops. When the plane finally taxied to a tired stop, the boys rushed over to carry Maggie to some quiet spot. But Maggie fooled 'em. Stepping from the open cockpit, she looked as cool as an ice cube, and her only comment was, "Thanks, boys. It was swell but a little uncomfortable. Shouldn't there have been something to hold me in?" Both boys dashed to the plane, peered in and turned two shades of green. The safety belt that should have been attached securely around Maggie had apparently been torn out before the flight, and she must have been holding on by her fingers, toes and a couple of prayers. The payoff is, this same Margaret Sullavan (and she admits it) can't ride in an automobile without getting car-sick!

LOVE ON THE AIR

The turning point in the public's opinion—approval of Dave Rose as Judy Garland's husband-to-be—came a few months ago as the result of a radio play. Judy starred in a CBS Silver Theater dramatization of a story she'd written herself—a story, whether she realized it or not, that made her millions of fans understand and appreciate her sincere love for Dave. It told of a girl in her teens who falls in love with a man over thirty, and showed exactly how their mutual interests lead to compatibility, friendship, then love. The three radio scripters who conferred with Judy on her story had it brought forcefully home to them how so many of Judy's young fans originally felt about Mr. Rose. Judy, emphasizing ages just a little, told them: "It's about a young girl of sixteen who falls in love with an elderly man of 33." The silence was deafening. All three men, just over that age, saw themselves for the first time through the eyes of youth and suddenly felt just a wee bit ancient!

benefits. Red is under contract to M-G-M, and was strolling into the commissary on the lot the other day when a friend stopped him. "Sorry I missed the show you put on last night, Red. I hear the climax of your act is terrific!" "Oh," said Red, "You mean this?" And there in plain sight of everyone from Louis B. Mayer to the extras, Red leaped three feet into the air and came down flat on his face! ! !

DIDJA KNOW

That snap-eyed Jane Withers has gotten the real accolade of big-girlhood from her studio. Twentieth Century-Fox has okayed her for leg art . . . That fans put the bite on Dorothy Lamour for an average of 500 sarong samples every week . . . That "Rags" Ragland used the same routine for his "Panama Hattie," radio and movie tests—a corny hunk of burlesque business called "Flugal Street" . . . That food-fussy Lupe Velez pops into the RKO kitchen every lunch hour to pick out her own meal . . . That to ace camera hawk Greg Toland's critical eye these are filmdom's most interesting faces: Gary Cooper, Gloria Swanson, Ingrid Bergman, Marlene Dietrich, John Qualen, Bette Davis, Ronald Colman, Frederic March, Frank Morgan and Orson Welles . . . That Victor Jory used to be a strong man . . . That handsome Ray Milland may be flashing a few bruises for the next month or two. He gets no double for those fight scenes in "Reap the Wild Wind" . . . That Olsen and Johnson, Broadway "Helzapoppin' " zanies, made a beeline for the roller coaster and carnival concessions at nearby Venice on their recent visit to Hollywood?

CHARLEY'S AUNTICS

Between Jack Benny, done up like a younger edition of Whistler's mother, and Director Archie Mayo, who's been wasting a lot of rare clowning behind the cameras, crew and cast of "Charley's Aunt" on the Twentieth Century-Fox lot have been going home nights with giggle-weary stomach muscles. In one scene the script calls for a hailstone, big as a man's two fists, to come sailing through a window and land at Kay Francis' daintily shod feet. Patiently, over and over again, a prop man tossed in the dummy hailstone as the cameras clicked and Benny repeated his lines. Finally Mayo was satisfied. "Okay, Jack," he sang out, "you've got it now." He signalled for a final take. The cameras started grinding. Jack and Kay began their conversation. Mayo pressed his cue buzzer for the hailstone to come flying in. A second later Jack was dazedly rubbing his head and everyone on the set doubled up with laughter. The stone had landed smack on his head! Two takes later the scene was finally progressing smoothly to its finish. A rattled Jack leaned down and picked up the hailstone. "My, my, what a large gallstone!"

"MARTHA, MARTHA, WE ADORE YOU!"

There's one hunk of pastry being hoarded in bomb-battered England like something from the Crown Jewel collection. It's the first slice of Martha Raye's third wedding cake which she sliced off for young Bob Budge, John Taylor and Danny Coote, who packed it into a cigarette tin for safe voyage to the Tight Isle. Seems that the three kids from His Majesty's Canadian ship "Chilliwack" were on their way back to England when their corvette-type craft put into Los Angeles, giving the youngsters eight hours for their first look at Hollywood. Wandering into Slapsie Maxie's, they found Martha's wedding party in high gear. Martha spotted them, called them over to meet Annie Sheridan, Jack Oakie and the rest of her pals. Later, though it was her wedding night, she sat at their table and talked with them for hours. When she left, each of the lads got a big Raye kiss. She got John Taylor's hatband.

FOR WHOM NO BELL TOLLS

There's a reason for that glum, anti-defense look on Anne Nagle's pretty face these days. If you've been reading the papers, you know all about how she met Air Corps Ensign John Robinson on a vacation trip to Honolulu—how they announced their engagement shortly after that. Well, the two of them figured out a cute plan. John was coming up to Hollywood on leave. They were to be married immediately. Then John would fly a bomber back to Honolulu. A swell idea. Happy Anne was already mentally picking out the pattern for Hawaiian bedroom curtains when bang! —came a cold government decree: no more passports to be issued for fortified Honolulu. And now those wedding bells may not ring for another whole year.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE

Favorite subject of filmland's storytellers is British megaphone wizard Alfred Hitchcock. The story we like best about him goes back to the time of his first visit to this country. Come to bid him farewell on the London pier was Peter Lorre, who waved goodbye with an odd glint in his eye. Hitchcock had reason to remember that glint. First morning out, a cordon of perspiring stewards rapped on his stateroom door, delivered 50 canaries "with Mr. Lorre's compliments." Each morning thereafter 50 more canaries arrived on the dot. By the time the boat docked in New York, there were enough cheeping, chittering birds to start a small aviary. But no one ever ribbed the great Hitchcock with impunity. No sooner was the gangplank lowered than he hustled off to a nearby telegraph office, spent a good hour composing an elaborate, 1900-word cablegram expressing his undying gratitude for the canaries—and sent it off to Lorre in London collect!

THREE BLIND MAESTROS

Try this one on your dining room table quiz program: What do Bing Crosby, Smiley Burnette and Ted Collins have in common? Give up? Not one of them can read a note of music! That's strange news about Bing, the boy who keeps sending it sweet and solid to millions of movie, radio and hot platter fans. But it's equally true of Ted who cuts himself a fat slice of Paramount's weekly payroll just for calling the turn on hit tunes. And Smiley, Gene Autry's globular film shadow, believe it or not, can knock out a tune on 52 different instruments! Blushing composer of more than 200 ditties, he once wrote 11 songs in one day—sold eight of 'em.

Cake in shape of two hearts covered entire table-top. Judy and Dave posed by it, then sent it intact to a local children's hospital.

Police kept fans away from door! Invited guests (Ann Sothern included) had tiny cards with couple's name and Sept. engraved on 'em!

Many guests came bearing gifts, but Judy waited till party's end to open 'em. Joan Crawford's offering was a luscious bed jacket!

DISA AND DATA

Priscilla Lane's laugh is such a pretty, gurgling thing that CBS has recorded it for future sound effects use . . . Most of those swallows who "come back from Capistrano" have been nesting at Mary Astor's Pacific Palisades home on the outskirts of Los Angeles. Mary's putting leg bands on them to see if they'll return again next year . . . That cocker spaniel Eddie Cantor promised Leni Lynn a year and a half ago arrived for Leni's graduation from high school. She christened the pooch "Kid Boots" . . . You can imagine how that RKO publicist felt when she sneezed in the middle of a tense take for a Lucille Ball pic—18 times! Hayfever . . . Carleton Alsop, Martha Scott's hubby, can't stand to stay in bed and watch her get up before dawn for a studio shooting date. He climbs out too, helps make her breakfast . . . Of Martha, friend and co-worker George Brent predicts: "She'll crack up in 10 years—throws herself too intensely into every part" . . . What MPTOA delegates will remember most clearly of all their Hollywood junket high spots: Gracie Fields' voluntary, spine-tingling rendition of "God Bless America" at Columbia's ranch barbecue . . . That big, tall, smoothie Walter Pidgeon, who stalked to glory in "Man Hunt," swore after flopping in his first few movie musicals that he'd never sing again. But you'll hear that fine baritone again when you see him as the Welsh minister, intoning hymns for "How Green Is My Valley" . . . Add Carole Landis: She's now collecting love classics between sessions of entertaining buck privates. Adopted by Company G, 53rd Infantry, who sent her a St. Bernard puppy, Carole's offered all her former Ciro and Mocambo time to boosting soldier boy morale . . . It was a new, transfigured Alice Faye, bubbling over on the set of "Weekend in Havana," lapelling strangers to tell them about her new ideas for redecorating Phil Harris' home . . . Betty Grable, who has no stable, is wondering what to do with that horse George Raft gave her. George won it in a claim race at Santa Anita . . . Turn about's fair play. While Pardenas, famous ex-court painter of Spanish royalty, worked away at an oil portrait of Linda Darnell, she retaliated by making a very fine pastel study of him! . . . Hollywood's like that department: Republic's Mary Lee spent a whole year taking riding lessons for roles in Autry pix. Just as Mary had gotten to the point where she could do some fancy hoss stunts, the studio ticketed her for stardom, told her "No more Westerns."

TECHNI-COLLAR

Sheldon Leonard's first crack at a non-villainous role nearly waterlooed because of as small an item as a tab collar. Here's what happened. Sheldon was borrowed by M-G-M from Twentieth Century-Fox for its new "Married Bachelors." The role called for a tab collar, and Metro's costumers pawed their shelves vainly and finally made the round of Hollywood's haberdashers. Nary a tab. One shop offered to make up a batch from patterns rushed from New York. But the studio couldn't wait nine days. Driving down Wilshire Boulevard that night, Sheldon and Mrs. L. suddenly spotted a tab-collared driver heading the other way. Like a flash Sheldon gave pursuit, finally honked the stranger to the curb. "Please," begged Sheldon, "tell me where you got that collar." Turned out the fellow was a visitor from Manhattan—named Bronson. Sheldon coaxed, cajoled. M-G-M, he insisted, would pay a fat price for a couple of tab-collared shirts. Bronson felt flattered. Graciously he invited the Leonards to his Biltmore hotel room, presented Sheldon with three shirts from his extensive wardrobe. Fortunately, too, for Sheldon, who's a big 'un with a size 16½ neck, they fitted—a little snug, but just the thing for his role in the picture.

HE PULLED OUT APLOMB

Takes an awful lot to ruffle that velvet-smooth British aplomb of Ronald Colman's. But Ronnie's still sweating great big drops over one recent experience. It was the mammoth music fiesta held at the Los Angeles Coliseum. Ronald had been asked to come and thank attendees for their generosity in aiding Britain's war effort. Glad to oblige, he waited backstage while one spectacular number after another unrolled before assembled thousands. Minutes passed. He began to get nervous. The stage manager rushed back to comfort him. "Just one more," he soothed, "and then you go on." Agonizedly Ronnie waited. Suddenly a cannon boomed. Music blared to fever heat. The crowd went crazy as a parachute came floating down with a huge American flag attached to it. "Now!" hissed the stage manager. Ronnie tottered out, met a silence so abrupt and so complete that a pin dropped at the back of the Coliseum would have clattered! P.S. Ronnie didn't blow his lines.

JUST CALL ME "JUDY"

Hollywood's prize name-forgetter is Universal's Director Henry Koster. Though he successively handled all the pictures that built Deanna Durbin to stardom, he still can't remember her name. "You—ah—young lady" was the way he addressed her repeatedly on the set of "Almost An Angel." And Deanna would always demurely reply: "The name is Judy Garland, Mr. Koster." Height of absentmindedness, however, came when Koster asked her if she had ever had a diamond. "Why, yes," grinned Deanna, presenting her third finger, left hand, "I was given this engagement ring not so long ago." Koster peered at it with interest. "Have you announced your engagement, my dear?" he inquired politely!

HANDWRITING ON THE WALL

Speaking of Deanna, that new English-style farmhouse home she and Vaughn Paul are building out in Brentwood should be ready for a roof by the time you read this. In addition to a swimming pool and two extra bedrooms that might come in handy for nursery space, Deanna's planning a playroom to be papered with the dozens and dozens of giant-sized post cards that came piling in after her wedding. It won't take many, either. Signed by thousands and thousands of fans all over the country, the cards average four by six feet.

GOOD SAMARITAN

Lovely Anne Shirley flashed one of Hollywood's sweetest smiles at us on the set of "Unexpected Uncle." "If you want to bump into some of the most interesting characters in this town," she confided, "drop in at one of the drive-ins about 6:30 in the morning." Anne's been on the usual dawn patrol schedule for her newest picture and makes a habit of breakfasting with the birds at a carhoppery on Sunset Strip near her home. Pulling in for a bite one morning, she was accosted by a friendly, maudlin gentleman who asked politely: "What do you do?" Anne admitted she worked in films. "Ah, yes," said the gent, lifting his hat punctiliously, "—the films." He sighed sympathetically and raised his hat again. "I," he announced in a conspiratorial whisper, "am a bartender!" They shook hands solemnly and Anne reached for her purse to pay her check. Not a penny! Her new-found friend raised his hat again and reached for his wallet. "I am 1-A. The army has called me. I have no use for this stuff now," he proclaimed to an embarrassed Anne and tossed a bill to the boy behind the counter. Says Anne: "It couldn't happen anywhere except in Hollywood at 6:30 A.M."

WHEREFORE ART THOU, ROMERO?

If Cesar Romero hasn't done something about that wife problem of his by the time this appears, he'd better get busy, or they'll be calling him "tall, dark and hunted." Ever since that story on his "empty bridal suite" appeared in a fan magazine, Cesar's been inundated by bushels of proposals, applications and plain criticism. Even happily wed couples have written to ask whether there's anything wrong with their idol—why he can't get a wife. Climax came when he let himself into his Brentwood home one night and found a 19-year-old girl hiding on his back porch. Yes—she had read the story. Cesar, who embarrasses easily despite his heavy film polish, left the premises like a frightened deer. A studio rescue party came out, gave the misguided girl $10 and sent her back home.

LOVE OF POWER

Ever wonder what a movie hero goes through while he's watching his own love scenes on the screen? Tyrone Power, acknowledged one of Hollywood's top movie woo-ers, used to cast furtive looks around the audience to see how people were reacting, until he discovered folks giving him equally surreptitious glances to find out how he was taking it. Now he slumps down in his seat and makes himself as inconspicuous as possible. At the preview of "Blood and Sand," Ty sat blushing in the dark, watching his screen self make torrid Technicolor love to smoldering Rita Hayworth. By the time the scene reached its climax—Ty advancing toward négligée-clad Rita for a super-dooper kiss—he just couldn't slump down any farther. On the screen, Rita was about to receive the kiss he'd been building up to for 300 feet of film when there was a loud "R-rr-ring" from the direction of her apartment door. That was all one precocious little brat in the audience was waiting for. Choosing his moment like a veteran wise guy, he let go in a loud voice, "Saved—by the bell!" Ty made a hurried exit five minutes before the picture ended—while the theatre was still dark.

TONE'S TACTICS

Folks who think night clubs are boring should visit Ciro's some Sunday night. The undercurrents of intrigue flowing around give Hollywood most of its cocktail chatter for the rest of the week. Here's the puzzle they're working on this week: John Carroll, stagging it, encountered Franchot Tone in the men's lounge. "Who did you bring, Doc?" queried Carroll. "Lorraine Gettman," replied Tone, "very beautiful and very smart." Ten minutes later, Franchot and his date were munching their way through the meat course when John stalked up to the table, wangled an introduction and asked Tone's permission to dance with Lorraine. An hour later, the two were still dancing and Tone was doing a series of slow burns even Edgar Kennedy couldn't top. When John finally returned Lorraine to "the man what brung her," Tone bid one and all a cool good night and whisked his gal out of the club. Ten minutes later, he was back—alone! Everyone held his breath, and hoped there'd be a fight, but Franchot nonchalantly joined John in the stag line. When the two of them finally left, they were as palsy-walsy as a couple of long-separated brothers.

BABY PHASE

Cesar Romero, Franchot Tone, Bobby Stack and George Montgomery have all gotten turndowns from Cobina Wright, Jr., when they phoned for a date. And the reason's as odd a one as you could possibly imagine—she has to stay in and mind a baby! It's this way. When she and her mother set up Hollywood housekeeping not so long ago, they sent out a call for a couple to cook and garden. Most anxious of applicants were a Jack Melrose, 23 and his wife, 20, who showed up ready for work with a six-months-old baby. The Wright menage has never been the same since. Handyman Jack is taking music courses at U. C. L. A., expects to get an instructorship when he finishes. He plays the violin and cornet. Corbina, Sr., like her daughter, is a singer, and they had to work out a bargain to keep practising hours from conflicting. Now, when Mrs. W. sings, Jack accompanies her. In return, she does the same for his rehearsal sessions. But real stellar attraction is the baby. Wright dinner guests come at 5:30 instead of 7 or 8, if they want to see the infant before he's put to bed, and Cobina, Jr.'s, night life has gone into a voluntary slump. When the Melroses go out for an evening, she's the one who stays in with the baby!

CRAZY OVER HORSES

Ma Joad—Jane Darwell to you—is a heart-warmer, not only on the screen, but off. And part of Hollywood tradition is her fanatical preoccupation with the bangtails, gee-gees—all right, horses. Jane can't be tied down on a day when nervous-ankled thoroughbreds are jibbing before the barrier, and the starter's got his gun cocked. The other day, while prettying her up for shooting, Twentieth Century's make-up man discovered a swelling under one eye. A tear duct had jammed. He advised medical attention. Jane's only concern was whether it would keep her from the races that afternoon! She went to a doctor, had it lanced and bandaged, and darned if she didn't head out for Hollywood Park in a pair of dark glasses.

IT'S STILL GEORGE!

Of such trivialities are gossip items born in this town of mad make-believe: Ann Sheridan swept down the aisle of Los Angeles' Philharmonic Theatre where the curtain was set to go up on a performance of "Cabin in the Sky." You could almost hear the eyes popping. Her hair was a tumbled, vivid mass of copper over the collar of a white ermine coat. But it wasn't the hair or the coat that had theatre-goers rubbernecking. An's escort was Jean Negulesco, dapper Warner Bros. director—not George Brent! Annie swished into the seat right in front of us, then turned to peek at our look of astonishment. She giggled impishly. "George knows! George knows! It's okay." And he really did. While George has been out of town on location, Annie's had to stick around to test for "King's Row" (she's a honey in furbelows!) and a girl's got to have some fun.

STAR SYSTEM

The casting department of one of Hollywood's major studios is offering prizes for the most effective way to blitzkrieg a certain foreign director right off the lot. This c.f.d. guides his life and work by the stars, and chooses players by their birthdates! Which means the casting department has to dub around with astrology charts and figure out whether the actor up for a part is Libra, Gemini or Virgo. Last week they took matters into their own hands and signed up a capable young actor for the same part the director had just assigned to some correctly-vibrating novice. The actor they chose has an identical wardrobe, knows his lines, and is earning his money by hiding on the set out of sight of the director. The first time the guy whose planets are in the right position blows up in his lines, the boy who knows his business will step into the scene and kill two birds with one stone. He'll save the studio thousands of dollars in lost time, and give the temperamental director a big, beautiful fit of apoplexy!

SHORT SHOTS

Despite a list of nitery escorts a mile long, Maria Montez, Universal's sultry Santa Domingan, gets her first kiss in "Raiders of the Desert," her seventh film role. Not much fun for Maria, though. Kisser Lewis Howard wears a mustache and full beard! . . . The San Bernardino fan who sent Republic's Don Terry two uncut rubies worth $75 apiece wrote apologetically: "P.S. I don't want to seem greedy, but would you send me a picture of you, your wife, and your horse" . . . To Bing Crosby, visiting him on the set of Paramount's "Nothing but the Truth," Bob Hope commented: "Nice hat you've got there. What did you do with the crackerjacks?" . . . You can't say Hollywood hasn't had a hand in that boost in the country's birth rate over last year. Approaching motherhood at this writing are Veronica Lake, Ann Morriss, Ann Shirley, Mary Martin, Constance Moore, Mrs. Jack Carson, Mrs. Preston Sturges, Mrs. George Jessel and Mrs. Albert Dekker . . . By the time you read this Ilona Massey's Alan Curtis may be just another army private—unless alimony payments to ex-wife Priscilla Lawson add up to an exemption.

Franchot Tone's girl friend Lorraine Gettman got her start posing for Coronet. Now she's a member of the "Navy Blues" sextette!

At the time of her wedding to associate-producer Vaughn Paul, Deanna Durbin gifted the British War Relief with 6 mobile canteen units!

A YANK IN HOLLYWOOD

friends you happen to be talking to." He keeps them strictly out of the public eye, regards his home as his castle and maintains an office for business transactions.

His manner is affable, his banter easy. A writer phoned from the publicity office to his dressing room. "Slip into something loose," he said, "and come on over." With a multiplicity of interests and a leveling humor, he can get along with anyone he wants to get along with, talk wire-laying to an electrician or international diplomacy to a statesman. He's a sports fan as well as a book lover, keen about music and also about mechanics.

He swims, golfs, shoots, plays tennis and in the spectator field, says he'll watch anything they'll do. He'd enjoy the fights better if they ran better fights in California. He follows the younger American musicians closely and was enchanted with Cato Mendelssohn, great-granddaughter of the Mendelssohn and a brilliant pianist, whom he heard at Eddie Horton's house. His own record collection includes all musical forms from Gilbert and Sullivan up and down. He was one of the first to own a miniature airplane, and last Christmas he built a model train for his son.

HE could read in the middle of a boiler factory. Absorbed in a book, he's lost to the outer world. A question repeated six times fails to get an answer, which understandably exasperates his wife and friends. Ordinarily he reads history and biography by choice, but concentrates nowadays on literature dealing with world affairs. However late he gets into bed, he reads for an hour or two before turning off the light. Occasionally, surfeited with horror, he'll pick up a volume of Kipling—poetry or prose—in which he always finds relief. He owns a complete collection of Max Beerbohm firsts; and James Hilton, hunting for the manuscript of "Mr. Chips" which he'd sold in his lean days, ran it to earth in Bob's library.

He shops only when he must, every six months or so, likes his suits in brown or gray, his ties in solid colors, and his shirts white with the balloon jib collars he's been using for twenty years. He had a blue suit once which he wore in so many pictures that Metro suggested he discard it before the lights picked up the shine in his pants. Another treasured garment is a twelve-year-old shooting jacket repaired in so many spots with leather patches that it now lays claim to being a leather jacket.

Bob admits to a variety of conflicting prejudices on the subject of hats. He likes green hats, dislikes new hats and prefers not to wear a hat at all. So when you catch him in one, it's likely to be a green relic which he'll cling to till it crumbles round his ears. His sole piece of jewelry is a signet ring worn on the little finger and engraved with the family crest—a woman holding an anchor in one hand, a man's head in the other. Below is the legend "Garde Bien" in Norman French. He translates it freely as, "Watch out for yourself." The ring was given him by Robert, Jr., at his birth, through the kind offices of his mother.

He prefers Pepsi-Cola and milk to hard liquor, and there's no kind of food—from delicate French to rich Hungarian—which he doesn't enjoy, providing it's prepared by an expert. Given his choice of one dish on a desert island, however, he'd make it hamburger with, followed by a cigarette. His daily quota when he works is a pack and a half, otherwise fewer. His shaving habits also vary according to whether or not he's at leisure, his beard being so heavy that he copes with it only on his own time. On a picture he turns it over to the studio barber. If there's one thing he's proud of, it's the barber's chair which graces his dressing room at Metro. Gable swiped it while Bob was away on his last vacation but had to give it back.

He drives his own gray Cadillac, never speeds, and his one accident was caused by a man who rounded a corner on the wrong side of the road and hit him. The doctor took fifteen stitches in Bob's face. The stranger, though unscathed, threatened to sue him. On what grounds Bob doesn't know, except that he's Bob Montgomery. "Which may be reason enough for a lawsuit," he chuckles, "depending on the viewpoint."

Dancing's all right, but he has no time for it now. Among his close friends are Jim Cagney, George Murphy and Elliott Nugent, with whom he talks endlessly. They meet at his home or theirs. He steers wide of night clubs and large parties, maintaining that no group of more than twelve people can be intelligent collectively. "They scream," he says. He was moved to wonder and admiration by Sir Cleuther MacKenzie's one-word impression of the same phenomenon. Sir Cleuther, blinded in World War I, is a board member of the famous St. Dunstan's Home for the Blind. Montgomery attended a reception in his honor and noticed that he winced for a moment under the babble. "Does it affect you that way, too?" he asked. "Yes," smiled the other. "I have an expression for it. I call it blinding."

In rapid succession Montgomery made "Rage in Heaven," "Unfinished Business" with Irene Dunne at Universal and "Mr. Jordan Comes to Town" for Columbia. With these under his belt, he headed East, where he's scheduled to speak for all-out aid to Britain. Sanger's Circus went with him. He feels a special sense of gratitude nowadays in having his children where he can see them. He knows many parents deprived of that privilege and can share their feelings without depending on imagination alone. In the summer of '39 he was making "Earl of Chicago" in London. Premonitory rumblings prompted him and his wife to send the youngsters home. They were on the high seas when war broke out. The Montgomerys haunted the Admiralty. No information was available. After fourteen days of racking suspense they learned that the children were safe. Those were the worst days of Montgomery's life.

FOR THE MOST BEAUTIFUL FINGERNAILS IN THE WORLD

I walked over. "How are you getting along on the set?" I asked.

Jane looked as if she'd been waked out of a coma. "The what? Oh—all right." She looked to the lake where Bob was landing a big one. "Isn't Bob a wonderful fisherman?" she sighed.

Now by this time you might be getting the idea that Jane Russell is pretty crazy about this Bob fellow. Also that she's a rather unusual girl. I would say both the above are understatements—particularly that unusual business.

In about every way you can think of, Jane Russell is indeed like nothing in the acting department that has ever hit Hollywood before. Take her beauty.

Some people think she looks like Hepburn. That's because Jane's face is chiseled and her brow is broad, because she's tall and streamlined. But Hepburn never saw the day she could stack up against Jane Russell for looks. In fact there's no duplicate in Hollywood of the slumbering, olive-skinned picture Jane's Polish-Irish mixture presents. Such cherry lips and silken lashes, naturally penciled brows, agate eyes and gleaming teeth—Hollywood just hasn't seen a natural like her for years. She's never been inside a beauty shop—not even for a shampoo; she washes her own hair, gives it a shake and the curls are perfect. She can slip into a size sixteen dress with everything where it should be and not a pad in the place.

Or take Jane's background. She's right off the ranch, unspoiled, unimpressed and as relaxed as a summer day. She grew up with four brothers and eight cousins—all boys—and spent her youth riding, hiking, hunting and fishing. She has romped with dogs, stumbled over cows and chickens all her life. She's toiled through a typical small-town American high school in Van Nuys, California; she's played the piano in church recitals and acted in class plays. She had never bumped up against glamour in her life until she saw seductive poses of herself in the picture magazines. Then she gasped, "Migosh—they've got me looking like a glamour girl and I'm just plain Jane!"

EVEN Jane Russell's fantastic, unbelievable break doesn't make sense by realistic Hollywood standards. No girl yet was ever yanked out of a dentist's reception office and plopped right before a camera that she'd never seen before, to be starred in a million-dollar movie.

But what's even more amazing is the cool, calm, unruffled outlook that Jane Russell maintains today—after all that's happened to her and the suspense that tugs daily at her fairy-tale career. In the face of bans, build-ups and ballyhoo, Jane can sit up and smile at you and say, "What's going to happen is going to happen and getting excited will never make me a star. Anyway, I'd just as soon be a good wife as a good actress." Jane may be censorable—but she's sensible, too. Too sensible to let the vagaries of Hollywood get her down. I wouldn't be a bit surprised if she fell asleep at her own preview!

Of course, being in love has something to do with this. A good dose of romantic day-dreaming will cure the career whoops and jingles as well as a box of aspirin. But, too, Jane has always been easing along on the relaxed side of life just by nature. You can dip into her record at almost any given point and find her thumbing her pretty nose at ambition—but getting paid off with the jack pot by the luck machine just the same.

The story-book break, for instance, which eventually made Jane Hollywood's Cinderella Number One of the season, got going certainly through no fault of hers. Jane was modeling fashions and frocks for Tom Kelley, a Hollywood photographer. One day an agent happened by Tom's, spied Jane's lovely face on the wall and cried out, "Jumping screen tests! Who's the dream girl?"

"That," replied Tom Kelley, "is a country gal from Van Nuys. She wants no part of the movies. She is in love."

CAN I have this picture?" asked the agent, undaunted.

"No," said Tom. "It's no use."

So the poor guy had to take it off the wall and hide it under his coat to show around Hollywood casting offices! When he hit Howard Hughes' lot, he caused a mild sensation because they were hunting someone just like Jane, and then—he didn't know who the girl was or how to get in touch with her! And when he finally dug her up, Jane said she'd think it over—maybe!

And another instance, back in high school half of Jane's classmates had dads who worked in some studio or other. Being movie-minded, they put the pressure on Jane time and again to show up at a studio and get her looks on film. Once or twice they practically dragged her there by the topknot, but Jane just yawned in casting directors' faces.

Then when she was through school and unable to go on to college because of family finances, Jane got exposed to Max Reinhardt's Workshop. What she really wanted to be was a fashion designer, but she knew she could first stand a little grace, poise and polish, being the tomboy she was. "The last thing in the world I had in mind was being an actress," Jane protests to this day.

Well, Jane ducked out of there in a couple of months because the divine fire of the drama got a little thick. Her teachers kept calling on her to work in plays and things at night, and as far as Jane was concerned nights were for dates with Bob, which was much more important—at least it was to Jane.

It was the same way at Madame Ouspenskaya's, where she landed next. The Madame, who runs one of the best of all Hollywood dramatic schools, took one look at Jane and enthused, "You've got talent and great promise!" In a few days she was sighing, "Jane—you're the most indifferent and discouraging pupil I've ever had. You won't develop your talents. What am I going to do with you?" Jane answered that by quitting school and going to work. She had to anyway because money was running low with the Russells.

You can carry that laissez-faire motif all the way through Jane's Hollywood history so far. There was the time she got talked into trying out for a featured spot in the Earl Carroll chorus. Jane tripped down to the great glorifier's thinking she'd make a few honest dollars with the greatest of ease. Surrounded by the cream of Movieland's beauty, Jane passed through five elimination tryouts and then, with the job practically in her lap, didn't even show up for the finals!

It was Fun---but

It almost cost me the things a girl wants most. I had never spent such a glorious vacation — swimming, golfing, boating — and falling in love with the most wonderful man in the world! But constant exposure to sun, wind, and water played havoc with my hair. I developed dandruff — that arch enemy of romance. Paul began to look disgusted. Then fortunately someone told me about the Fitch money-back guarantee to remove dandruff with the first application. Even in the hardest water I found that Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo lathers richly and rinses out completely, without the aid of an after-rinse. And not only does it remove every speck of dandruff — but it also brings out all the natural gleaming highlights and rich color in your hair. It actually reconditions as it cleanses. Don't let dandruff spoil your romance this summer. Try Fitch Shampoo today!

"I didn't like the backstage chatter," explains Jane, "and Bob didn't approve of the stage door Johnnies."

Just how much of Jane's recurrent apathy can be tagged on Bob and love, I couldn't say. It's true that Jane and Bob have an understanding and are "practically engaged." They intend to marry when Bob graduates from college some three years hence. It's true also that Bob makes no bones about his disapproval of Hollywood, the movies and a glamour career for the girl he has honorable intentions about.

Whatever the reason, Jane wasn't exactly hysterical with happiness when the Hughes outfit sent for her to try out for the biggest newcomer break of the Hollywood season. She was up at her cousin's ranch in the mountains, and she took her own sweet time about coming back two or three days later. She strolled leisurely into the studio, took her screen test and wandered out without giving it another thought. In fact, instead of sitting home and haunting the telephone, Jane got busy and landed herself a steady job in a Van Nuys dentist's office.

And when they called to tell her she had the part and talked contract, Jane made them do some tall talking, believe me. Why should I listen to honeyed Hollywood promises when I'm working steady and drawing in ten dollars every week? They put it in writing pretty soon, though, and that was different.

Jane has reformed her career outlook a little bit by now. After all, making movies is interesting and, as Jane grins, "It's fun planning how I'm going to spend my millions—if I ever get them!" Then, too, when it looks like you can't have something, that something always becomes more desirable. Jane discovered how that feels pretty soon after she'd patted on her first patch of test make-up. She'd no sooner signed up than she fell downstairs at the ranch and broke her ankle! It looked like good-bye screen chance. Then Hollywood and the movies looked like something pretty nice. Fortunately Jane's bones started knitting like the Bundles for Britain ladies, and a day before "The Outlaw" pushed off for the desert location, Jane showed up without her crutches, ready for work.

Right now she's interested enough in her screen future to take private dramatic tutoring, voice and posture and all that. But she's seeing to it that her private life doesn't take the rap for fame and fortune. On the personal side, Jane likes things just like they are.

She hasn't had a date with a movie glamour boy or showed up for any publicity night-clubbing. Bob and her Van Nuys High School chums can't afford any of the expensive Hollywood night-spots. But they can make the better dance halls now and then. Although the price of fame is beginning to tell.

The other night at the Palladium where Jane and Bob were swinging and swaying (at ninety cents a couple) to Glenn Miller, a strange girl stopped them in the middle of the dance floor. "Say," she inquired, "ain't you the girl who was in the newspaper last Sunday?" Jane was, but she looked blank and said, "Heavens, no!" And Bob just growled.

Ordinarily, though, you can find Jane where I found her—on the public beach in Santa Monica cluttered up with high school cronies of both sexes. Or you can hunt her up on the ranch, where she's already figuring how many cows and horses and chickens she can buy for the family and when she can buy her brothers a new car as soon as some of the "millions" come in. Jane's doing most of the work around the place still (she's crazy about housework—all except cooking which utterly defeats her), and she'll probably be decked out for some time in her same sparse gown selection, most of which she's made herself.

Howard Hughes discovered Jane wallowing in a lavish wardrobe consisting of a pair of slacks, a sweater, a few wash dresses and a pair of scarlet slippers. The minute she was signed he rushed her right down to the swank Hollywood emporiums and dropped a few thousand getting her dressed up for glamour. But those glad rags are still at the studio. All that Jane has new, she swears, is a sports outfit she got to appear at Camp Roberts (near Hollywood) as honorary hostess or something for the draft boys.

Jane's greatest fear at this moment—outside of the fact that Bob might not make the UCLA Varsity this fall—is that her pals will think she's gone Hollywood or high hat. "Sometimes," confesses Jane, "they look at me as if they expect me to grow green fingernails overnight!" She's a little leery, too, that some day a gossip item will get her in a spat with Bob. His college chums have been ribbing him a little lately whenever they see Jane's name linked with any movie male, professionally or otherwise. Just a still picture of her in Jack Buetel's arms brought forth cracks like, "So your girl's still true to you? Uh-huh!" Jane says that sort of thing is dangerous, especially since Bob is indeed her True Love, and they're going to get hitched—even if she turns out to be another Garbo. So she's watching all the angles.

THE other night Jane, minus Bob, went to a dinner party at Director Howard Hawks' house. She went with Jack Buetel, the Cinderella boy who stars with her in "The Outlaw." After dinner, the party moved on to Mocambo. Jane had never set her dainty foot inside a Hollywood night club before. She was curious, of course, but also dismayed. She knew about photographers and columnists who haunt Hollywood's glamour mills and conjure headline romances out of a dancing partner.

So—when she got home to the valley ranch that night—at three o'clock in the morning—she said goodnight to date Jack, hopped right into her new coupé and dashed over to Bob's house, waking him out of a sound sleep.

"I wanted to tell him so he'd understand," explained Jane, "before he read it in the papers."

I doubt very much if the progress and perils of her screen career would ever stir Jane to such anxious activity in the wee, small hours. I doubt if she has tossed or fretted a total of ten seconds through all the Hays office bans. I know she hasn't even seen a rush print of "The Outlaw" as I write this and has no idea whether she's lovely or lousy. I'm not sure that she cares too much.

Right now, of course, she'd just as soon stay in Hollywood. "I'd been wondering," breathes Jane, "just how I'd spend the next three years until Bob gets out of college."

If the prancing white horses turn back into mice, you won't find Jane Russell leaping off the big Hollywoodland sign or ending it all in the blue Pacific. No sir! You'll find her stretched out on terra firma watching Bob do handstands on the parallel bars or snag fish out of a lazy lake.

And she'll be perfectly happy. Why not?

The Hays office can never censor daydreams, can they?

IT'S NO FUN TO BE FUNNY...

"They could have laughed more," he glooms.

"Everybody else liked it," says Mary firmly. "Don't take it so hard."

"We just played to millions of people, that's all," he mutters.

To Jack, nothing short of sensational is good. Mary's approach is more equable. "They can't all be tops." Even if she doesn't persuade him, she calms him, restores his perspective. In that respect—as in others—he thinks she's just the right woman for him to be married to.

On Monday the shadows begin to draw in. Jack and his writers, Bill Morrow and Ed Beloin, have drawn up a brave platform which includes these planks: we won't get into a stew—even if by Thursday we've raised no idea, we won't yell omigod, it's going to be Sunday—what we've done before we can do again, and to hell with defeatists. The sole weakness of this platform lies in the fact that it doesn't work. Jack's the first to topple off. "He gets that look on his face," grins Morrow. "It's the look of a man who averts his shuddering gaze from a bottomless pit marked, 'No show this week.' The fact that there's always been a show brings no comfort. Next Sunday opens wide its gaping maw, and the cupboard's empty."

BUT suppose the boys show with an idea on Monday. If Jack's on a picture, it's Monday night. He got to the studio at eight for make-up and left at six-thirty. He's already done a normal day's work. He's tired. But that's his own lookout. It's not NBC's fault that he's a movie actor, too. His sense of responsibility's razor-sharp. It's up to him to see that neither job suffers by the other. If the time ever comes when he can't handle both by his own standards, he'll fade himself out.

Sometimes Ed and Bill come in with a piece of junk. They may have labored and brought forth a mouse. Or they may not have labored. Jack doesn't say, "That stinks," or "What the hell have you been doing with yourself?" He knows the writer's temperament and the problems of writing—that ideas don't come ready to hand like bricks, that the creative mind works in its own way its wonders to perform and may be active even while it's loafing.

He has, besides, the disposition of a lamb, which he excuses on practical grounds. "If you holler and scream at them," he says, "you put them in a mood where they can't write." Instead of screaming, he says, "Well, I don't know, let's try something else." Instead of hollering, he nibbles his nails—a habit Mary has tried to break by scolding, George Burns by derisive mimicry, manicurists by appeals to his vanity. Jack hangs his head and goes on biting. Or he chews gum. That's a sign that he's reached the end of his rope. When his eyes stare and he stuffs three sticks of gum into his mouth oblivious of what he's doing, Morrow and Beloin reach for their hats, murmur, "We'll fix this up and see you tomorrow," and beat a retreat.

Only once in the five years they've been working together has there been a blow-up, and that was due to a misunderstanding. Jack thought the boys, sore at something he wasn't responsible

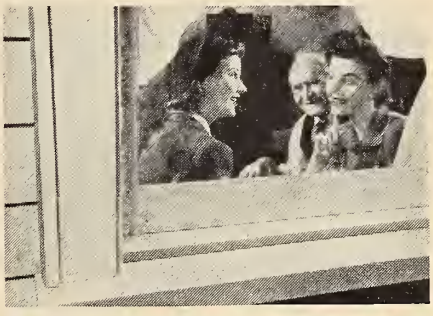
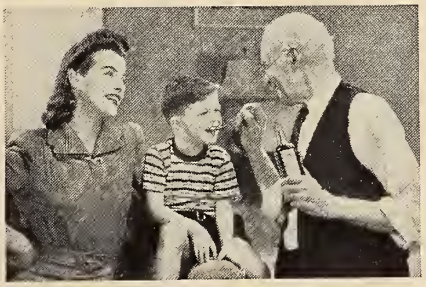
"I wish Gramp didn't live with us . . . so there!"

A young mother learns the best way to solve an old problem

1. I don't believe in spanking my little boy, Stevie. But when the little imp was so rude to his Grandpa, the other day, I could have whaled him! My husband's father is a darling and he's so sensitive about having to live with us.



2. The fuss started when I asked Gramp to give Stevie a laxative. Stevie set up a howl. He hated the taste of it and he flatly refused to take it. So Gramp forced it down him. Then Stevie yelled he hated Gramp and wished he didn't live with us.



3. I had to punish Stevie for hurting Gramp's feelings. That's why the three of us looked so miserable when my cousin, who's a registered nurse, stopped by. When I told her about it, she looked startled. "Why run the risk of forcing him to take a bad-tasting laxative?"

4. "You can shock a child's delicate nervous system that way," my cousin went on. "Children should get a nice-tasting laxative—one made especially for children, not a harsh, adult's laxative. Why don't you try Fletcher's Castoria? Kids love it and it's safe and efficient."

5. "You can really rely on Fletcher's Castoria," she added. "It's thorough, but mild. There isn't a single harsh purging drug in it. Try it . . . I know you'll agree with me." So I walked her down to Main Street and bought a bottle right then and there.

6. Well, the next time Stevie needed a laxative, I let Gramp give him Fletcher's Castoria. And Stevie did love the taste. He hugged Gramp and they've been great buddies ever since. Fletcher's Castoria sure solved my youngster's laxative problem . . . the safe way!

Chief ingredient of Fletcher's Castoria is senna.

Medical literature says: (1) In most cases, senna does not disturb the appetite and digestion or cause nausea . . . (2) Senna works primarily in the lower bowel . . . (3) In regulated dosages it produces easy elimination and has little tendency to cause irritation or constipation after use.

Senna is especially processed in Fletcher's Castoria to eliminate griping and thus allow gentle laxative action.

America Has the Best Stores in the World... and the praise goes where it is due—to the people who serve us all

Successful stores, large and small, have to be abreast of the times... the management and sales people keep track of a hundred and one different items... and constantly see that they are properly displayed. All this saves our time and makes it quick and easy for us to get what we want.

If we realized the time and work behind these people's efforts to give us service, we'd marvel even more than ever at the patience, good nature and level headedness they show.

Yes, there's a good reason why we Americans boast the best stores in the world—and the credit goes to the efficient people who serve us.

for, had gone on strike. His wrath stemmed from the pain of friendship betrayed, and whether he or they were more astonished by his tongue-lashing, they still can't decide. It's safe to say, though, that Jack was the ultimate victim. When the thing was cleared up, he wore sackcloth and ashes for weeks.

Once they have a workable idea, it should be smooth sailing. Not with Jack. He may think it's funny, but that doesn't prove the audience will. He may laugh his head off, but he's not paid to make himself laugh. He's a perfectionist aiming to top his last mark. When he doesn't succeed, it's not for want of trying. The man at the dial sits forever on Jack's shoulder. In the final analysis that's the guy he works for—and to make it harder, he makes the guy tough. "He won't say, 'They can't all be firecrackers.' He'll say, 'Did you hear the Benny show last night? Boy, was it foul!'" So Jack sifts and weighs and explores and rejects and tears apart. "You've got to sell back to him again and again," says Morrow, "what he's already accepted and laughed at. That way we get a refining process that's invaluable."

THE revue, "Pins and Needles," included a sketch called "Cream of Mush." A radio tenor sings a song which the agency hacks to pieces in its high resolve to please all comers. The sun can't be "red" because people don't like the word. It can't set in the West, because Easterners might be offended. Like all good travesties, this one holds a germ of truth. Policy apart, Jack's a softie who can't bear to hurt feelings. He keeps his ears peeled for phrases which might wound the susceptibilities of one group or another. When through all his guards something slips in, he dies. One evening he was supposed to be dining his cast. He told them they ate too much. "What did I invite here, a bunch of starving Armenians?" Letters came protesting the assumption that Armenians don't eat as well as the next race. "It was just a fill-in line," moaned Jack. "We could have skipped it and never felt the difference." That old saw, "He spends money like a drunken sailor," was construed by cranks as an affront to the navy. Even Jack conceded this too preposterous to worry about.

With a secretary taking notes they work all week. A run-through rehearsal is called for Saturday noon, its chief purpose to note cast reaction to the lines. If they don't laugh, figures Jack, nobody will. He watches them closely, asks no questions but draws his own conclusions. All through the pleasant Saturday afternoon, while people who have no radio programs play, he and his writers revamp the script. Sometimes they make wholesale changes, sometimes they snip jokes here and add others there. Jack goes home and tries the gags out on Mary. Then he broods in bed and forgets to turn out the lights.

Sunday rehearsal directed by Jack brings its own crop of headaches. He's a stickler for punctuality. Rochester's late. The boys and girls have plenty to tell each other. They won't settle down till Jack gets mad. The expression his madness takes is, "Now really, fellows—" or, "Well, gee, after all, girls, let's get together." The extreme duration of his madness covers two minutes. He decides he's really sore at Rochester. The company watches him when Rochester shows. He knows they're watching. He opens his mouth to bawl and grins instead. "I can't help it," he apologizes. "It's his face."

Which doesn't mean that they don't jump through hoops for him. They know that being funny's a serious business. In the end they give their all for dear old National Broadcasting, Jell-o and Jack. But each is responsible only for himself. They just walk in. Jack's been working all week. He has what they call Sunday-morning jitters. Everything bothers him. He rubs his nose, pulls at his ear, mauls his chin. He's got to shape script and players into a crack performance. Nervous as a jumping bean himself, he's got to avoid making the others nervous, with an eye trained on the idiosyncrasies of each. Mary, for instance, is always bad at rehearsals. If he corrects her too often, she gets mixed up. Dennis Day is best left to read as he pleases. He has his own style. Interfere with it, and you wind up with no style at all. Phil Harris is the champion line-blower. Jack loses patience sometimes. Then he kisses the top of his head and says he's sorry.

They rehearse till shortly before the first broadcast. Three-thirty in summer, four-thirty in winter, to hit the East Coast at half past seven. When Jack steps out for his preliminary breeze with the studio audience, he's the picture of bland self-possession, but the picture lies. The reason he appears so early is to keep from going nuts with suspense.

FROM start to finish of the show, he's tense. No, you'd never guess it. Airy and casual you'd call him, but his eyes are everywhere and his wits work at frantic speed. He ad libs to cover a blown line or a gag that doesn't get a laugh. But timing is of the essence of comedy, and he must decide within a split second whether an ad lib will do more good than harm. In the wrong place, it may bring one laugh and kill the next four or five—which makes for bad arithmetic and worse clowning. If a gag hits unexpectedly, he beams at Morrow in the control room. He's got the kind of mouth whose corners curl naturally up. Mary watches it. When the corners go down, her heart goes with him.

The broadcast over, his face tells the whole story. If he thinks it was bad, he looks like the end of the world. "In one minute," says Morrow, "he's a thousand years old." The boys follow him to the script room. The rest grab a sandwich and return to stand by for rehearsal. There's another show at seven-thirty for the West. "Let's pep it up," says Jack. They throw out the stillborn jokes, rack their fevered brains for sure-fire laughs and in drastic cases have been known to rewrite a whole scene between broadcasts. Jack hates the words "good enough." "Nothing's good enough," he says, "but the best."

That's the principle on which he builds his show. One thing he doesn't worry about is his Crossley rating. Of course it's pleasant to be first, and if he slipped way down, he'd take the hint, exit and devote his worrying to golf. But if another show went ahead of his, he'd be listening to it, swelling the Crossley by one. When Bergen and McCarthy topped him, he made fuel of their triumph for his own program. "We can't be better than someone who's better than us," he argues. "The most we can do is to be as good as we can, and let the Crossley rating take care of itself."

He even worried about the testimonial dinner given by NBC to celebrate his ten years in radio. He tried to talk them out of it. The prospect of acting as a butt for verbal bouquets terrified him. Not till Rudy Vallee got up and sounded off with, "Who's this bum Benny with his ten lousy years in radio? I've had fifteen, where's my dinner—?"—not till then did Jack pop into chortles of joy and relax for the evening.

"PIGTAILS, BUCK-TEETH AND FRECKLES... I had 'em all"

"WHEN I WAS 16 and ready to graduate from the awkward stage, I bought my first lipstick...TANGEE NATURAL. And I've used TANGEE NATURAL ever since! I'm always thrilled by the way it changes from orange in the stick until my own most flattering lip-tint of warm blush rose is produced."

"ON MY WEDDING DAY I gave each of my bridesmaids a beauty kit...a Tangee Natural Lipstick, the harmonizing rouge, and their own correct shade of Tangee Face Powder. To each of them Tangee Natural Lipstick gave a different lip color."

"TODAY, my 16 year old daughter and I both use Tangee Natural. Its pure cream base keeps our lips smooth for hours. And Tangee Natural is so economical—the new de luxe cases hold much more lipstick than before!

JOHN LITEL
Born John Litel, Albany, Wis., Dec. 10, 1894. Still doesn't know how he got to be an actor. Claims that after graduating from the University of Pennsylvania, he just found himself in a company with Grace George, decided acting was fun and has stayed with it ever since. The pride of his heart is Simba, his lion dog. Plays bridge between scenes on the lot. If there is one thing he hates, it is egotistical people. Now plays golf in the 70's—claims he could be pretty fair if he had time to practice.

Born Robert Randall, Quincy, Ill., Dec. 8, 1908. Has been a seaman, cowboy, secretary and script writer. Finally joined the Pasadena Community Play House and spent two years there gaining experience, then was signed by M-G-M. Couldn't get the parts he wanted there, so he broke his contract and went to Republic. He loves ultra modern furniture and has indulged this whim to the fullest in his home. Constantly chews on pipe, claims it helps him think. Hasn't seen "Gone With The Wind" or read "For Whom The Bell Tolls."

Born Jane Alice Peters, Fort Wayne, Ind., Oct. 6, 1908. Nickname, the Madame . . . often has to re-write a letter because she has chewed up most of it . . . insults her friends; beware when she is sweetness and light . . . knows all the words a taxi-driver uses and uses them herself . . . wears bright red polish on her finger and toenails . . . red-hot movie fan . . . loves amusement parks . . . wears her sport clothes till they fall apart . . . can't spell a five letter word . . . once gave her director a straight-jacket as a token of her esteem.

Born Peter Lorre, Rosenberg, Hungary, June 26, 1904. This murderous cinemadman is shy, loves animals, going to concerts and is a student of child psychology. Started his career in a bank, but going to the theatre every night and then making the rounds with his actor friends did not make for accuracy or promptness. Was eventually fired. Turned to the theatre and loved it. He reads himself to sleep to the tune of soft music.

ANITA LOUISE
Born Anita Louise Fremalt, New York City, Jan. 9, 1917. She is so fragilely beautiful that she is treated like Dresden china, and does she hate it! Her greatest ambition is to be reincarnated as a lady wrestler. She loves steak and onions, prize-fights, tennis, polo and swimming. She saves money fixing her own hair and nails, and then squanders every cent on cut flowers for her home. Owns a scottie named "Wee Thistle." Her good luck charm is a moose foot. Up on all the current events, as she practically lives at hubby's newsreel theatre.

EDMUND LOWE
Born Edmund Lowe, San José, Cal., March 3, 1895. Achieved an enviable record for himself at Santa Clara, getting his M.A. at the age of 19, as well as being captain of the baseball team. After graduation, he tried stock and then Broadway. Eight flops in one year convinced him that the stage was not his forte, so he tried Hollywood where he has been a successful actor for seventeen years. Is one of the best dressed men in Hollywood, rarely misses a concert, hates radios, likes blue shirts, prize fights and going to the movies.

Born Myrna Williams, Helena, Mont., August 2, 1905. She's a magnificent sculptress, whose talent attracted the notice of Rudolph Valentino, and her first movie break was in a picture backed by Mrs. Valentino. When not working, she likes to stay in bed all day and consume quarts of ice cream. Collects paintings, antiques, brasses . . . is the freckle champion of Hollywood . . . loves hot tamales . . . doesn't care for jewelry, but loves perfume, scarves and handkerchiefs . . . she is so glad to be out of her sloe-eyed rut that she hates anything even vaguely oriental . . . won't go near a Chinese restaurant.

Born Bela Lugosi Blasko, Lugos, Hungary, October 20, 1888. Attended the Academy of Theatrical Art in Budapest, and after leaving there became the matinée idol of the Royal National Theatre for ten years. He heartily dislikes horror parts, is an accomplished musician and dancer, has a trained baritone voice and an insatiable love for reading. Liver and onions for breakfast is a daily "must," but he never eats any lunch.

Born Paul Lukas, May 26, 1891, on a train entering Budapest, Hungary. Attended the Academy of Theatrical Art in Budapest and started his film career in Berlin. He was in the Hungarian Air Corps in World War I. Favorite recreations are automobile racing and mechanics. Loves swimming and sailing but hates to get wet in a rainstorm. He would just as soon hibernate when the thermometer goes below freezing.

WILLIAM LUNDIGAN
Born William Lundigan, Syracuse, N. Y., June 12, 1914. Came to the screen direct from the airwaves, where he had been an announcer, sound-effects man, script writer and general helper-outer. He still writes radio playlets. Loves steak and doesn't mind saying that no one cooks them as well as he does. Always knocks on wood when he thinks he is getting cocky. Carries a St. Cristopher medal at all times. Is left-handed and firmly convinced that he would stutter if he changed. Nevertheless, he is an expert tennis player and his golf is Gene Sarazen-ish.

IDA LUPINO
Born Ida Lupino, Brixton, Eng., Jan. 1, 1914. Her father built a theatre at the bottom of his London garden, and there Ida and her sister proceeded to learn Shakespeare's major plays by the time they were ten. This early training led to Ida's playing the female lead in "Her First Affair" at the age of fifteen. She would rather dance than eat, plays a smashing game of tennis and plays "at" golf. She likes to disappear between pictures, and nobody yet knows how she does it or where she goes. Collects linen.

Born Ragnar Godfrey Lind, Auburn, Mass., Feb. 16, 1909. Has four brothers and three sisters . . . used to be a track star and still runs before breakfast . . . loves the color blue and red, red roses . . . ambition is to be a really great actor . . . sings as a hobby . . . writes notebooks full of short stories, essays and beginnings of novels, a hangover from the days when he was editor of his college paper . . . pet aversions are roadside advertising and cats, particularly Persian cats . . . probably can consume twice as much Smorgasbord as anyone else.

Born Angelina Ciofani, Waterbury, Conn., May 3, 1925. Risked everything on a one night stand at the Troc . . . she arrived there friendless, without influence, and financed by the dimes of her school chums. After hearing her sing three songs, the major studios were fighting for her. She amazed everyone by being able to sing arias in French, Spanish and Italian without a lesson. Learned them from an old victrola playing Lily Pons' and Galli Curci's records.

Born Lya Lys, May 18, 1913, in Berlin, Germany, of Russian parents. Appeared in Spanish, German and French films before coming to Hollywood. Claims she wouldn't go back to Europe for love nor money. Above all things she loves speed—automobiles, speed boats and swift planes. Her favorite diversion is putting on a pair of greasy overalls and retiring to the garage to tinker with her cars.

JEANETTE MacDONALD
Born Jeanette MacDonald, Philadelphia, Pa., June 18, 1907. Started her career as a model, but her love for singing was too great to keep that up long. When not working, she practices several hours a day. Has done more to improve musical culture in this country than anyone else in America. Never touches coffee for breakfast, drinks hot milk. Least extravagant actress in Hollywood. Hates night clubs and staying up late but loves to entertain at home. Nothing makes her happier than stowing away vast quantities of stuffed dates.

Turn to our valuable Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. The "general rating" is the average rating of our critic and newspaper critics all over the country. 4★ means very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. C denotes that the picture is recommended for children as well as adults. Asterisk shows that only Modern Screen rating is given on films not yet reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

BACKGROUND FOR ROMANCE

room of the Morrison Hotel in Chicago, joined the band (Herbie Kay's), was a night club singer. If that wasn't the typical American girl success story, then his wise blue eyes had never seen one. Dorothy, with her blue-black hair, her throaty singing voice, her oncoming film fame, was the wish-fulfilment of tens of thousands of middle class American girls.

Then why shouldn't she dress the part? That's when the one-piece frocks with the buckled belts, the comfortable slacks, began to vanish from Dottie's wardrobe several years ago. The new Lamour wore white chiffons for evening, cut with an eye to line and eye-appeal . . . fox capes and ermine coats, too; and crimson suede dresses with dripping silver fox scarves and hats whose brims advanced and retreated like a military campaign.

The little Lamour was now a fitting symbol for all the working girls in America who dreamed of things like that happening to them. And all this was the result of shrewd planning by the thirty-ish young man who walked at Dorothy's side as they entered Ciro's that night in May.

And still she wondered whether the fun of being turned out as flawlessly as a Worth mannequin entirely compensated for the other things that she had had to give up. Things like love and domestic happiness. For Dottie, first, last and always, is a devotee of the domestic routine.

Up to that moment she had sacrificed one four-year marriage to orchestra leader Herbie Kay (Herbert Power Kaumeyer) for her career; she had tried to forget the ache in her heart and its emptiness by forcing an interest in other too-willing escorts. The resultant pub-

"I'll admit I was still too worked up about the soap in my eye to worry about powder at the time . . .

"By Jupiter, though, come to think of it—I didn't get a rubdown! It was right out of the tub and on with my shirt! Not a particle of that delicious Johnson's Baby Powder did I have! Not even so much as a hasty dusting!

"I remember now—I thought 'This dressing business is going mighty fast'. . . Fast—I'll say it was!

"The idea of Grandma thrusting me into a romper without even one little sprinkle of Johnson's! I'd just like to tell her how smooth and slick and comfortable I haven't been feeling all day!

"Believe me—this is the last time I go visiting without a can of downy-soft, soothing Johnson's clutched in my fist. A baby can't be too careful!"

"No doubt about it—Johnson's Baby Powder is the loveliest stuff that ever soothed a baby's prickles! Fine for chafes, too. And really very inexpensive."

Why I switched to Meds

—by a model

Even on those "certain days," I have to parade around and smile. I just couldn't do it without internal sanitary protection. So when Modess came out with Meds—a new and improved tampon—I bought a box quick! What a blessing! I never dreamed I could be so gloriously comfortable! Meds make protection so sure, too—they're the only tampons with the "safety center." And thrifty? Say, Meds cost only 20¢ a box of ten—an average month's supply—or only 98¢ for a box of sixty! No other tampons in individual applicators are priced so low!

licity which backfired like an ancient Ford had wearied and hurt her.

There was no doubt that she was the victim of a "bad press." What she said was misconstrued. When she didn't say anything, her silence was misinterpreted. When she decided to stop all nonsensical rumors about her by not giving interviews, reporters declared that she was going "high hat." She was on the Hollywood merry-go-round and there was nothing she could do about it.

All this may make her like a figure in a great tragedy wrapped up in the inevitability of her fate, but that's all wrong, too. True—sometimes she would long for the early days when she was known as "Toozhie"—short for "Toujours" Lamour—when life was practically carefree. But music, laughter could make her brave, make her forget the sleepless questions of the night. "So what is fame?" "So what is all this business?" "So what—are you really happy?"

It may have been that the "so what?" voice was prodding her at the moment she turned to look up into Greg Bautzer's rugged face. Rocamora introduced them. There was mutual recognition of something that wasn't ordinary as Dottie smiled up into Greg's eyes.

Greg Bautzer is that rare Hollywood commodity, an eligible male. With the shortage of men in the film colony due to conscription both martial and marital, many a glamour girl would jilt her career to rate with Mr. Bautzer, whose handsomeness is marked with more virility than most of the Hollywood male pretties.

Without even half trying, Dottie held him willing captive for the evening. Although Greg had come with another party, and he looked over to his table during the evening, he remained as much a part of the Rocamora-Lamour twosome as the carnation in the host's lapel. After that, it was "Greg Bautzer with Dorothy Lamour" or "Dorothy Lamour and Greg Bautzer" in all accounts of the film colony's social doings.

On the surface this may seem like another torrid film romance. But it was more than that. Instead of being the coming together of two libidoes on the loose, as is often the Hollywood case, this was a meeting of two people desperately in need of a companionship that would blot out memories of preceding unhappy romances.

Young Bautzer had also been the victim of a Hollywood blitz attack. He had been left literally "waiting at the church"—for Lana Turner had been reported his fiancée, had lavishly promised the "press boys" that she and Bautzer would have a church wedding when they were married. Instead, on February 14, 1940, she handed him a valentine in the shape of a headline screaming the news that she had eloped and married band leader Artie Shaw in Las Vegas, Nevada.

BEING the gentleman, the attorney and quite a scholar, if all accounts are true, Bautzer swallowed his pride, which must have been dented, and made a statement: "He is a lucky fellow," he said, referring to the groom. "I wish them all the luck in the world." This was a generous remark in view of the fact that he had been Miss Turner's accepted escort for over two years, that she had scarcely taken him into her confidence about her impending elopement, and that on the two nights before the runaway marriage Bautzer had been her escort to film affairs.

Just what was in her mind to prompt this whirlwind marriage—was it pique or was she swept off her feet by a romantic rip tide?—remains the secret of Lana, whose short-lived marriage came to an end in August in the divorce courts. Anyway, her swift move left Bautzer quite Eve-less. But not for long and not in Hollywood. Bautzer, the eligible, was besieged by importuning ladies, and the powder rooms of movie mansions and film cafés buzzed with chatter about him.

To get a clear picture of Bautzer it is necessary to look at his background. After reading the film gossip columns it is too easy to brand him a cinema playboy. He lives the footloose life of a young bachelor who knows what fun is all about. His roommates, law-partner Bentley Ryan and Jack Huber, are epicureans from the same extremely robust mould.

Furthermore, the threesome occupies the home once lived in by that most redoubtable bachelor of them all, Ronald Colman. The little Spanish house, climbing down a hillside, set in tennis courts and pergolas and shade trees, lends itself to legend, which certainly enlarges the glamour surrounding any man-about-town.

But looking deeper into Bautzer's background, other things offset the surface legend. For one thing he is a capable attorney, whose capabilities started and sustained him in his career during the lean late thirties and Depression. He has been a partner of Ryan's for four or five years. Bautzer was born in Los Angeles County, which disproves the old one about a "prophet is without honor in his own—county."

HIS college days at the University of Southern California were marked by an ability to speak out, not out of turn, but in debating teams, and his forensic abilities carried him through thirteen intercollegiate contests. Once he represented USC in its annual tour throughout the Pacific Coast, and when an American debating team went abroad to joust theories and words with Old World teams, Bautzer was Captain of the American crew. The youngster (he is now twenty-nine or thirty) had an opportunity to visit Oxford University in England where his great grandfather Gregson, on his mother's side, once attended school.

Add this information to the stories of how he sold papers on the Los Angeles streets as a lad, and how he never fails, unless he has a fractured leg (as in 1940) or loses an appendix (ditto year), to be chief speaker at the Newsboys Club meetings, and you have all the qualifications of a pretty solid citizen.

It might seem to the outsider that such a team—the film star riding on the crest of the success wave and the well-established, not unworldly young attorney—might well unite for a long-term matrimonial contract. There should be no career conflict. Each is responsible to Hollywood for a livelihood. But in different fields. Each could zoom upward in his career without muscling in on the other's territory.

That may be why, when their vacations coincided, they decided that a month away from Hollywood, a month away from its clamor and diffused issues, would give each a chance to take a long look at their feelings for each other. So, equipped with standard chaperone, they made the excursion to Hawaii on the S.S. Lurline.

As you read this, their decision is known. If it was in the affirmative then Dottie's friends have already wished her all the happiness that she has always set her heart upon finding in marriage. If the decision was in the negative, then they are prepared, as always, to heartily agree that whatever the sarong girl does is all right.

GLORIA THE GLAMOROUS

He bought everything new that came out. He was one of the first to own an early Edison phonograph. And my mother—her kitchen was jammed with time-saving devices. I remember the way it looked. Like a bad dream by Rube Goldberg!"

To fulfill this early ambition, we learned, Miss Swanson quit Hollywood temporarily just after the talkies came in, went to New York, invested wisely and was soon President and General Manager of Multiprises, Incorporated, manufacturers of plastics and hard metal alloys.

In this factory, our glamour girl interviewed wild-eyed inventors. She gave everyone with something to offer a hearing. One gentleman appeared with a new process for making plastic buttons. Another had concocted an alloy to draw wire. Soon, Miss Swanson was turning both products out in her plant!

She even went to Europe before the war in search of new ideas and keen minds. Brought back two foreign inventors, men who had life-saving devices to offer.

"A third gentleman I hoped to bring back had an invention—luminous paint for street signs—which was sensational. But before I could get him out, the Nazis demanded he do business with them. He refused." She frowned. "He's now in a concentration camp."

WE wondered aloud if, now that she was back in the art of picture-making she wouldn't forget about her factory.

"Forget about it?" she cried. "Now? When we're doing important National Defense contracts for the government? Why, my five office assistants (they call me the Little Chief) send me every letter, every contract, every document that's drawn up by the firm!"

We marveled, not alone at the fact that Miss Swanson could handle her firm's urgencies at a distance of 3,000 miles, but at the knowledge that she was capable of doing at least a dozen things at one time and well.

For aside from her pet factory, here she was on the set of RKO's "Father Takes A Wife." Working day and night enacting the role of America's most famous actress who, in the scenario, marries a millionaire shipping magnate portrayed by Adolphe Menjou and gets mildly involved, for the sake of an entertaining plot, with a Latin warbling protégé, Desi Arnaz.

And if the factory and the film weren't enough, here she was maintaining her reputation, intact for seven years, as one of America's best-dressed women. She showed us the little object slated to enhance her reputation. It was a white blouse with tattoo designs. Really clever. Its origin was interesting. For one scene in the picture, Gloria Swanson had to wear something nautical. She didn't want the usual anchors and life preservers. She desired something different. So she consulted Designer Rene Hubert, who has done her clothes for years. He went to a tattoo artist, a specialist with sailors, who tattooed his original salty designs on the blouse, and these designs were then stitched. Miss Swanson was pleased.

But her cleverness with clothes is nothing new. We recalled the sensation she'd once created in New York. Final proof that beauty—plus brains—can do anything. There was to be a big luncheon at the Colony Restaurant to determine America's Best Dressed Woman. It was calculated to be a close contest, and Gloria Swanson was anxious to retain her title. Suddenly, in a moment of rare inspiration she got an idea.

The day before the crucial luncheon, Gloria Swanson appeared at the Colony wearing a hat especially designed by Valentina. Inside the hat was a concealed smokepot which sent up tiny clouds of perfumed smoke. This created a furor. The other women present, fearing this might win the contest for Miss Swanson the following day, raced out to have new hats designed. At the luncheon they all appeared—Mrs. Gilbert Miller, Mrs. Byron Foy, Mrs. Harrison Williams, Mrs. Woolworth Donohue—in odd hats. As a satirist put it, one of the odd hats even played tunes, another spouted flames, a third was topped by a live dove and a fourth flashed a neon light. Everyone waited for Gloria Swanson. They'd show her! Finally she arrived! And she was wearing another new hat! But it was a plain straw bonnet! That's all. Just a plain bonnet. It made the others appear overdressed. It made Gloria Swanson stand out. And thus, by a bit of handy brainwork she retained her unofficial crown of America's Best Dressed Woman!

Listening to Gloria Swanson, observing her, we couldn't help recalling how in many ways she'd changed. During the twenties when she was Hollywood's original First Lady, she was glamorous, too, but in a different way. She was in those years wilder, more hectic, somewhat unrestrained. Today she maintains her colorfulness with greater subtlety.

In the silent days when Gloria Swanson toiled for Cecil B. DeMille and for The Famous Players, she was a great feuder. Actually, those were the days of feuds. She was on the outs, for example, with Pola Negri. And after Pola Negri pulled a trick on her, Gloria Swanson got even. She learned Pola hated cats, so she flooded the entire studio, the set and Pola's dressing room with kittens and toms of every meowing variety! And again, she feuded with Constance Bennett. That was a real bout —and the only thing they had in common was the same ex-husband, the Marquis de la Falaise!

Also, those were days when Miss Swanson, earning as much as $12,000 a week, bathed in a bathtub of onyx and another of gold. And those were the days when she could see a jewel in a shop window at three in the morning, desire it and send ten miles for the owner to open his store in the middle of the night to sell her that jewel!

THOSE were the days, too, when she could confess, as she once did to an English novelist, that she lived by feel rather than by head. Emotion dominated her life. As she stated to the novelist at the time during a private luncheon:

"A woman asked me yesterday to define life. I said that life was emotion. She didn't understand. I corrected myself and said that emotion was the most important thing in life, and I gave her a simple example. I said, 'If you were to discover that a friend whom you had trusted had been stealing from you, which would have the greater effect upon you, the loss of the money or the emotion caused by its loss?'"

Which was extremely intelligent but was also revealing in displaying how Gloria Swanson thought and by what credo she performed socially some twelve or thirteen years ago.

Today, she has become too busy, too immersed in more vital matters, too mature for the hectic and the wild. And today her very maturity has helped make her just as colorful as in the long ago.

During our conversation, Miss Swanson made a remarkable statement. She said:

"I've lived generations, thousands of years in fact, since I was fifteen years old and first broke into films. Why, I'll bet you I've lived more than my mother, my grandmother and my great-grandmother combined!"

For a clue to the present we delved more deeply into the past.

Her father was an army Lieutenant-Colonel. He named her Gloria after the heroine in his favorite book, Hall Caine's "The Christian." The Swanson was an Americanization of the family's Swedish name, Svenson. In fact, when she first reached Hollywood and won a job in pictures, Cecil B. DeMille took her aside and said, "Listen, honey, everything's fine about you except your name. Where in the devil did you ever dream up such a phoney stage name? Gloria Swanson. God! Who'll ever believe that?"

Her father wanted her to be a painter. Even sent her to the Chicago Art Institute. Her mother wanted her to be a musician. Even had her banging the piano. She just wanted to be alone and think. They got her a job at a department store notions counter. She was thrown out on her ear when the manager found her reading "Quo Vadis" instead of waiting on customers.

ONE day she saw a John Bunny comedy. He was the Abbott and Costello, all wrapped up in one, of his time. Mabel Normand was also in the film. So young Gloria Swanson decided she wanted to be an actress like Mabel Normand.

"I remember walking homewards from the theatre," she recalled later, "practicing the sort of faces Mabel had made on the screen. A cop stopped me under a street lamp and asked me if anybody had been bothering me. I blushed and said 'No,' but decided that meant I could act!"

Gloria Swanson's aunt took her to New York on a vacation. She tried to become an extra at the old Essanay Studio. While waiting in line, she was spotted by the studio's biggest star. He hired her for a two-reel custard-tossing comedy. It was pure slapstick. In the last scene she was supposed to bend down for a hankie, and the big star was supposed to kick her in the beam-end and send her on her face. She refused to be kicked.

She said to the big star, "I want to be an actress. I don't want to be a clown!"

"Sorry," answered the big star, "but you're talking yourself out of a movie career!"

The big star, whose name was Charlie Chaplin, was wrong. Because, by persistently avoiding being smushed in the face by gooey pies, Gloria Swanson soon became Hollywood's biggest name.

Why, the time even came when she could make her own pictures. Once when on a reading spree she read the life of Napoleon Bonaparte's ex-laundress who rose to nobility, the fabulous Madame Sans-Gene. Gloria Swanson decided to go to France with her own cast and make the picture against the original setting at a cost of $300,000. She expected to use the historic French palaces and parks for her sets. First she had to obtain a permit. So she hired a French interpreter, a charming and handsome nobleman who spoke five languages.

This nobleman took Miss Swanson to a cabinet minister. But there were difficulties about the permit. The interpreter and the minister chattered endlessly in French.

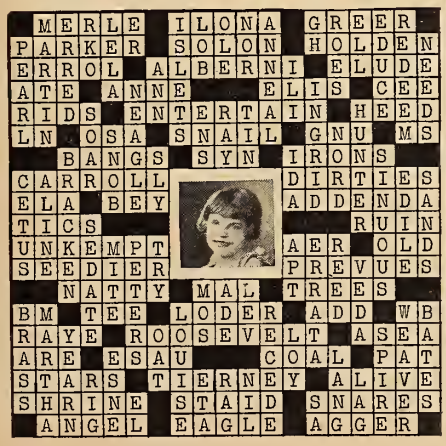
Finally exasperated, Miss Swanson shouted to her interpreter, "Neither he nor you understands me!"

"He may not," admitted the interpreter, "but I do!"

And to show he did, he married her. He was the much-publicized Marquis de la Falaise. And P.S. he also got her the permit to shoot that picture in France!

Incidentally, the Marquis was Gloria Swanson's third husband. Previously she'd been married to Wallace Beery and to H. K. Somborn, who founded the Brown Derby. And in 1934 she divorced her fourth husband, Michael Farmer, the Irish sportsman. Today there's nothing too serious in the air. She has three children to keep her domestically occupied. Gloria, now twenty, is married. Then there are Joe and Michele.

Today brown-haired, blue-eyed, thoughtful Gloria Swanson insists she has no special ambitions. "I don't like to make plans," was the way she put it. "Sometimes I feel as if my entire life were written ahead, patterned by destiny, and there was no use planning. . . . But when I do work on something, I'm like a horse with blinders on. I can only see straight ahead at my immediate objective. This enables me to concentrate, forsaking all else."



Aside from tennis or long hikes with her dogs, her favorite recreation is to relax at an afternoon tea—"especially with creative people of every type"—and argue and learn.

"Once a writer friend of mine described me as a Mental Vampire. 'You enter a room,' he said, 'and sponge up all the information the best minds have to give you and then discard those minds.' And I suppose that's true. I presume I've been forever trying to compensate for having attended only one year of high school in my life before entering pictures at fifteen, and I've been anxious to catch up on my learning ever since."

Finally, we wondered about Gloria Swanson's tomorrows. Not her ambitions, but her tomorrows. We knew that she would always be glamorous and exciting because, well, her glamour depends not upon rapidly fading human beauty but upon more certain and dependable human brains. We remembered one thing she'd once said about her tomorrow. It was the key to her intellect. She'd said:

"When I grow old, I want to have an old brain as well as an old body. I shall pray for wrinkles in my spirit to match the wrinkles on my face. I shall pray for the fire to die down in my brain just as it dies down in my body. . . ."

preferred the flavor of Beech-Nut Gum

In a test, made by an independent fact-finding organization, 334 out of 509 softball players preferred the delicious flavor of Beech-Nut Gum.

Various brands of the same flavor gum were bought in local stores and identifying wrappers were removed. The softball players were each given two different brands (Beech-Nut and one other, both unidentified) and were asked to report which stick they preferred. 3 out of 5 softball players said they preferred the flavor of Beech-Nut Gum to that of the other brand.

CALL ME "DUTCH"

or at sea you would be pretty sure not to hear a thing about it. It is in the records, for example, that in his twenty-seven years to date Reagan has saved the lives of seventy-seven people from drowning. But an astute publicity department generally gives this figure out as seventeen persons. "I guess they figure people wouldn't believe it if you told them a movie star saved seventy-seven lives," is the way Ronnie explains it.

There is hardly a young contract player who is not publicly dunked in a swimming pool the first few weeks he is engaged, but for some reason no one ever thought to do body art for Reagan. Then quite by accident, one of the publicity boys happened to spy Ronnie emerging from the surf at the Santa Monica Beach Club. The publicity lad couldn't help uttering a long, astounded, "Whee!" And the next day there was an order for Ronald Reagan to make some pictures in trunks. Those shots brought oh's and ah's from fans the country over, as well as hundreds of offers for testimonials for everything from breakfast cereals to stretching gadgets for developing the Body Beautiful.

I DIDN'T know what that fellow was talking about that day down at the beach," Ronnie says. "I'd just come down for a swim, and he kept telling me that I should have told him I had a body. Well, what did he think I had anyway? I used to be a four-letter man at college, but I didn't think that that gave me an excuse to stick out my chest and expand my biceps publicly every time someone mentioned the word health."

Today, it must be told, there is more than a little chance that all this will be changed. Ronnie is married to Jane Wyman, and Jane is a little girl with a mind of her own and an aggressive ability that will be certain to leave its mark on friend husband. Besides, there are three Reagans and a fourth one reportedly on the way!

Just the other day something happened that would have been unthinkable last year. Ronnie had been called into Jack Warner's office for an important conference. Mr. Warner, the studio chief and the man whose say-so could rocket him to the top or doom him to another year or two of playing cops-and-robbers in the B's, was in a benign, kindly mood and was outlining his plans for Ronnie's future.

But did Ronnie pay grateful attention? No. All he kept watching was a clock on the boss's desk, eyeing it with increasing dismay as each minute passed. Finally he could stand it no longer. He stood up in the midst of one of Mr. Warner's sentences and said, "You'll have to excuse me, sir, but I can't stay a minute longer—I've got to go. You see, if I don't get home in fifteen minutes I don't get to bathe the baby, and that's my job. So long—I'm very late."

We asked Ronnie point-blank if he didn't think that being married to Jane had changed him a little. "I suppose it has," he offered tentatively, then deciding definitely, "I know it has. I used to be easy-going because I didn't have anybody to think of but myself. But now I always get to thinking about Jane and Maureen and, well, it does make a difference. You hate to let your wife think you're being made a chump of."

Ronnie is not ashamed to tell you that Jane is the first and only girl he has been in love with. "From the time I graduated from college back in 1932, till we got married I was too busy to think much about romance. First I got into radio, and it was a hard grind for five years. I started with a little fresh-water station in Davenport, Iowa, not knowing a thing about sports announcing. Then the station got to growing bigger and bigger, and they towed me along. Then came the national hookups, the big football games, the Joe Louis fights, the World's Series—and I kept telling myself I wasn't good enough and being so worried I didn't have much time for girls.

"Then one spring I came out to California to watch the Chicago Cubs in their spring training and a Warner Brothers' scout screen-tested me, and before I could say boo I was playing in pictures! As my dramatic experience was limited to a couple of plays with the Eureka College Dramatic Society, you can imagine how scared I was. I was afraid that any moment I'd be called before someone, be told it had all been a dreadful mistake and get canned. It wasn't till 'Brother Rat' that I began to be sure of myself. And that's when I sort of started to take real notice of Jane. Oh, I'd seen her around, but I'd never thought much about her. When we were shooting 'Rat' I kept finding myself unconsciously on the lookout for her."

"Did she take to you at once?"

"Heck, no. She thought I was a snob. You see, I've got to wear specs because I'm so darned far-sighted I can't see anything less than a hundred yards away without 'em. Well, a couple of times I'd forgotten my glasses and had walked by Jane without so much as a cool 'hiya,' and for a while I was just plain poison to her.

"Then we both worked late one day, and we bumped into each other going home. I knew she hadn't had dinner so I suggested we have it together. I got to like her at once. So naturally at work the next day I suggested a return engagement and got an immediate booking. Then I found myself dating her every chance I got.

WHEN we finished the picture we were both in the mood for a long spree of dining and dancing and staying up till dawn. We'd both been working hard and needed a little bit of tooting around. I never had a serious thought about it.

"I think I began to realize I was in love when Jane went off to Santa Barbara with friends for a week-end and left me alone. I thought the world had come to an end. When she returned forty-eight hours later, I felt twenty years older. Soon after that we both got a chance to go on a personal appearance tour with Louella Parsons. Those weeks together cinched it. I was crazy in love and didn't care who knew it."

Jane, beside being wife and mother and actress in her own right, is now a combination of agent, business manager and publicity man for Ronnie. Given half a chance she is sure to tell you about her husband. He likes comfortable old things, so periodically Jane has to browbeat him into going to the tailor's and getting new clothes. If Ronnie thinks that nice banker-grey flannel in the corner is just the thing, not ostentatious and just right, Jane will tell the salesman in definite, firm tones that what the husband wants is a Glen Urquhart plaid and draped, please, to show off that manly chest.

The only thing that is Ronnie's domain without question is a threadbare armchair and ottoman that sits in a corner of the Reagan living room. The room itself is a decorator's item in dubonnet and yellow, and the sight of the faded, decrepit chair is a bit of a shock. But it's Ronnie's chair, and the earnest plea of no decorator is going to get it out, color scheme or no color scheme. As a matter of fact Jane tried once to get it recovered, just recovered—and had to call up to get it back untouched lest the master of the house really get angry.

This display of temperament and stubbornness, this evidence that Ronnie has a very definite mind of his own, is just what Jane is cultivating in her lord and master—and if it means a dirty old chair in the living room, why, so be it.

As we said, the Reagans now have a child, Maureen Elizabeth, eight months old. For the public enlightenment, it might just as well be given out that Maureen is the spittin' image of mother Jane, with the same wide, curved forehead and the same charming nose. Dad just beams at her. If you ask the he-man if he wouldn't have preferred a boy, he gives you an emphatic "no."

"You know, the nice thing about having a girl is that you have a sort of picture of the girl you married, the girl you're in love with as a child and a young girl —you kind of watch her grow up. I know it's silly, but it gives you a kick."

RONNIE doesn't have any old-fashioned prejudices about his wife working. "I think the trouble usually comes from people resenting each other's success," he says. "This is especially true of actors. As for us, I can honestly say we share in one another's success, and we have fun talking about our work to each other."

The Reagans are both crazy about their work. Every so often they will get a yen to do the town, but mostly they spend their evenings in the movie houses. The big problem of their life is trying to find a picture they have not seen. The good ones they see two or three times (they love to watch the technique of a swell job of film-making), and the Bing Crosby pictures they see four or five times. Jane is an ardent fan of Bing's. (She owns every record he ever made.) Ronnie's pet enthusiasm is George Murphy, and at the last telling he had seen "A Girl, A Guy and A Gob" only three times less than Lord Beaverbrook has seen "Destry Rides Again," which, we are told, is thirty-seven.

The Reagans are sensible folk. They live on an allowance, and what they don't actually need goes smack into the bank every week and no nonsense. It makes it a little easier that Jane and Ronnie both work and they admit it. Those weeks when one or the other is on layoff, why, there's just that much less money to go into the bank.

The reason for all this saving is the new home they're building. Right now the Reagans live in a penthouse apartment off the Sunset Strip, but they are waiting for the day when their new house is ready for the moving in. Ronnie broke another precedent when he elected to build in Beverly Hills rather than the Valley where men's men are supposed to live these days. Doing the unexpected gives him a kick.

As for the future, it is right here in pictures. They are in his blood, and he knows of nothing so important or so much fun. The only thing that may get in the way is the United States Cavalry. Ronnie is a Second Lieutenant in the Cavalry Reserves, and he may be called

"I don't care if you never come home!"

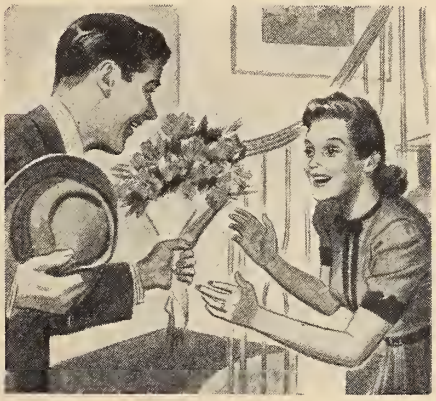
HOW A YOUNG WIFE OVERCAME THE "ONE NEGLECT" THAT WRECKS SO MANY MARRIAGES



1. I thought my husband was all to blame. He'd been leaving me home alone night after night. Our once-blissful marriage seemed headed for the rocks. I was almost frantic.

2. In despair, I went to see my sister-in-law—Sarah's been so happily married for years. When I told her about our troubles, she said: "You may be the guilty one, Sis. Often a husband's love grows cold just because a wife is careless —or ignorant—about feminine hygiene. It's one neglect few husbands can forgive."

3. "My own marriage was once in danger," Sarah said, "until my doctor set me right. He advised 'Lysol' for intimate personal care. He told me it does more than cleanse and deodorize. Being an efficient germicide, 'Lysol' kills millions of germs instantly on contact, and without discomfort to you."

4. I understand now why so many thousands of modern women rely on "Lysol" for feminine hygiene. It's gentle—yet so effective. And costs so little to use. I'll never risk losing my husband again. Yes, he comes home now—and brings me flowers!

Check this with your Doctor

"Lysol" is NON-CAUSTIC—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. EFFECTIVE—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). SPREADING—"Lysol" solutions spread and virtually search out germs in deep crevices. ECONOMICAL—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. LASTING—"Lysol" keeps full strength indefinitely no matter how often it is uncorked. CLEANLY ODOR—disappears after use.

up for active service any day. Not that he is grudging in his willingness to go. Anything but. It may give the studio bosses nightmares to picture one of their brighter hopes spending one full year in maneuvers in the gentle way of the cavalry, but if the truth be told, Ronnie would love it if it were not for that year of separation from Jane and Maureen. Ronnie has always soft-pedaled talk of his commission in the cavalry because the studio would get frightened. The cavalry's idea of a ride is not a gentlemanly canter on a smooth bridle-path. What they like is a snorting, spirited charger that cannot stand still and a terrain that is uneven, hilly and full of hidden brooks. The cavalry loves those plunges down practically perpendicular ravines, those lunges across rivers that have swollen dangerously overnight. The cavalry has a way of seeing to it that army post hospitals do not contain too many empty beds!

Some chaps who possess one tired old mare take so many horsey pictures you get the idea they themselves sup on oats and mash. But Ronnie doesn't talk about his riding ability. When he was making "Santa Fe Trail" there was a scene that called for dangerous, tricky riding, and Ronnie was anxious to do it. But when they were ready to shoot it, there was a double ready for the take. Ronnie begged to do the scene himself. "We won't hear of it," he was told. "You might get hurt and hold up production. Besides this calls for really expert riding."

Characteristically, Ronnie said all right and let the matter drop. The next day he had to go to cavalry practice and they had a pretty hectic drill. Seven riders were hospitalized, and the way the troop rode made that scene in "Santa Fe Trail" look like a slow motion study of equitation for a middle-aged ladies' riding class.

But Ronnie is not going to make a fuss because they won't let him ride a horse. If he ever does get temperamental, you can bet that last dollar it will be over something worth getting temperamental about. When you love making movies the way Ronnie does and you plan to spend your life in the industry, you're bound to be a little sensible. "I'll spend my life in pictures whether as an actor or what have you," he says. It looks like he'll have a long time before he gets into the "what have you" class because his future as an actor is brighter and more promising than ever. For his work in "Santa Fe Trail" he got a real part opposite Priscilla Lane in "Million Dollar Baby," and the preview audiences were so enthusiastic that he was given the lead in the picturization of the best-seller, "King's Row," which promises to be one of Warners' extra-specials.

So it begins to look as though, in spite of himself and his modesty, people are beginning to find out about this guy Reagan. He'll never be found tooting his own horn, but from now on a lot of people are going to do it for him.

present. I had a yearning to have all the floors covered in white because I think there's nothing like it to set off a woman's gown. I had white rugs in my apartment in London, but most of the mud on our guests' feet was off by the time they trailed upstairs to our door. Whereas, here they step straight in from the garden and leave the carpet looking as though horses had been led over it! The young men got so inhibited about my white carpets they wouldn't even come inside and took to saying good night to me on the front porch. In fact, we thought some of having paper slippers at the door. Just the other day," Greer laughed, "the tea wagon lost a wheel and dumped tea, cake and cucumber sandwiches all over the snowy rugs. The only person who enjoyed that accident was the local cleaner!

"Everything I do now," said Greer, "seems a pleasure. Even going to Adrian's for a fitting is fun. When I first arrived in Hollywood, I had a trunkful of gloomy black shoes and gowns. Now I go in for brilliant scarlets and jade greens in the daytime, white at night and glass ornaments and frivolous lacy gloves calculated to make a man want to kiss my hand. Believe it or not, I've even designed some of those insane hats I wear!

"I'm using make-up with a wanton hand. The other night as I was going out, Mother stopped me, her eyes bulging as if she had seen a zombie. 'Greer, what's come over you? Look in the mirror.' I looked and beheld something resembling a clown! I'd been so fascinated with the make-up we used for Technicolor that I'd bought some of the blue lights for my own dressing table at home. The blue lights had such a dimming effect on make-up that I put gobs of it on. But when I walked out into the brighter lights, all I needed was a pink satin skirt and a hoop to jump through!

"I've become frightfully hair-conscious, too. I used to part it on the side, give it fifty strokes and let it go at that. Now I try a new hair-do every day. My new picture is responsible for that. It covers a period of thirty-five years, requiring a different hairdress for each era. It sort of got me!

"I take trips to Arrowhead Springs and go back to my girlhood wading in brooks and doing all those crazy things. I get a kick out of going to parties, especially intimate dinner parties and baby showers.

"I'm happy because I'm working myself to the skin and bone. I'm up at dawn and at the studio at eight. I never have more than twenty minutes for lunch and even then, there are bangs to be curled and dresses to be pressed and fitted. During the afternoon I try to call the house and check on dinner and messages, and I always plan to write letters between scenes. Charlotte, my secretary, sits all day with pencil poised ready to take them down, but I never get farther than 'Darling Eva—' My long-distance shopping on the sets is just as unsuccessful. I have things sent out from the Hollywood shops and back they go, unopened! I'm home by nine o'clock but never have time to read murder mysteries or work crossword puzzles. I don't suppose we've had guests for dinner more than a couple of times a year. We just don't have the time! One thing I insist on, and that's spending at least twenty minutes out of every day alone to think things over and completely relax. I guess it's the Oriental in me!

"And in these ways," Greer said, "I have changed. It's because I'm happy that amusing things happen to me; happiness is a magnet for merriment."

so, when seven long months rolled by and Joan was still making the weary rounds, running through her repertoire of impersonations. But Director William Wellman finally broke the ice with a part in "Men With Wings."

You may remember seeing Joan after that in "Winter Carnival," "High School," "Two Thoroughbreds," "Nancy Drew, Reporter," "Susan and God"—all small parts, of course, but big enough to intrigue Warner execs. They tested her, signed her for six months, rechristened her Joan Leslie and let her mature slowly but steadily in "High Sierra," "The Wagons Roll at Night," "The Great Mr. Nobody" and "Thirty Days Hath September."

One good boost was all Joan needed at this point to bring stardom. And alert Warner publicity hawks paved the way by grabbing a Heaven-sent chance to match her against Paramount's Veronica Lake in a contest sponsored by Southern California's All-Year Club to find a "Sun Goddess." Joan won hands down, as you know, and the tidal wave of publicity that followed lapped from coast to coast convinced Warners that they had a new star.

NATURAL and unaffected as any normal, well-bred high-schooler, Joan violates Hollywood's tradition of Kleig-dazzled eccentricity by living modestly with her reunited family in a small Burbank home near the Warner studio. Though film roles have schooled her in realistic love-making, she's never been kissed off screen, still has her first date ahead of her. Studio school—the four daily hours that California requires—and dramatic lessons keep Joan's perky nose to the grindstone. And for relaxation, she has a healthy, 16-year-old preference for horseback riding, tennis, ping pong and bowling.

Clothes are not a major problem yet. Joan's mature and lovely 5′ 4″ and 120 pounds permit dress and shoe-swapping with her two pretty sisters, red-haired Mary (also under contract to Warners) and Betty, who wants to sing in radio. Newest additions to her wardrobe are two pinafore dresses, a red party frock and a gold-buttoned military suit on which she's sewn the honorary insignia recently given her by the West Coast Air Corps.

More important to Joan than clothes or the flattering stacks of fan mail that have begun pouring in from all unbombed parts of the world (one came from Australia addressed simply: "Joan Leslie, U. S. A.") is achieving Bette Davis stature as a real actress. And that's more than just a dream shared by a million other embryo Bernhardts. Joan means it—with all the magnificent, sincere fervor of 16. If ambition, real talent and an eager willingness to work hard mean anything, you can expect her to be thanking someone for an Oscar three or four years from now!

GLORIFY YOUR HAIR

you may need an additional rinsing and soaping, but generally two latherings are enough. Rinse your hair repeatedly in clear water until every vestige of soap is removed and your hair fairly squeaks as you pull it through your fingers.

You can give your hair added lustre and sheen with a rinse. There are any number of flattering, inexpensive vegetable rinses for you to use whether you have blonde, brunette, red or white hair. They're absolutely harmless and can be washed off with your next shampoo.

The way you dry your hair affects its texture and softness, so don't leave it to dry by itself. First, remove excess moisture by rubbing it with a towel for a few minutes. Then remove all tangles with a coarse-toothed comb and brush it to its length with a firm-bristled brush. Shake it out and dry it in the sunshine or open air, if possible.

If you haven't been blessed with naturally curly locks, you can get the next thing to it with a really good permanent wave. Even if your hair has a slight curl of its own, you'll save many hours of needless fussing with your hair if you get the ends permanented. These take only a few curls which, of course, aren't as expensive as a complete wave.

If you start bargain-hunting for your permanent wave, you may end up with frizzled, dull hair that'll take months to restore to its natural bloom. Go to a beauty operator in whom you have confidence—even if the price is a little higher than those named by cut-rate places. You'll get your money's worth in a long-lasting, natural looking wave because reliable beauty shops use good materials and take extra time and precautions.

Before your hair is waved, insist that a test curl be made so that the operator will know how tightly your hair should be wound and the material and requirements for your particular texture of hair. He or she will also be able to suggest the type of curl that will be more suitable to you—the croquinole type (where the hair is wound from the ends toward the scalp) or the spiral type (where the winding starts at the roots of the hair) or a combination of both. The spiral wave is usually best for long loose waves and the croquinole gives short hair soft springy curls.

Generally a permanent wave is slightly drying, so if you want yours to be successful, be sure that your hair has plenty of elasticity and health before your wave—and that it receives special care afterward. Medium coarse, healthy hair takes to permanent waving like a duck to water, and fine and soft hair can be beautifully waved if it is done with care. But it's almost impossible to insure a good, natural-looking wave with hair that is broken, over-stretched, dry and in generally bad condition.

If your hair is dry and brittle, begin at least three weeks before your permanent to bring it back to normal. Brush vigorously upward and outward every night for at least ten minutes. Then massage your scalp for three minutes with pomade or an oily lotion or tonic that will give your hair elasticity and lubrication. A hot oil treatment before every weekly shampoo will also help to restore your hair to resiliency.

AFTER your wave, your locks need attention if you want them soft and natural. Don't worry about brushing out your wave. It can't be done with a good one, so keep up your 100 hair strokes per night to make your wave lovelier. Apply brilliantine and pomade to the ends to keep them soft. Continue the massage and hot oil treatments to keep your scalp healthy. Use pins, curlers, wave set lotions, hair pins and cream wave sets to train your hair so you'll look like a natural-born curly top!

You can keep fly-away locks smooth and well-groomed when motoring, playing tennis or the like by wearing a net that matches your own hair. Nets are available in either hair or silk and come in every possible shade of natural hair color.

No matter what your hair style or whether you prefer to wear your tresses straight or curly, your hair needs to be clean, healthy and glossy. Many a plain Jane has won herself a reputation of glamour girl because of her beautiful hair resulting from faithful daily care.

No matter how entrancing your new hair style, it won't get the admiration it deserves if your hair is flecked with dandruff particles. You can get rid of this unlovely and dangerous scalp condition by using Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo frequently. It penetrates clogged-up pores and cleanses the scalp healthfully and thoroughly of dead tissue and dirt, giving the natural oil glands a chance to function as they should. Try Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo today for lovelier, dandruff-free hair.

Untidy, straggling locks and hair-dos that won't stay up are decidedly unglamorous, so tuck your rolls, side locks and the like firmly in place with Grip-Tuth combs. The teeth in these unusual combs are elliptical and hollow, specifically designed to grip hair tightly, and the combs themselves are curved to fit the head and come in varying sizes and colors. You can buy Grip-Tuth combs at your local syndicate store.

For waves that are soft, lasting and natural looking, try Lady York Wave Set. It's easy to use and can be applied to either dry or moist hair, leaving your waves with a beautiful lustrous sheen without a trace of flake or dust. Because it dries so quickly, it's just the thing for a rush job of hair setting.

A complexion that is lovely to look at requires frequent and thorough cleansing, so why not try "Hollywood Extra" Theatrical Cold Cream? Made of the purest of ingredients, it spreads easily and liquefies at body temperature to give your skin a thorough yet gentle cleansing, removing every trace of old make-up and dirt. You can use it as lavishly as you wish without feeling extravagant, for it costs only 25 cents for a ½-pound tin.

THE COUNTESS EXPLAINS . .

night from a date, somehow I'd find myself on the telephone calling up Oleg to tell him about it. I used to rout him out in the middle of the night. He was always polite, but," grins the Countess most charmingly, "when we moved into this house—it was his, you know—I found a long letter he'd written bawling me out for disturbing his sleep. He hadn't mailed it.

"He's wonderfully poised and polished, he's artistic, and he's terribly intelligent—at least, I think so. But above all, when I talk to him he understands. I've known lots of men I could love—but no one I thought I could both love and talk to and have him understand. He's also my best friend, I can depend on him. That's pretty important to me. Oh, hello, darling, you back?"

Oleg is indeed back and still smiling. He carries scotch and sodas. He is a wiry, well-knit man of twenty-eight with long, thick black hair and a thin aristocratic face. "Did you hear how Gene met the menace from Venice?" he chuckles. It was at a Hollywood party, rather a formal affair, those eight months or so ago. Gene was with one of her current suitors, and Oleg was with an Earl Carroll girl. Just why isn't quite clear, but he infers the Carroll belle was a little out of place. When after dinner she disappeared into the kitchen and returned with a can of beer and a banana which she placidly sipped and gulped among all the guests—well—he wandered. He ran right into Gene.

"I was in a mood," interrupts Gene here. "I was unhappy. I wasn't having a good time. And suddenly this dark man was smiling at me and saying. 'You look like a lady. In fact, you look like the first lady I've seen in Hollywood.'"

Gene said she hoped she was. Whereupon the Count introduced himself, admired her dress, her jewelry, her coiffure and everything in general. Pretty soon the bad mood was a thing of the past. That is technique.

They saw each other the next night, and the next—but Gene had a social calendar at that point which looked like a debutante's time table. All the eager Beau Brummels of movieland stretched out in a long line—Burgess Meredith, John Swope, Tim Durant, Bentley Ryan, Barron Polan—a dozen more.

"I had to write her a letter to tell her I loved her," smiles Oleg.

"And I had to call Oleg up every night to find some one to talk to," confesses Gene. "I broke a date for a New Year's party and a lot of others just to talk to Oleg. But I couldn't break them all."

Now, when love on a telephone and mail-man basis can blossom to the point of elopement in Hollywood, in competition with all the romantic divertissements of that glamorous pleasure trove, that would seem pretty much the real thing. It did just that—one rainy night when both Oleg and Gene thought they were pretty sure about things.

They drove out to the airport in one of those rainstorms that broke a fifty-year record in Hollywood this spring. Paul Mantz, Hollywood's flying Cupid, shook his head. The weather got damper and damper and cooler and cooler.

"So did our courage," smiles Oleg. "Then we had a leetle—what you say?—spat."

Now, perhaps the most healthy sign about all this Cassini-Tierney romance is that it has had its ups-and-downs. The course of true love you know. Theirs didn't run any smoother than the rest. It's not flowing along gently like Sweet Afton at this point, either, if you take in the Tierney clan tantrums.

The "leetle spat" is an understatement. It ended up in one of those never-again things, and the blackest mark against Gene Tierney's professions of love-from-the-start is that she upped and got herself romantically involved with Robert Sterling, a very charming young Hollywood actor. Gene was mad enough, or let us say, Bob was attractive enough to get them to the point of an elopement. At least there were strong rumors, and I eventually prod the Countess into a reluctant statement like this, "I don't know. I didn't know what I wanted. I wasn't sure at all. I was mixed up. And Oleg was already running around with some, some—gal!"

"I loved only Gene," states Oleg gallantly. "But she left me; she went to New York."

"I always go to New York when I'm confused," replies Gene.

I don't want to start something. I change the subject.

"Oh," Gene's round face cracks with a beatific smile. "The way we got together again? It was typical. You see, I got back from New York, and I went right out to a party. Everybody was dancing, and I couldn't think of anything but dancing with Oleg. But he wasn't there. So—" the Countess glances a bit archly at her spouse, "I went right to the telephone and called him up. I said, 'You're such a wonderful dancer. Please come on over and dance with me.' And he said—"

"'—No thanks!'" laughs Oleg. "That's the way, you see? Be indifferent. Only I wasn't."

"He was, too," contradicts Gene consigning another lengthy billet doux to the wastebasket.

"I wanted a church wedding." Gene sighs. "I wanted all my friends and my family there. Flowers, bridesmaids, train, champagne and everything. But—then my family started acting up."

Gene was living with her mother in Hollywood. Her father, Brother Butch, a Harvard student, and Sister Pat, in school in Virginia, have never met Oleg to this day. Only Mrs. Tierney has.

"I told Mother I knew I had found the right man," says Gene wistfully. "She always liked Oleg until she thought I was going to marry him. Then—"

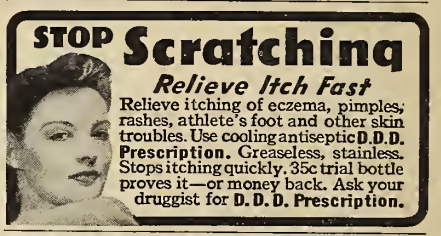
"The temperature dropped," smiles the Count.

"I wrote my dad, too. We've always been awfully close. Dad's always been just like a boy friend. I wouldn't dream of putting anything over on my family. But they insisted on treating me like a silly child and—well—I'm not!"

WHAT Mr. Tierney wrote back was a tactful, fatherly letter suggesting that they postpone any rash action until fall. Gene replied that it wasn't rash action; she'd never been surer of herself. And that she could see through their stalling tactics. Then Papa T. wired her to come home at once. The battle was on.

Well, it waxed and waned for a spell. Brother Butch was readied to fly out from Harvard with a family ultimatum. "But I stopped that!" says Gene. Mama Tierney sided with her husband, and it was Gene versus the home team. "There is just a family complex about my getting married, that's all," Gene is thinking aloud. "It wasn't Oleg they disapproved of, just the idea of letting any man have me. Of course," she adds, "that's natural, especially since they've always doted pretty much on me. I'm the first child to marry. So I didn't blame them for that. But I do for not getting over it. After all, Mother was engaged three times before she got married. And she was just as young as I am."

Gene had almost a month to think things over after the family fireworks began. She never changed her mind—except about the wedding ceremony itself. With the family state of mind what it was, a wedding with all the trimmings was out of the question. It had to be an elopement or there'd be all sorts of scenes. So they did it as quietly as possible. They simply hopped a regular airliner to Las Vegas. It was in between retakes on Gene's first starring role, "Belle Starr." They sat across the aisle from each other as if they had never met before in their lives. Gene buried her nose in a book, and Oleg stared down at the clouds. "We had an hour and a half in the air for any last minute regrets," Gene is relating, "and the only one that popped up was the slight regret that I had to go and get airsick!"



The incognito wasn't quite so successful. When they alighted in Las Vegas, an airline official tipped his cap. "Hello, Miss Tierney," he grinned. Gene said she wasn't any such thing, but the flight man just went right on grinning.

"My name's Tierney," he said, "and I've made a point of following your career. You can't fool me. Congratulations." It was about the only congratulations Gene and Oleg got.

A justice of the peace married them. Gene dressed, she says, "like a campfire girl" with a ratty old skirt. Young Lochinvar attired in a gabardine sports suit.

That night Gene made the supreme bid for her mother's good wishes. Instead of going with her husband, she went home to her mother. "I thought it would make her feel better about the whole thing," Gene explains to me, "but when I got home, she wasn't there!"

Now the funny part of all this Tierney family cold shoulder is that at first it wasn't quite that way. According to Gene and the Count, there was no hint of the frigidaire when they sent off the good news to the folks.

Oleg's phone call to Mrs. Tierney was quite a shock, of course, but she rallied, saying that if Gene was happy, she had her blessings. "Gene is a sensible girl," Mrs. T. told her new son-in-law. "I know she must have good reasons for this."

And the note Gene sent on to her Dad in New York got an answer like this:

DARLING YOUR LOVELY LETTER RECEIVED. I THINK YOU WILL AGREE I HAVE NEVER LACKED UNDERSTANDING OF YOU. YOUR HAPPINESS WILL ALWAYS BE MY JOY. WRITING FULLY. LOVE. DAD

What inspired the sudden change of family heart? I gather that it is still something of a mystery to Gene and Oleg. They have not heard from the Tierneys all huddled now in the East.

He says, "There is a complete silence." She says, "All I know is what I read in the papers. But I don't believe half of that."

What Gene, as well as everyone else, reads in the papers, are things various indignant Tierneys have told reporters, or are supposed to have told them. Like: "Gene has gone Hollywood, I'm afraid . . ." and "Gene is just a misguided child . . . she has been carried away by this suave man of the world . . ." Also paternal hints that Nevada wedding laws are being looked into for annulment proceedings.

ABOUT these pretty definite opinions Gene tells me: "I don't think Dad said them. But if he did, he hasn't meant them the way they appeared. My parents had a chip on their shoulder about my coming to Hollywood in the first place. Naturally you can get a lot of support about Horrible Hollywood around New York. There's only one side. I intend to rise above it until everyone has met Oleg and gotten to know him. We're going to Washington later. There are some parties planned there for us. I suppose we'll go on to New York. But that's in such a distant future. Right now, Sir, we're on our honeymoon. How do you like the honeymoon house?"

Well, it's quite a place. It's high up in a Beverly Hills canyon, smothered by oaks and vines. It was Oleg's bachelor heaven before the elopement. The confusion which surrounds us is just bachelordom moving out and matrimony in. Already, though, the woman's touch has produced small miracles. So Gene leads us proudly around the rambling place, which she says she'll do over in Early American antiques with loads and loads of chintz.

"The Connecticut hangover," she grins.

There are a couple of items more which might as well be cleared up before we leave the happy couple. First, before Gene and Oleg flew to the altar, they trotted down to an old beau of Gene's, Attorney Bentley Ryan, and had him draw up an agreement waiving all rights to community property. That was Oleg's idea. Just in case someone cracked (as they have) that he was nothing but a fortune hunter.

Second—about the "Count" business. In two months Count Cassini will get his final U. S. citizenship papers. Then he'll no longer be a Count, and Gene can be plain Mrs. Cassini. That ought to settle pretty definitely any title hunting ideas about her.

As for Gene Tierney and her very flourishing career: She has just wound up "Belle Starr," which should live up to it's title for Gene from all reports. And while we talk, the telephone jingles every ten seconds about her part in "Sundown" coming next at Walter Wanger's. In fact, it rings so much that Oleg sighs— "A fine honeymoon! Serves me right for marrying a movie star!" He's kidding, of course.

But I'm pretty certain the Countess Gene Eliza Tierney Cassini is definitely not, when she bids me good-bye at the door. I have a hunch the family feud will be clearing up, maybe before this gets in print, and say so.

"I hope you're right," replies Gene Tierney, and there's a wistful catch in her voice. But her eyes are pretty steady. "This isn't the way I want it. I love my family, and it hurts me that they won't understand. But there's something they've just got to realize."

She presses her husband's hand.

"They've got to realize," repeats Gene, "that now I've got a family of my own!"

GOOD NEWS

THEY'RE IN THE ARMY NOW

We aren't going to mention any names, but there are lots of young featured actors who had to leave their juicy weekly salaries to enter military service long before it was absolutely necessary. It was their own fault, though. During the past few years, when these boys were working in pictures with army, navy or air corps backgrounds, they chummed around with the service men on location. After a few beers and listening to glowing descriptions of life in uniform, they signed up as reserve members in everything from the National Guard to the Native Daughters of the Golden West Drill Team. Came the draft, and the boys had their names right up there in front. The only one who can sympathize with them is "Oomphie Annie" Sheridan. She was made an honorary officer in a New Zealand fighting division two years ago and last week was ordered to report for active duty at once!

AGE BEHIND BEAUTY

After nosing about the huge indoor set at Sam Goldwyn's studio where William Wyler is transferring "The Little Foxes" onto celluloid, we can only report that Bette Davis, in the pompadour and velvets of Regina Giddens, has never been lovelier. One of her biggest problems, she admitted to us with plenty of those nervous Davis gestures, has been make-up. "A 40-year-old woman," she explained, "is one of the hardest ages to portray. You don't look old and you don't look young. And you can't pad yourself to add on a few years." (Bette's 32.) To make sure she looks right for the cameras, Bette's been getting up at 5 every morning to dash out to Warners for personal attention from Perc Westmore. It isn't make-up, however, that gives her that middle-aged veneer—it's all done by special lighting effects worked out by cameraman Gregg Toland, who did those miraculous things in "Citizen Kane."

WIG WAG

If Orson Welles never makes another picture, he can still afford caviar and hand-tucked silk shirts for the rest of his life. All he has to do is say "yes" to the offers he's had to turn talent scout. Every one of the actors he introduced to the screen in "Citizen Kane" has been snapped up by studios for future film work, and Everett Sloan rates the honor of being the first member signed to a long term contract. Sloan had to shave his entire head for his part as Kane's manager, so during production he ordered a beautiful, bright-red hair-piece for social use to save wear and tear on his family's aesthetic sense. The first day he went to the beach he caused a sensation. He found that his carrot-colored topper was as eye-compelling as no hair at all, and every time he stood up, he felt like a stand-in for an airport beacon. Finally, the once-in-a-lifetime chance to jolt the gapers out of their skins proved too enticing. Jumping to his feet, he let out a cry that had years of Mercury Theatre experience behind it and ripped the annoying hair-piece from his head in one sweeping gesture! According to lifeguards' reports that day, the "scalping" was responsible for more collapses than sunstroke!

tailed him for a few blocks, then caught up with him. Worriedly, Gene pulled over as a bull-shouldered individual strolled over and stuck his head in the window. "You're Gene Autry, aren't you?" he demanded. Meekly Gene admitted the charge. "Well," said the officer, "will you tell me when in Heaven's name Shirley Ross is gonna have her baby?" Turned out the chap's name was Patrick Dolan, head of Hudson County's police force —and uncle of Ken Dolan who is, as you know, Shirley's husband! . . . Gene, incidentally, who's busy looking for a spot around Los Angeles to stage that Fall rodeo starring most of Hollywood's outstanding cowboys, hasn't lost any of his b.o. appeal. Not long ago, he started to fly out for a personal appearance at the Detroit News Carriers Convention, was grounded by bad weather. When he didn't show up in Des Moines, delegates stuck his saddle (which had come out ahead by train) onto a horse, put Gene's name on it in big letters and put it right at the head of the convention parade.

PAIR OF JACKS

Picking bona fide topnotch material out of Hollywood's current crop of white hopes is ticklish business at any time. Some swim in like cosmic nebulae under their own talented steam and take up permanent residence in the film galaxy. Others explode in a cloud of cooked-up publicity, end up in somebody's cocktail-hour reminiscences. Definitely in the former category are newcomers John Sutton and Jack Carson. John is deservedly headed for a big build-up after that fine supporting job you'll see him do in Twentieth Century's "Yank in the R.A.F." Though his biogs list John as an Orange, N. J., boy, he was really born in India, son of a British army officer. It was a cautious press agent who persuaded him to give the Garden State as his native locale, advising that American film-goers were surfeit with Thespian John Bullers . . . As for Carson, his stock is booming after stand-outs in "Navy Blues," "Love Crazy" and "New Orleans Blues" now in the making. Talked up as a possible team-mate for Jim Cagney, after that dilly of a job in "Strawberry Blonde," Jack's being considered for a "Male Animal" lead. An ex-vaudevillian, he once worked on a construction gang, sold pants hangers. His Signal Oil radio program, aired over 38 West Coast stations, has a higher rating than Fred Allen's.

FRED ASTAIRE'S "THREE LETTERS FROM LONDON"

gas and everything else that has been thought of.

Personally, I believe that after a feint attack farther north he will probably go out for Dover, Folkstone and Deal. He has the long range batteries on the French coast for covering fire, then he may use a path between mines and submarines for his fleet transports, thousands of dive bombers may try and keep our heads down and batter the tank traps flat, and parachutists may try and knife us in the back.

He is apparently quite happy to lose a million men trying it, and he may be able to get considerable force loose on the island, and enormous damage may be done before they are rounded up. We, of course, have got quite a number of new tricks to come out of the bag on the day, and our handicap has been coming steadily down since Dunkirk!

It's going to be a pretty little tea party once it starts, but we are all ready for it and can't start too soon for our liking. Once we have given them a first class tricking up here and sent them packing, Hitler will probably try and sit back inside the land he has already conquered and defy anyone to throw him out. We have an answer to that, too!

God! I am so longing to get back to sunny California. If I ever do, I shall never again find anything to complain about. Now I come to think of it, it is a marvelous life. Lots of friends, wonderful climate, a good contract, golf, skiing (water and snow) and innumerable flagons of rum at the Beachcombers.

Believe me, I shall be on the first boat (after the mines have all been swept up) after the war, and if war breaks out again, I shall pretend I was never told about it. Fred, suppose I don't get back for a couple of years, do you think I'll have any chance of starting in where I left off? Sometimes, being so far away, the whole thing seems like a dream that never happened.

Because we may finish the actual fighting off in a year, it's going to take a long time to get things running smoothly again, and we shall probably be used as police for a long time after it is all over.

Anyway I hope it won't take too long as all this bombing has aged your old chum quite a bit—C. Aubrey Smith parts if it lasts much longer!!!

We had a troups concert the other night. Typical example of the wit from the Back Chat boys:

1. "I can't, you can't, Hitler can't."
2. "Can't what?"
1. "Milk chocolate."

I get very homesick every time I hear one of your records. Prim and I went to see "Top Hat" some little time back. Gosh, that was a swell picture. I am longing to see the one with Paulette. "The Dictator" is doing sensational business and breaking records everywhere. We have lost almost as many movie houses as we have churches through bombing, which is saying something!

Well, as housemaids say when they finish a letter—"I will close now—hoping this finds you as it leaves me." Best possible love to Phyl. God knows I miss you both terribly.

Yours aye,
DAVID.

LETTER NO. 2—

orchestra going full blast so you won't hear. So Foxie, Dotty, Greig and myself got in a car and middled down to Lansdowne House—where your little Delly (scared silly) lay on the floor in the corridor of Dotty's flat from 12 until the all-clear sound about 5:30 in the morning. Honestly, Fred, it was terrifying. Incendiary bombs fell on this roof, and on Berkeley Square a bomb went off before, and the lights went out. Those screaming bombs are the most maddening things. I have never heard anything like them. You know how I even hate to hear a stage gun go off—

I finally got into bed, being too stunned to venture out (just around the corner to here) where I'm parked. And anyway, it's no fun in a "blitz"—alone—it isn't fun at anytime, but you know how misery loves company. Those lice made a wreck of things in this part, Ritz, St. James, etc.—I guess it was a reprisal for our work in Berlin recently.

The way people in Britain work together in times such as these is too awe-inspiring! They put out incendiaries by the thousands! But to hear the drone of the Nazi bombers for eight hours without ceasing—is nerve-rending. Today all is going on as usual, people going about their work and you hear casual reference to the night's raid as "pretty bad"—"nasty night," etc.

It is peaceful at home but we do hear the Nazi planes flying over us on their way to bomb some poor unfortunate town. Poor Manchester took an awful beating. Passing through it to get to my train from the airport, I saw many saddening sights. The theatre that we played at when we last appeared here was wrecked and it is just a shell. It is rather thrilling being in London again despite the "Blitz." I love seeing everyone. Ann Hunloke lives near here, too, and looks so smart in her uniform. She is a clever girl. And she is so thrilled getting the Nylon stockings that Phyllis has been sending her.

I was supposed to go to the dentist today but I'm too jumpy to sit for teeth. Don't think I'll stay here long—but it has been so quiet for the last few weeks, I thought it would continue. Well so long and will write later—just wanted you to know about my first raid!!! And I hope my last. Love to Phyllis and you.

Your DELLY.

P. S. Fred darling, mother is still elated over receiving those parcels of dried fruit from California—it is marvelous. Food is going to be scarce here, so it is grand to have such luxuries. Bestest love to all. DELLY.

sounded. One fellow looked up and said: "The above have arrived."

I do think you will like this story. A party of children on the railway station waiting to be evacuated from London to Liverpool were very behaved, bar one who was very naughty. They got him on the train with plenty of trouble. Even on the train he was terrible. When they got to Liverpool they sent for a man to take care of him. The man said: "I think you are a most ungrateful child." The answer was: "Please, sir, I'm not a child. I'm a jockey and was on my way to Newmarket." I think that's pretty funny.

Went up to the West End last week to see some of the damage. Am sure if you were to see it now it would break your heart. Glass is all over the place. The —— and —— are both hit. Anderson and Shephards don't look very nice. It looked like they flew along every main street dropping bombs as they went. The —— just ain't there. You would not believe the wanton and wicked damage they have done. I can see the only safe place is a military object. —— is as flat as a pancake.

Could go on for weeks writing about different places bombed that you know. Just around the corner in Oxford street in —— road there is a hole in the middle of the road you could put your house in. There are many streets closed and it looks like they will be for some time to come. I can't imagine our flying men doing such terrible things and I certainly hope they don't.

We have plenty of guns near here, and what with them firing and bombs dropping, one can't get much sleep. I counted —— bombs coming down in less than five minutes one night. The fires light up the sky. I generally stay up late watching it all. But right now all are getting fed up so go to bed earlier. The streets are busy during the day but believe me at night they seem half empty. He can't make me run. In one way I wish he could.

It's just on three o'clock in the afternoon, and from my window I can see people going to the underground with all their bedding for the night. During the day down there blankets, etc., are there marking out different places that have been booked. Mother and father are very well, thank you. Yesterday they had only left the market when it was machine gunned. That's twice they have been lucky. Think I will close my letter now, wishing that you, Madam and the children are in the best of health. Do hope your mother is safe in California. Would write her a letter if I knew where she is living. Thanking you again, I am,

Yours very truly,
GEORGE.

feather bangs like Greer Garson's, bangs massed in ringlets and many other variations.

Then there are the new close-cropped hair styles that are casual and easy-to-manage and enchantingly feminine with their flattering ringlets and waves. Carole Landis wears a sleek, flattering coiffure of this type for evening. Una Merkel favors a slightly longer variation with ringlet top curls and a smooth roll behind her ears.

Smart coifs for girls with longish hair or hair that's growing out has always been a problem. Lynn Bari's flattering halo arrangement can be achieved if you have very long hair or a false braid to exactly match your own locks. Another brand-new style for evening is to bring the back hair up into a high coiled bun tied with a ribbon or accented with an ornament or flowers. Your front hair should be thinned and shaped so the coif can be softened with top-notch curls, puffy bangs or a pompadour.

Why not sit down and experiment with Hollywood's hair-dos, trying all the new rolls, curls and twists that make modern hair styles so lovely? They're not hard to do with all the inexpensive aids so

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

easily available everywhere—wave set lotions, hair lacquers, brilliantines, bob pins, curlers, tuck combs, hair pins and the like. When you find a style that suits you, let a professional hairdresser do the shaping and thinning so your hair will adapt itself more naturally to the coif you've chosen. If you have a thick, heavy bob, your hair will be particularly untractable and hard to arrange, so thin it out and shape it. You can make stubborn locks more obedient to your touch by nightly brushing, frequent shampooing and treatment with the special preparations that make hair softer.

Here are a few simple rules to guide you in selecting a flattering hair style:

If your face is a perfect oval (the ideal shape), be sure to keep your coiffure simple. Choose one that brings your hair off your temples and brows and emphasizes your oval contours.

If your face is round, you can add to its apparent length by building your hair full and soft above the ears with curls and waves following a curving vertical line. Avoid a severe hair style.

If your face is square, keep your hair soft and full at the sides of your face to soften the angle of your jaw. Loose fluffy waves will also offset angularity.

If your face is slender, you can achieve a more oval contour by a side part and by fluffing your hair at the sides to create width. Steer clear of top rolls and top-notch curls as they will accentuate the length of your face. Bangs are a flattering means of minimizing its length.

If you have a narrow forehead and broad jaw, brush your hair cleanly from your temples in an upward sweep and build width with curls or rolls. Keep all hair emphasis above the ears—and try a low side part to narrow your forehead.

But if you have a broad forehead and narrow chin, reverse the procedure. Keep your hair smooth on top, bringing the hair in slightly at the temples to minimize the width of the forehead. Then start your waves and curls just above the ears with fulness near the chin.

If you have a diamond-shaped face (narrow forehead and chin and prominent cheek bones), keep your hair fullness both above and below the ears, dressing the hair close at the cheekline.

If you have a large face with well-defined features, use large waves and curls to give your face better proportion. Don't dress your hair close to your head or your features will appear larger.

If you have a small face with delicate features, wear a soft, fluffy coiffure with small waves and curls and avoid hard, sculptured hair lines. A close hair-do will make your head appear too small.

Why not step out tomorrow in a new hair-do that will do things for you—emphasize your good points and minimize your poor ones? It's a tonic to the spirits, too! Take a tip from Hollywood and reframe your face this fall.

To make your hair really your crowning glory, try Halo Shampoo. Its creamy lather cleanses your hair and scalp thoroughly and removes the dulling film that conceals the natural brilliance of your locks. Halo Shampoo is neither sticky nor greasy, but leaves your hair soft as silk, ready to set beautifully in place. And it's equally good for normal, oily or dry hair of any color.

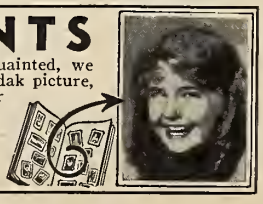
Buzz Meredith was back at Amherst. Though he speaks with pride of attending the place, he has always been publicly resentful of the school. For example, at Amherst young Meredith wanted to get into a fraternity. He was turned down. He was considered too eccentric. And then the final blow. He went out for the dramatic club. He was good, and he was accepted. But at the last minute he was ordered to quit by college authorities because his grades were too low!

That was the end of Amherst. Next our hero spent a semester at Saks-Fifth Avenue, New York, emoting in the fur department.



Finally he got around to acting. It happened like much else in Buzz Meredith's life—by inspiration. He was a sailor on a tramp freighter of the Munson Line. When the boat docked in South America, Buzz decided to skip. He was promptly and efficiently arrested, wrapped in irons and placed below. Finding the situation mildly boring, he amused himself by reciting aloud. He also acquired a taste for ham. Which were the proper symptoms. So he vowed to become an actor once and forever.

His apprenticeship may now be found in histories of the theatre. In December of 1929, with a letter of recommendation he wrote for himself, he became an understudy in Eva Le Gallienne's Civic Repertory Company. Since he received no pay, he moved in on his married sister. His first official role was in "Romeo and Juliet." He was the lowly servant to Juliet's nurse and he gasped one line. After that his career spiral twisted toward the summit. There was summer stock. Then suddenly there was mental champagne—the lead in Albert Bein's "Little Ol' Boy," wherein Meredith portrayed a reform school outcast. It was a smashing critical success. George Jean Nathan tucked away his arsenic and raved. And Stark Young, the acid, wrote, "Burgess Meredith . . . as near perfection as could be imagined. Worth a hundred performances up and down the town." For this Meredith was paid $225 a week. But the play ran exactly nine days!

IN 1934 our hero took on two jobs at the same time. He appeared on the stage in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street." And on the air for a chewing gum concern, he enacted Red Davis, typical (and according to Meredith—loathsome) young American boy. This dual employment involved complications. The curtain went up on the play each evening just as the radio show ended. Since the radio paid Buzz $350 per, he hired a private ambulance nightly at $15 to rush him to the footlights.

"In all my life," Meredith told me, "I never had an aversion compared to the healthy hate I had for playing Red Davis on the radio."

In fact, according to the story, one evening before his regular broadcast, Meredith wandered into a cocktail lounge and didn't wander out again. Red Davis didn't appear that night. Millions of American youngster went to sleep unhappy, Meredith retained a hangover—and the sponsor had to spend $60,000 explaining to America that their Red Davis was ill in bed.

And then came "Winterset," written by Maxwell Anderson and produced and directed by Katharine Cornell's brilliant husband, Guthrie McClintic. And staged by Jo Mielziner.

"It all began when I was playing 'Flowers of the Forest,'" explained Meredith. "Maxwell Anderson came backstage. He said he liked my work. He said he would write a play for me. And as it turned out, he wrote three, all prize-winners. The first, of course, was 'Winterset.' To Maxwell Anderson and to Guthrie McClintic, the greatest director in the entire world, I owe almost all my theatrical knowledge and my present position in the profession!"

Today, Meredith considers Mio in "Winterset" the best part he has ever done. But on the stage he said it was really tough. "Poetic lines by a lowly person—difficult to make realistic." He was starred for the first time, and he immediately bought himself a miniature camera, and when he thought no one was looking, photographed his name in front of the theatre!

Meredith's greatest thrill? When the curtain fell on the opening of "Winterset." As he wrote later:

"The shrieking audience, their bravos, the many curtains . . . ecstatic and thrilling and good for the famine of an actor's ego. Then the hysterical dressing room scenes! Judith Anderson, Tallulah Bankhead, McClintic, Anderson, dozens all rushing in, some crying, all moved, all sure of our success! I opened a bottle of brandy and we drank."

The film version of "Winterset" added up to ten weeks of Hollywood at $1,500 a week—ten weeks which have bled into five years.

Since that time much celluloid has gone under the bridge. Today Burgess Meredith is very frank and extremely modest about his cinema accomplishments.

"The first time I saw myself on the screen was in 'Winterset,' and that was a treat because it was a good picture." Meredith smiled. "The second movie was 'There Goes the Groom.' I was the first to enter for the preview, saw two reels and was the first to leave! Other of my pictures, I hasten to add, I have not seen. Nor do I wish to see them. They might discourage me sufficiently to drive me away from Hollywood for good!

"Some people are always saying they want to go back to the stage. I don't say that. I say I want to go where there are good words to speak and good lines to read. It makes no difference if the medium be stage, screen or radio for the artist. The challenge and the choice remains in written words. If you look at a sentence and say, 'Will I be able to do this well enough?'—you have a good line. But if you must say, 'How can I ever do this?'—you have a poor line and something to avoid, no matter the medium.

"Today, perhaps because of the war, I feel there isn't much fine language being written for the actor to read aloud. And if I must do mediocre stuff, I might as well do it where the gold is yellowest, and where I can make the best living. Which would be Hollywood. But there's no sense in being snobbish and saying the stage is better than the screen. Hell, I was just as satisfied with 'Of Mice and Men' on the screen as 'High Tor' on Broadway. So there you are."

During our conversation Meredith mentioned several of his leading ladies. I asked him for his favorite actress. He shook his finger at me.

"Oh, no, you don't. Not that question. Why, how can I possibly name my favorite actress? I'm such a pushover for each lady I play opposite—and I've played opposite so many—that the list would be too long to choose from, and even if I could, it would cause, er, slight complications."

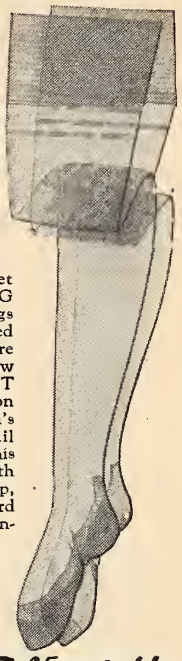
YET for all his leading ladies, Burgess Meredith has never mixed business with pleasure. His two marriages were both outside his immediate circle. Early in 1932, while performing in summer stock at Cape May, N. J., Meredith was married to the late Mrs. Helen Derby Berrien on the stage of the Straw Hat Theatre. He was the star of the show; she took tickets at the entrance. A week before "Winterset" opened in September of 1935, they were divorced.

The second venture took place four months later when Meredith fell in love with Margaret Perry and became her husband at Sneden's Landing in New York.

Having heard that currently he was escorting Olivia de Havilland and other cuties about town, I asked Meredith if he had matrimony in mind again. He emphatically did not!

"You know, of course, I've been married twice already," he said. "Well, obviously, I'm in no hurry for a third try. I have no romantic plans. Look, I've been a bachelor for two solid years now, and while it becomes boring at times, it's safe. Though you never can tell. Sometimes I get frightened when I think I'm too ripe for matrimony, and then I don't see a woman for weeks!"

Aside from entanglements with blondes and brunettes, Meredith has a great passion for flying. He doesn't fly much these days, because RKO doesn't trust his eccentric barrel rolls and loop-the-loops. But he swears he's a corking good pilot, and if he is drafted, as he may be soon, he hopes to go into the Air Corps.



"I also like reading," he confessed. "And I have the best collection of first editions of Yeats in the country.

"However, I'm not at all the pipe, dog and fireside type of person. I like to hang around pubs or clubs or taverns or cocktail bars. It's the people you meet—and gossip with!"

A very candid and a very frank guy, that Buzz Meredith, with a very honest estimate of himself. That's what I told you in the beginning. And now you've seen for yourself. "When I didn't have a dime for a cup of coffee, I knew it wasn't going to last— And now I'm not so sure this is going to last either." That's what he said. Remember? But, of course, now you know that's hooey. You know that Meredith man, like the talkies, is here to stay.

You August-ites are wonderful fun to know, but being married to you is like living with a barrell of TNT.

You have more moods than Garbo and a temper hotter than a Boyer love scene. What's more, you're a shameless flirt!

Funny thing is, you really adore your spouse, your home and your kids, but you have a horror of being labeled domesticized.

You gloat over a ticket for speeding and other minor run-ins with The Law, for they just confirm your conviction that you're quite a devil. You're endearingly childish and adore getting presents. Here's to a raft of them and a honey of a birthday!

"When I'm on a set, I remove my make-up many times daily with Hollywood Extra Theatrical Cold Cream. It is kind to my skin and it costs so little, I can use it lavishly."

LOIS RANSON, lovely young starlet best known for her fine work in "Cheers for Miss Bishop," now appearing in "Angels With Broken Wings."

"Hollywood Extra Theatrical Cold Cream cleanses so thoroughly and leaves my skin with such a satisfied feeling, soft and fresh. I love its delicate fragrance, too."

LENI LYNN, golden-voiced starlet appearing in "Babes in Arms" and "Angels With Broken Wings."

"I find Hollywood Extra Theatrical Cold Cream an ideal make-up remover and skin cleanser. It's so gentle and fragrant. What more could I get from costlier creams?"

CAROL ADAMS, whose lovely dancing and singing you see in "The Gay Vagabond" and "Sis Hopkins."

All the fine qualities of a costly cleansing cream!

The big, convenient tin of "Hollywood Extra" isn't for girls who love to pay for fancy packages. It was originally created expressly for studio "Extra" girls, to whom a good complexion is even more important than it is to a star. From the movie studios the great news about "Hollywood Extra" Theatrical Cold Cream spread to hundreds of thousands of women in all walks of life. Now it is sold in every city in the nation, and in most of the smaller towns, too! This generous half-pound tin of perfect cleansing cream gives your complexion exquisite care, without strain on the budget. Made from the purest ingredients, delicately scented, it liquefies at body temperature to give thorough yet gentle cleansing.

"Costs so little, you may use it lavishly"
THE RABIN COMPANY, LOS ANGELES

THE MAN WHO GAVE THE "EXTRA" GIRLS A BREAK...

Frequent make-up changes in the motion picture studios call for the lavish use of cleansing creams. Fancy packages don't count, but quality is most important, since a good complexion means everything to a film player. Eight years ago Allen Rabin, a leading Hollywood cosmetician, decided to produce a really fine theatrical cold cream that even an "extra girl," living on a slim budget, could afford to use lavishly. He gambled that not only Hollywood film folk, but women everywhere would buy a mass-produced, economically distributed tin of "Hollywood Extra" Theatrical Cold Cream, sensibly priced at 25c for a full half-pound. He was right! Today millions of women, who can afford the costliest creams have learned it's foolish to pay more.

UNITED ARTISTS STUDIO'S MAKE-UP EXPERT, BILL MADSEN, make-up supervisor for "Of Mice and Men," "Turnabout," "Topper Takes A Trip" and other great United Artists productions, says: "Extra girls must use lots of cleansing cream for frequent make-up changes, and its got to be of finest quality. "Hollywood Extra" Theatrical Cold Cream is a real quality product, popular on the lot with all players."

Even if you weren't Born to Beauty—

YOU'LL WIN HEARTS.. if your Smile is Right!

Your smile is a priceless asset. Help to keep it bright and sparkling with Ipana and Massage.

EVERY attractive woman isn't really pretty. Every movie darling isn't a classic beauty. But take to your heart this true observation—you can seldom find fault with their smiles.

So take hope, plain girl, take hope! Even if you weren't born to great beauty—you can have compliments, 'phone calls and dates. Make your smile the real, lovely YOU. And remember, healthy gums are important to a bright, sparkling, attractive smile.

If you've seen a touch of "pink" on your tooth brush—do the right thing today. See your dentist! His verdict may be that your gums have become sensitive because today's soft foods have robbed them of work. But don't take chances—let him make the decision. And if, like thousands of others, your dentist suggests Ipana and massage—take his advice and get Ipana at once.

For Ipana Tooth Paste not only cleans and brightens your teeth but, with massage, it is specially designed to help the health of your gums as well.

Try Ipana and Massage

Massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums every time you clean your teeth. That invigorating "tang" means circulation is quickening in the gum tissue—helping your gums to new firmness.

Get a tube of economical Ipana Tooth Paste at your druggist's today. Let Ipana and massage help keep your teeth brighter, your gums firmer, your smile more sparkling.

"A LOVELY SMILE IS MOST IMPORTANT TO BEAUTY!"

say beauty editors of 23 out of 24 leading magazines

Recently a poll was made among the beauty editors of 24 leading magazines. All but one of these experts said that a woman has no greater charm than a lovely, sparkling smile.

They went on to say that "Even a plain girl can be charming, if she has a lovely smile. But without one, the loveliest woman's beauty is dimmed and darkened."

The fact is that we've been vocally hypnotized by Ann Sothern's song efforts in "Lady Be Good". So please pardon our Sothern accent.

How Old does your Face Powder Whisper you are?

Can your Face Powder Keep a Secret?

Of course your age is your own affair! But can your face powder keep a secret? Can it hide those first sly signs of age? Or does it cruelly accent every tired line—make you look a little older? Find your LUCKY SHADE—find your most flattering shade—in my new Twin-Hurricane Face Powder!

By Lady Esther

When someone asks your age, do you hesitate, just an instant? Do you drop off a year or two? It's no crime, you know... everyone wants to look young!

But if you want to look younger, more attractive—why use a shade of powder that may age you—even a tiny bit?

Are you sure that the shade you are using is the perfect shade for you? Some shades can hide your loveliness and charm—just as certain harsh, unflattering lights can. But the right shade of powder can give your skin new softness and freshness—enchanting new glamor!

I hope you don't choose your powder by looking at the shade in the box. You must try different shades on your own skin before you decide which shade is yours, which makes you look your youngest.

That's why I offer you this gift; I'll send you FREE all 9 new shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. Try them all—let your mirror tell you which is yours!

What is the secret of Lady Esther Face Powder? It's the new way it's made—the first really different way in generations. It's blown and buffed by Twin Hurricanes until it is softer and smoother by far than any powder made the ordinary way. You'll love it! It goes on so smoothly and evenly, and clings 4 long hours or more. Women by the thousands say it's as loyal and flattering as any face powder they've ever used!

MOVIE reviews

Rugged mountaineer Alvin York (Gary Cooper) is rendered speechless by 16-year-old Gracie Williams (Joan Leslie). He fell head over heels in love with her at first sight!

There's three-way rivalry for Ginger Rogers' hand twixt title players in "Tom, Dick and Harry." Burgess Meredith offers dreams; Geo. Murphy, security; Alan Marshal, gayety!

BY WOLFE KAUFMAN

SERGEANT YORK ★★★★

Here is high caliber screen entertainment that's a piece of genuine Americana.

Built around the real life story of Alvin C. York during World War 1, this movie's an engrossing and timely drama of the inner struggles of a simple man. Told slowly but convincingly, it's the saga of York's life in the Valley of the Three Forks in Tennessee where with his mother, sister and brother he scratches an indifferent living from the stony soil. He gets religion and along comes the war with the terrible alternative; to kill or not to kill. First he has to stack up his aversion to killing against his conviction that he must kill in order to stop future warfare. He decides on the latter and becomes the greatest individual hero of the war.

Gary Cooper's never been as convincing or as thrilling as he is in the title role. Joan Leslie as his girl, Gracie, is a real surprise. She has the stuff. She is true and real.

There's a very fine supporting cast, which includes Margaret Wycherley, Walter Brennan and Dickie Moore. But the greatest individual honors, aside from Gary Cooper, go to Howard Hawks for steadfast, sure-footed direction, and Jesse Lasky, who had the tenacity to keep after this story for 20 years before he finally got the right to produce it.—W.B.

TOM, DICK AND HARRY ★★★★

This is an amusing full-of-fun movie that you'll be bound to enjoy.

The story tells what happens to a romantic telephone operator (Ginger) who is pursued by three different kinds of young men. Some of it gets pretty wild and impossible, but all of it is so unusual that you're grateful to the writer and director for their courage. It's told with tricks and surprises so that the resultant movie is full of laughs, satire and a few genuinely tender moments.

Ginger's more versatile here than ever before, and is perfectly cast as the adolescent girl who can't make up her mind among her swains. Her choice is determined by a series of dreams about each of them.

The cast is better than average. George Murphy is Tom, a rising young businessman; Alan Marshal is Dick, a wealthy playboy; Burgess Meredith is Harry, a poor and lazy young dreamer. It's hard to choose between them for acting honors. There is good background support, too, from Joe Cunningham, Lenore Lonergan and Phil Silvers. All are about as good as they could possibly be.

When you add it all up, the main honors go to Ginger for her acting, Paul Jarrico for the unusual and effective writing and by no means least to Garson Kanin for brilliant directing.—RKO. (Cont'd on page 14)

JUST LOOK AT THESE COMING ATTRACTIONS!

Here they are! The Choice of all of Hollywood's offerings for this month and the near future! Better check them off—*you'll want to see every one!

"THE LITTLE FOXES"

Lovely, ruthless Regina Giddens (Bette Davis) is wife of Horace Giddens (Herbert Marshall), president of small Southern bank in year 1900. She has a daughter, Alexandra (Teresa Wright).

In lavish style for which he is famed, Goldwyn brought in top-flight portrait photographers George Hurrell (above), Maurine, Paul Hesse, James Doolittle, Charles Kerlee and L. Willinger to make publicity sittings of Stars Davis and Wright. Unit lenser was Bert Six. Since wild life conservationists ban birds an hats, studio had to barrow one fram Louisiana Museum.

Chief trouble maker among authentic Edwardian period gowns designed by Orry-Kelly, this black velvet, bead-trimmed creation necessitated use of flesh-pinching corsets, brought on Davis collapse. Bette's wardrobe also included gawn of black taffeta and lace, and one of white lace, both heirlooms. For stays, designers had no whalebone, used steel instead.

With her avaricious brathers, Ben Hubbard (Charles Dingle, above) and Oscar Hubbard (Carl Benton Reid), Regina plots to buy control of a cotton mill. Each one must put up $75,000.

To interpret morbid psychological nuances of Lillian Hellman's stage smash, Goldwyn gave camera assignment to thin, sensitive-faced Gregg Toland (kneeling), Hollywood's ace cinematographer. Toland lighting wizardry (see "Citizen Kane"), not elaborate make-up, made over-40, hard-faced Regina Giddens of 32-year-old Bette Davis. Candles were electric-lit.

Bitter antagonist of the greedy, arrogant Hubbards is David Hewitt (Richard Carlson), young newspaperman and son of the village dressmaker. Regina discourages his attentions to Alexandra.

Anxious to get the money needed for her share of the mill deal, Regina sends Alexandra to bring home Horace, ailing of a heart condition in Baltimore, treats him with unaccustomed solicitude.

Made up and costumed as Regina Giddens, Star Davis strikingly resembles more voluptuous Tallullah Bankhead, star of stage show. Becoming pompadour hairdress required 48-minute work each morning, helped illusion of middle age. Instead of conventional make-up, Warner artist Perc Westmore (above) depended on plain white base, very little eye shadow.

Nervous Bette smoked incessantly between scenes. Light-provider (above) is Prop Man Irving Sindler, who always sneaks his name into a Goldwyn film. In this one, it appears in newspaper insert. Bette's companion is Herbert Marshall, suave, 51, British—object of her hatred in the film, a warm friend in private. He played chess by mail with a British schoolmate.

Weak, disillusioned, Horace soon realizes her purpose, flatly refuses her demand for the $75,000. Coldly, brutally, Regina drops her mask, tells Horace she hopes he will soon be dead.

"THE LITTLE FOXES"

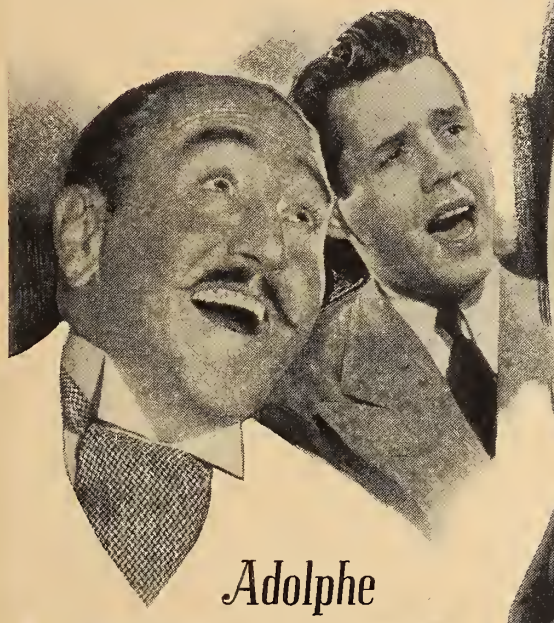
Directar Wyler, 39, blue-eyed, France-born, chucked department stare clerking for films, worked up from prop boy to top megaphonist, fram two-reel harse operas to his latest "The Westerner." For "Little Faxes," he had advantage of an entire, six-house village square built inside a studia sound stage—plus services of original Broadway cast members.

Meanwhile Lea Hubbard, weakling son of Carl and teller in the Giddens Bank, reparts he has access to $90,000 warth of Horace's bands. The Hubbards "borrow" the bonds, scornfully tell Regina that she's now out of the deal.

Regina vents her fury on Horace, induces a heart attack. When he drops his vital medicine bottle, she refuses help, watches him totter vainly upstairs in search of another, then collapse. The horror of her deed leaves Regina unmoved.

Stickler for realism, Wyler braught in Dr. E. Bertrand Woolfan (abave) to akay Herbert Marshall's portrayal of man subject ta heart attacks. Wyler himself found Marshall's wheelchair handy for relaxing between scenes, in one rare maad, prapelled himself araund, tooting like an auta harn. Death of 6-ft., 175-lb. Marshall is film's high point.

Hailed as new find is Teresa Wright, Maplewood, N. J., high-schooler and star of Broadway's "Life With Father, who cuts her movie milk teeth on fat role of Alexandra, Regina Giddens' 17-year-old daughter. A doll-collector, Teresa was not camera-shy, felt nervous only for still shats. Her film romance with Richard Carlson was tacked onto original play.



Horace's death brings Alexandra to sudden, bitter maturity. With new-found courage and David Hewett's support, she defies Regina's decision to move to Chicaga. Regina finds herself, at the end, suddenly lonely, bereft.

Original Screen Play by Dorothy and Herbert Fields

Jack Sprat could eat no fat — his wife could eat no lean. So they argued until the neighbors complained. Then one day Jack brought home a package of Dentyne (that delicious and pleasantly chewy gum that helps keep teeth bright).

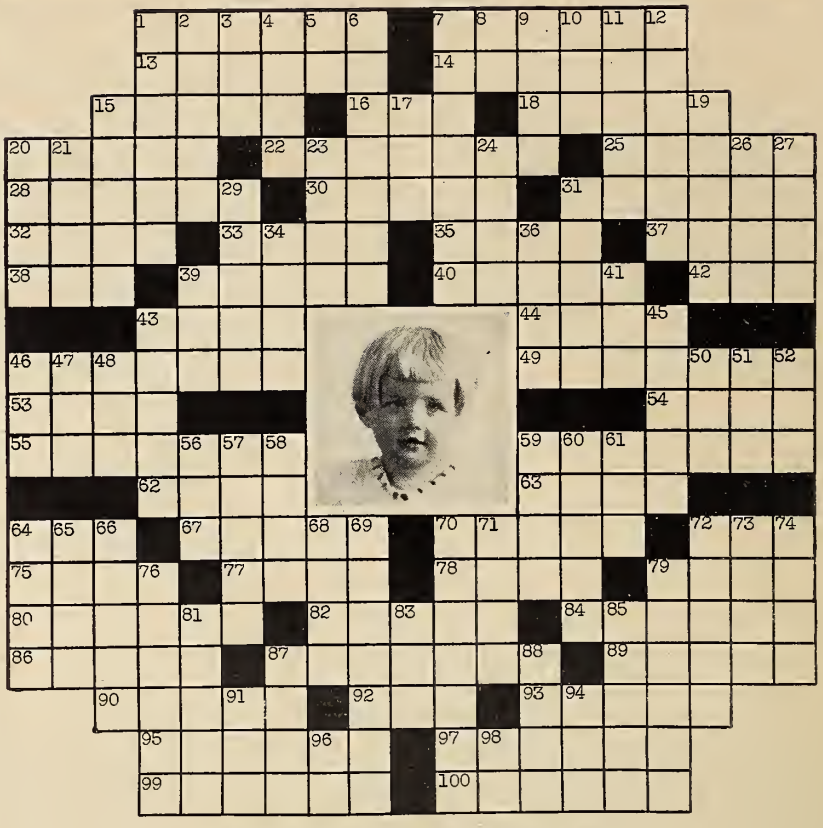
"What's that?" cried Mrs. Sprat.

"A treat for your taste," said Jack. "Just you taste the blended richness of Dentyne's fine flavor."

"Say — it's good," cried Mrs. Sprat, "Dentyne is better than dessert."

"And not so fattening as some desserts," said Jack slyly. "Besides it will help keep your teeth naturally bright and sparkling. Here don't chew all six sticks!"

So Jack and Mrs. Sprat no longer argue — they both enjoy Dentyne.



(Moral: You can't argue about Dentyne's fine flavor. You enjoy it instead. And it helps keep your teeth bright and attractive. Dentyne's package is flat, handy, and flavortite.)

MOVIE REVIEWS

★★★★ Here Comes Mr. Jordan

The only thing wrong with this picture is its title. That phony handle hides one of the most amusing, most original, most entertaining comedies of all times.

Robert Montgomery is the star, and he turns in a very fine performance. James Gleason and Claude Rains are supporting players, who are better here than they've ever been. Evelyn Keyes is the girl, and she isn't as good as she ought to be. But even more important than the acting in "Mr. Jordan" is the writing and production.

The story concerns a mugg prize-fighter named Joe Pendleton, who's killed in an airplane accident. It seems that there's been some mistake in heaven, and he is not supposed to have died for fifty years hence. So he goes back to earth and borrows the body of a very rich socialite. That is one of the funny things—this mugg prize-fighter inside the body of a smug banker! It isn't like anything that was ever screened before. It's swell.

Bows to director Alexander Hall, to writers Seton Miller and Sidney Buchman and to producer Everett Riskin.—C.

★★★½ Charley's Aunt

Here is a top-notch movie that you're sure to love. It's as old-fashioned as a museum piece, and no attempt has been made to bring it up to date. All the laughs are based on situations which no longer exist, but it isn't old-time folderol by any means! It's been funny for many, many years and still is.

Jack Benny, who always has played himself in movies, acts the part of an Oxford boy who masquerades as somebody's aunt in a series of inane situations. He makes out elegantly. Just as well as Sidney Chaplin and Charlie Ruggles did years ago!

There's an extra good supporting cast, which helps today's version considerably. Among the male actors, Edmund Gwenn and Laird Cregar are best, and Kay Francis is tops among the femmes. But Benny has to carry most of the script himself—and does. Directed (and very neatly) by Archie Mayo.—T.C.F.

★★★½ Sun Valley Serenade

It's a pleasant, fast-paced musical that Sonja appears in this time. The skating stuff is excellent but at a minimum. Surrounding it is an amusing story, some fine music and a much-better-than-average cast. John Payne is the boy, Lynn Bari's the other girl, Milton Berle hands out the laughs, and Glenn Miller attends to the syncopation.

For story purposes, Payne's a bandleader in love with Lynn Bari, a singer with a big reputation. Largely because of her, Johnny gets an important booking at Sun Valley. But his press-agent, Milton Berle, has arranged a publicity stunt whereby Johnny is to adopt a foreign refugee. The kid (Sonja Henie) arrives and tags along with them. The accompanying complications are played at a merry pace.

Johnny and Lynn both sing okay. Milton has never been funnier. Sonja has never been cuter. And the music is way above average. Seven fine tunes, with "The Kiss Polka" and "Chattanooga Choo Choo" best.

For specialty numbers there are the Nicholas Brothers, who have never been topped in their particular kind of dancing; Joan Davis; Dorothy Dandridge—and an extra good skating chorus. Directed by H. Bruce Humberstone.—TCF.

Bette Davis and James Cagney are partners here in a splendid light comedy liberally garnished with good, old-fashioned slapstick.

The story is one of those idiotic affairs in which a number of amusing characters are wound around an unusual situation and permitted to go 'round and 'round. If it works, it's swell. This one works.

Bette does a fine job as a spoiled heiress who is about to elope with Jack Carson, an I-love-me bandleader. Cagney is an aviator hired to fly the couple to Las Vegas. Eugene Pallette, Bette's father, is agin it and makes a deal with Cagney to kidnap Bette and deliver her at so much a pound C.O.D. Everything would have worked fine except Kid Cupid delivers a two-way punch during a plane wreck in the desert.

This is one of those rare cases where topnotch writing, direction and acting all help each other rather than getting in each other's way.

Besides the excellent thesping of the two stars, there's an amazingly good performance by Jack Carson. Harry Davenport is outstanding as a ghost town proprietor; Eugene Pallette is good in his standard blustering father role, and comedy support is added by Stuart Erwin, William Frawley, George Tobias, Edward Brophy and Harry Holman. Don't overlook the excellent pacing by Director William Keighley.—W.B.

★★★ My Life with Caroline

The trouble with this picture is: too much charm and too little substance. Ronald Colman's married to Anna Lee, who thinks she's in love with Reggie Gardiner until Ronnie convinces her otherwise. The producers and directors manage a few innovations, but too much time is spent in talk, talk, talk.

It's the American début of Anna Lee, who has a lot on the ball but overplays in spots. Colman gives the leading role plenty of savoir faire and charm. He's closer here to the old Colman who used to bowl you gals over than he's been in some years.

Reggie Gardiner is quite good, although you may be surprised by the type of characterization he undertakes. There are a number of pleasing support performances with Charles Winninger, Gilbert Roland and Hugh O'Connell heading the list. Directed by Lewis Milestone.—RKO.

★★★ Manpower

Here is rough and tough melodrama, with Edward G. Robinson, Marlene Dietrich and George Raft heading the cast. If you like these players, if you don't object to rough-house humor and dialogue, a bit on the borderline—well, then, you'll have an uproarious time.

Few pictures have moved at a faster pace than this yarn of the power lines and the men who keep them up. Marlene's a hostess in a clip joint. Robinson befriends and marries her, but is a dud around women, and she soon falls for Raft, Eddie's best friend. The triangle is solved by Robinson's falling from a power tower and getting killed while fighting with Raft.

The actors are all as good as they ever were. There is an extra special strong supporting cast, almost all of them of the same virile vintage as the stars: Frank McHugh, Alan Hale, Ward Bond and Joe Crehan.

Raoul Walsh's direction punches each scene home with conviction, and there's a distinct bow due to Ernie Haller for his better-than-average photography.—W.B.

★★½ Accent On Love

Familiar in practically every detail, this movie still manages to be pleasant because it's so freshly-handled, well played and neatly directed. Also, it's important because it gives budding-star George Montgomery a big chance.

George is married to a rich gal. Tired of his useless existence, he hires out as a ditch-digger, falls in love with a poor girl, gets a divorce, convinces his ex-father-in-law that something should be done about the awful conditions of tenement buildings and marries the new girl in his life.

Besides Montgomery's performance, there is an A-1 acting job by Osa Massen. J. Carroll Naish is tops as a foreman, Thurston Hall impresses as Pop, but Cobina Wright, Jr., barely manages to get by with her snob socialite portrayal. Directed by Ray McCarey.—TCF.

★★½ Barnacle Bill

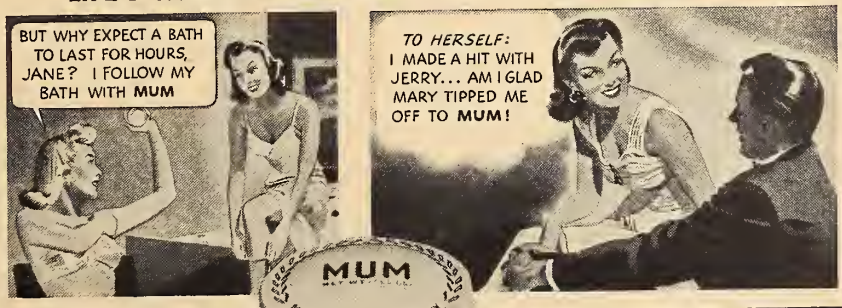
This picture is over-length and none too original—but it makes you laugh once

Two office bachelors —but no date for Joan!

Popularity and Jobs are Safer if a girl remembers to use Mum every day!

TWO attractive bachelors—both marked for success. And they picked Joan for a honey the very first morning on her new job. But why no bantering—no bids to lunch—none of the attention the other girls received? Well, Joan, the truth, the tragic truth, is—the girl guilty of underarm odor doesn't get or deserve the breaks.

Joan would be amazed if you mentioned her fault—if you deliberately said "Mum." She bathes every morning, of course. But she needs Mum to protect that after-bath freshness, to keep her safe all day—or all evening long.



Many smart girls—eager to get ahead in business or socially—make Mum a daily habit. They wouldn't dream of taking chances with charm when Mum is so quick, so safe, so easy to use!

MUM IS QUICK! A touch under each arm, before or after dressing... in 30 seconds charm is protected.

MUM IS GENTLE! Use it right after underarm shaving. So safe for fine fabrics that it has won the seal of approval of the American Institute of Laundering.

MUM IS SURE! Mum makes odor impossible all day or all evening, yet does not stop perspiration. Get Mum today!

LIFE'S MORE FUN WHEN MUM GUARDS CHARM!

in a while. Wallace Beery and Marjorie Main have the leads and recall the Beery-Dressler pictures of some years back.

Beery goes through his usual paces as a seldom-working fisherman who cadges a living from friends and acquaintances. Virginia Weidler shows up on the scene, a long-absent daughter who is very proud of Wally's sailing ability. To live up to her conception of him, he has to work. This brings about his regeneration.

Beery, Miss Main and the Weidler tot are all topnotch in their own particular ways, and all are permitted considerable leeway in the mugging department. Extra good support is turned in by Barton MacLane, Leo Carrillo and Donald Meek. Directed by Richard Thorpe.—M-G-M.

★★½ Blondie in Society

This is one of the best of the Blondie series. More humor than usual, a more adult key, but still retaining its essentially juvenile following.

The motif is dogs. Dagwood brings home a Great Dane which embroils the Bumstead clan with the neighborhood. But don't worry; the Dane doesn't outshine the regular Bumstead pup. Daisy holds her own.

The regular Blondie cast is at regular pace throughout, Penny Singleton, Arthur Lake and Larry Simms registering as usual, while neat support is added by Slow-Burn Edgar Kennedy. Directed by Frank R. Strayer.—Col.

★★½ Hello Sucker

Unimportant but amusing, this is a Hugh Herbert comedy full of zany carryings-on. None of it makes sense, but most of it is fun.

Tom Brown and Peggy Moran, fresh from the country, are sold a defunct theatrical agency by a couple of sharpers. Hugh Herbert is a magician who feels sorry for them and gets them out of the scrape by helping them make a success of the business.

Lewis Howard and June Storey provide the romantic complications, while Walter Catlett and Robert Emmet Keane are a good comedy support team. Directed by Edward Cline.—Univ.

★★½ Cracked Nuts

It's not bad—but a few exciting stars in the cast would have helped.

It seems that Stuart Erwin is a hick who wins a slogan contest and goes to the city to be clipped by Mischa Auer and Bill Frawley. All of them try hard but are too routine; you know just what to expect all the way. And Una Merkel is completely wasted as Stu's girl-friend. She deserves better material than this. Directed by Edward Cline.—Univ.

★★½ Hurry, Charlie, Hurry

The story is the kind that reminds you more of two reel comedies than anything else, but it keeps moving. Leon Errol paces the actors and leads them a merry chase. Leon is a bank president who wants to get away from his snooty wife, Cecil Cunningham, in order to do some fishing. So he invents an invitation to Washington to visit the Vice President. The V.P. shows up, and—well, that's about it, plus much ado. It's fun.

Errol is swell, Miss Cunningham is amusing, George Watts is excellent as Leon's fishing companion, and the romance is left to Kenneth Howell and Mildred Coles who don't get enough footage to tell you very much about their acting ability. Directed by Charles Roberts.—RKO.

★★½ The Officer and The Lady

This is an average cops and robbers melodrama which deserves space because it introduces a new young actor named Bruce Bennett.

It's one of those completely fictitious yarns full of action and excitement. Bruce Bennett is a young cop who is in love with Rochelle Hudson, a young school teacher. She can't marry him because her father, a former cop, was crippled for life by Sidney Blackmer, brains of a gangster ring. Roger Pryor is Bennett's competition for Rochelle. On the side he is Blackmer's partner in crime. It all ends well, of course. Direction Sam White.—Col.

★★½ Two in a Taxi

Here is a pleasant little picture off the beaten trail. It's true and honest and has genuine feeling.

The story has to do with the trials and tribulations of a boy and girl trying to earn $300 for a down payment on a gas station. If they make it, they think they'll have enough security to permit their getting married.

Anita Louise tries hard but is a bit too classy and cultured for her part as the girl. The boy is played by Russell Hayden, who is a youngster to be watched. Noah Beery Jr., Fay Helm, Chick Chandler and Dick Purcell are best among the supporting players. Directed by Robert Florey.—Col.

★★½ Forced Landing

Here's a picture you won't remember, but which will give you your money's worth of wild adventure.

The story has to do with enemy agents holding strong government positions in a mythical country. Richard Arlen, an American working for a civilian air transport line there, runs across a plot to wreck construction of defense measures and manages to foil the villains after an hour of exciting aviation thrill stuff. Suspense is the essence of this movie, and there is a lot of it.

Arlen is A-1 as the hero, and Eva Gabor makes her movie début as the girl friend. J. Carroll Naish and Nils Asther are the bad boys, and both are above average. Directed by Gordon Wiles.—Par.

★★ Dance Hall

Blame the writers for this miscarriage of drama. The actors and the poor director were helpless.

Carole Landis plays a specialty singer in a dance hall; Cesar Romero is the manager; William Henry is a pianist who is writing the inevitable symphony on the side; June Storey is a gold-digging waitress. You can imagine the rest.

Of the actors, the best performance is turned in by J. Edward Bromberg in an impressive bit role as a salesman. Directed by Irving Pichel.—TCF.

★★Sweetheart of the Campus

Talent and material are spread too thin in this slim, little musical. The story has amusing possibilities. It might have held up pleasantly with a stronger cast and production.

Ozzie Nelson and Harriet Hilliard provide most of the entertainment. They are part of a jobless band whose members enroll in a dying college so they can open a night club on the campus. Well, they don't come through, although there is some very good music. Several of the tunes are right down the groove, best being "Beat it Out."

Besides Ozzie and Harriet, there is some impressive dancing and some unimpressive acting by Ruby Keeler. Gordon Oliver is fine as the band manager; Charles Judels gets a lot of laughs as the night club proprietor; and Kathleen Howard is swell as a prissy member of the school-board. Direction, by Edward Dmytryk, is too slow.—Col.

★★½ Bad Men of Missouri

This picture is a sort of glorification of the Younger outlaw gang, one of those once-upon-a-time hoodlum bands in the same mold as the Daltons and the Jameses. Dennis Morgan, Wayne Morris and Arthur Kennedy are the leading trio of Youngers. The formula is the same old one. The three Youngers see their father killed by carpetbaggers and turn to a life of crime for revenge, being sort of triple-threat Robin Hoods.

Morgan, Morris and Kennedy are all fine and would be believable if the material they were portraying were possible. Morgan gets a bit the best of it in an acting way. Jane Wyman doesn't get much to do but does that little well. There's extra good support by Victor Jory, Alan Baxter, Walter Catlett and Howard Da Silva.

In spite of pretty poor writing, Richard Enright manages to keep things moving with his fast-paced direction.—W.B.

★★½ Ringside Maisie

The newest Maisie picture is not as good as it should be. Maisie just doesn't lend herself to prize-fight pictures and vice versa.

Robert Sterling is the prizefighter with Murphy as his manager. Maisie thinks Murphy is a heel and tries to get him straightened out, until she finds there are no heels named George Murphy. Sterling loses his eyesight for a while via a crooked fight, but everything ends happily for everybody except the audience. Directed by Edwin Marin.—M-G-M.

★★ For Beauty's Sake

Here is another instance of a good novel which just doesn't lend itself to screening. It's a comedy which falls flat in almost all departments and isn't helped any by a cast of young and unimportant players.

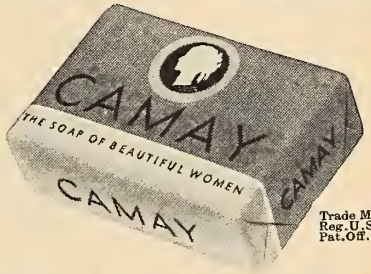
Ted North is a serious young professor who suddenly finds himself the owner of a beauty shop. According to his aunt's will, he must operate it for two years or lose a fortune.

Marjorie Weaver is swell as a daffy dame who's in love with Ted and tries to help him. She ought to go far some day. North, on the other hand, doesn't show much here. Joan Davis, Tully Marshall, Richard Lane and Ned Sparks help the festivities considerably. Directed by Shepard Traube.—T.C.F.

"Charley's Aunt" role is big boost for James Ellison, shown cooing into Arleen Whelan's pretty pink ear.

Wake your skin to New Loveliness with Camay — Go on the "MILD-SOAP" DIET!

This lovely bride, Mrs. John B. LaPointe of Waterbury, Conn., says: "I can't tell you how much Camay's 'Mild-Soap' Diet has done for my skin. Whenever I see a lovely woman whose skin looks cloudy, I can hardly help telling her about it."



Even many girls with sensitive skin can profit by this exciting beauty idea—based on the advice of skin specialists, praised by lovely brides!

YOU CAN BE lovelier! You can help your skin—help it to a cleaner, fresher, more natural loveliness by changing to a "Mild-Soap" Diet.

So many women cloud the beauty of their skin through improper cleansing. And so many women use a soap not as mild as a beauty soap should be.

Skin specialists themselves advise regular cleansing with a fine mild soap. And Camay is milder by actual test than 10 other popular beauty soaps.

Twice every day—for 30 days—give your skin Camay's gentle care. It's the day to day routine that reveals the full benefit of Camay's greater mildness. And in a few short weeks you can reasonably hope to have a lovelier, more appealing skin.

Watch for "HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY"

Ingrid Bergman

She's never worn a phony eyelash, posed for cheesecake or had a date with Greg Bautzer. She's committed the Hollywood faux pas of being ecstatically married—to a handsome viking of a guy, Dr. Peter Lindstrom. Has a blonde daughter, Pia, who's frankly four and neither precocious nor beautiful. Ingrid has no maid, no car, doesn't own a lipstick. She likes to wash dishes, has a complexion like Shirley Temple and bites her nails. She's a strange one, is Bergman—but what a honey! Hemingway fell for her (insists that she be Maria in his "For Whom the Bell Tolls") and so did Buzz Meredith. Spence Tracy thinks she's marvelous. Ah, but ask the man who owns one. . . . Dr. Lindstrom says she's the most wonderful woman in the world and the most beautiful. She has a million virtues and only one vice—a propensity for $100 trans-Atlantic phone calls. Unpatriotically she doesn't like smorgasbord or the "Hut Sut Song"; shows signs of becoming Yankee-fied —adores corn on the cob and Joe DiMaggio. At 26, Ingrid's starred in fifteen movies (mostly in Sweden), is crazy about her bad girl role in M-G-M's "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

Cary Grant

Once upon a time there was a little boy named Archibald Leach who ran away from home in Bristol, Eng., to join an acrobatic troupe. Well-versed in stilt-walking, acrobatic and clown routines, he trekked all over the British Isles and across the Atlantic to the N. Y. Hippodrome. During an automobile trip to Cal., he casually took a screen test and has been hitting cinematic headlines ever since. Nowadays you'll recognize him as Cary Grant, starring in Columbia Pictures. He has a preference for striped ties and an arch-hate for monogrammed shirts and hankies, but doesn't understand why anyone gives a darn. Claims he's a bungler when it comes to courtin'; then discredits his statement by successfully wooing top-notch heiress Barbara Hutton. Close-mouthed, he won't talk about his fiancée or closest pals, Noel Coward and Randy Scott. He has an aversion to cozy "twosome" shots, consequently goes to previews alone or with a staid, unphotogenic crony. Doesn't mention his enormous donations to B. W. R!

Ginger Rogers

Only beauty secret Ginger Rogers ever observes is a frisky soap and water face-scrubbing thrice a day. She doesn't wear any make-up on the street except lipstick and eyebrow pencil—her brows are invisible without it! She never diets because her dancing keeps her in trim. There's a soda fountain in her playroom, and she's forever gorging ham and eggs and spaghetti with meat sauce (but no wine). She loves to shop for peach-colored lingerie and blue pajamas, her only wardrobe frivolities. Usually she jumps into slacks and low-heeled shoes and lets it go at that. Hates bridge, but is a crackerjack tennis player and swimmer and adores baseball. A stickler for routine, she observes studio hours religiously, then turns around and is late for social engagements. She's a fairy godmother to 4 army officers in Tibet and an honorary admiral in the Texas "Navy." A social gal, she likes to have a crowd at her home to play games. Had the RKO-Radio set of "Tom, Dick and Harry" just jammed with visitors!

Bruce Cabot

It all happened because Bruce Cabot was a first-class romanticist. So convincingly was he as a kiss-tester in would-be actresses' screen tests, he was given a full-time contract! And he's still master of that gentle art in United Artists' "Sundown" and with Liz Whitney, his gal. No one's more surprised at this trend of events than the natives of his home town in Carlsbad, N. M., where young Jean de Bujac (his real name) had them all prepared to cheer a first-class boxer. That idea dissolved with his job as sparring partner when he knocked out his boss! Since he ran away from home at 15, he's worked as cowpuncher, scrubbing freighter decks, drilling oil, hauling in bleached cattle bones from the desert, renting apartment houses and bouncing drunks at a Hollywood café. If he had it all to live over, he'd be a broker. As far as women are concerned, he prefers 'em to wear black or blue and be avid football fans. They score one up if they can cook calves liver and bacon and earnestly admire his horses!

Carol Bruce

It wasn't enough to be the toast of Broadway. She wasn't satisfied wowing 'em in the top show of the town! What Carol Bruce wanted was a pot shot at Hollywood, where other Carols had done such big things! And she was used to getting what she wanted. . . . Born on Nov. 15, 1919, in Great Neck, L. I., she had lived and breathed to be a serious dramatic actress from the moment she saw her first flicker. Elocution lessons and singing scales ended on a blue note during The Depression, when every ounce of energy went into selling hosiery at $7 a week and graduating from night high school at 15. Advancing to the ranks of model, she looked for stage work during lunch hours and was rewarded by a contract with Larry Clinton. People began to notice the svelte 5' 5", 112-pound, dark-eyed beauty, and she was catapulted to fame in "Louisiana Purchase" warbling "The Lord Done Fixed Up My Soul." Right now, she's in seventh heaven taking that longed-for pot shot in Universal's "This Woman Is Mine." Living with her mom and sister in a penthouse, she's forever studying her lines; leaving her social life till later.

Glenn at 9 months. He was Gwyllyn (pronounced Gwellen) Ford then; lived in Quebec, where he was born.

1929—The Fords had moved to Santa Monica. Glenn was a boy scout, white hope of his school football team and star of the "Colossal Ford Productions" put on in the Ford barn.

WELSH RARE-BIT

BY CYNTHIA MILLER

Glenn Ford has a talisman against swellhead. He was feeling moderately pleased with himself as he drove out to Santa Monica one day. A comparative unknown, he'd been given the part of Ludwig in "So Ends Our Night," one of the acting plums of the year and he'd copped rave notices.

Just back from the Miami première, he'd climbed into his car and was speeding toward the little theatre where he'd trained. His thoughts sped pleasantly ahead. The gang would be proud of him. They weren't the kind to fuss, but there'd be a nice little stir and a few pats on the back. He was looking forward to it. He was even a little embarrassed in advance, as he opened the door and walked in.

They were slapping wallpaper on flats. "Hiya, Ford," they yelled. "Come on, lend us a hand."

"My dome," chuckles Glenn, "shrank to its normal pinhead size. I was back in the groove hanging wallpaper with the crowd. They're my safety valve. If I ever get uppity, they'll haul me down. If I ever won the Academy Award, they'd say, 'So you're lucky, you big stiff. So what are we supposed to do, bow down? There's a hammer and nails, go hit yourself on the head.' "

He's long, eager and cheerfully simple-hearted. Like any rube, he asked the waiter at New York's 21 Club for matchfolders to take home. He's a hero-worshipper, two of his heroes being F.D.R. and Paul Muni. Invited to lunch at the White House, he and the other guests were warned not to pester the President for autographs. Glenn meant to behave, but when the President grinned at him, all he could think was, "Shucks, I want it so badly," and out popped the request.

"You shall have it, Glenn," Mr. Roosevelt promised. Glenn thought, with all his troubles he'll never remember, and I was a dog to ask. But an autographed photo reached the hotel next day, and now stands framed in the Ford living room, opposite Mrs. Roosevelt's framed invitation to lunch.

By some freak, he and Muni bear a striking resemblance to each other. They met at the home of David Loew, the producer. Glenn stammered his admiration. "I've been wanting to meet you, too," smiled the older actor. "Wanted to see what a son of mine might have looked like, if I'd had a son." This bore a special poignancy for Glenn. His father hadn't lived to see "So Ends Our Night."

When Glenn—or to give him his real name, Gwyllyn—was seven, the elder Ford left a lucrative post with the Canadian Pacific Railway, because he felt that the little town of Glenford, Canada—founded by his family—offered inadequate schooling facilities for his only child. Glenn's sweetest memories of that period are bound up with an old French music box, which had lulled to sleep three generations of his Welsh-Canadian forbears. When his generation came along, he alone of a tribe of cousins refused to sleep except to its tinkling strains, and he still remembers the day his grandfather called him and presented him, a five-year-old, with the treasure. He plays it for himself now, and looks forward to winding it up for his first-born.

Having heard of the glories of California and its orange trees, Glenn's father took his wife and son to Santa Monica, where he eventually landed a contracting job. The boy 1940—He'd become a U. S. citizen, had crashed Hollywood and had a mild crush on Susanna Foster. Rarely went night-clubbing; took up badminton, tennis, golf.

A visit, friendly as a handclasp, with Glenn—that deluxe model Ford went to school and throve and developed a stubborn devotion to the theatre. The town supported seven little theatres and, in one capacity or another, he belonged to them all—as carpenter, electrician, stage manager, actor, director. Deep in his mind lurked the dream of acting for a living, but he didn't dare believe in it yet. On quitting high school, he took whatever came along. The Santa Monica merchants knew and liked him. "Sure, Gwyllyn, you can have a job." He clerked, drove cars, sold vacuum cleaners, twirled searchlights at a movie house where he was later to make personal appearances, flung himself into little theatre work at night and found no cure for the actor's itch.

So he mapped a campaign. Homer Curran produced New York hits on the coast. A round trip from Santa Monica to his office in Los Angeles cost sixty cents. Glenn saved up enough to cover the fare for two weeks. Anyone watching him would have had his head examined, for all he did was ride to town, sit in Curran's outer office and ride home again, apparently well-content. The point anyone would have missed was that the producer had to pass him twice a day, on his way to lunch and back. On the fourth day he nodded, on the sixth he said, "Hello, kid," on the eighth he asked what he wanted. "A job," gulped Glenn.

Curran was amused and, after a little parley, interested. "Tell you what, kid. We're doing 'The Children's Hour.' There's a bit in the third act we might give you a shot at. Come around tomorrow."

Wrapped in rosy clouds, he floated to the library, memorized the three lines of the grocery boy, read them next morning and got the job at twenty-five per. His mother thought it was wonderful. So did his father, in a way. Mr. Ford wasn't much of a talker. He looked something like Gary Cooper and had the same kind of bashfulness. A practical man, his son's leanings sometimes troubled him. "Wish the boy would learn a trade," he'd say ruefully now and again to his wife. Never to Glenn.

The show opened in San Francisco, and one paper said that Gwyllyn Ford as the grocery boy was a knockout. Thereafter, when Curran had a bit to hand out, Glenn got it.

Meantime, movie talent scouts had convinced Glenn that the screen was not for him. Covering the little theatres, where he continued to function week after week, they'd be struck by his acting but discouraged by his face. "Not very pretty, are you?"

"No, sir."

"Character juvenile, that's what you are. We need leading men. Stick to the stage, kid."

Only Tom Moore of Twentieth Century-Fox insisted on making a test, which all but cost him his job. After watching Glenn's performance of "Parnell," Moore sent for him. "Wanted to see what you looked like behind the whiskers. Hmm. You're a character juvenile, son."

"Okay, I know it."

"We'll make a test anyway."

They dolled him up, straightened his nose with highlights, stuck him into tails and put him through the romantic works. Tom showed (Continued on page 89)

"Paulette Saved My Life!"

GODDARD HAS PLAYED IN COUNTLESS THRILLER-DILLERS—BUT NONE HAS EVER PACKED THE PUNCH OF ONE FANTASTIC REAL LIFE ESCAPADE!

None of Paulette's cinema fiction ever packed the punch of a five minute scene she played on a dank June 1940 night, in a weird spiraling pink-and-blue cement structure four miles outside of Mexico City!

On that night, Paulette Goddard saved a hero from death. In a moment, shrugging at danger, she saved a life. A fine, worth-while life. That of pudgy and colorful Diego Rivera, Mexico's greatest artist.

I went from Hollywood to Mexico City to talk with the genius Paulette Goddard had saved and to learn, exclusively for Modern Screen, the "inside story" of the Mexican adventure. I saw Diego Rivera, and I heard the entire story, piece by piece.

Up until the summer of last year, Paulette Goddard had realized most of her ambitions. She had emerged from Great Neck, Long Island, left high school for a semi-nude chorus stint in "Rio Rita" and gone to Hollywood to do bit work for Hal Roach. Then, as a dazzling platinum blonde, she got a job in an Eddie Cantor film and was finally spotted by Charlie Chaplin. He thought she had everything. He thought only her blonde hair was wrong. He said to her, "Paulette, your face needs the definition of a dark frame. Let your hair grow back to its natural brunette shade. Then wear it brushed off your forehead and shoulder-length." After that, Paulette was physical perfection—and things came to her.

But one ambition remained unrealized. Paulette Goddard had always dreamed of having her portrait painted by the great Mexican muralist, the stormy petrel of the art world, Diego Rivera. Paulette had learned much about Rivera. She remembered when he'd been selected to paint a huge mural in Rockefeller Center, New York. She remembered Rivera worked eight weeks in preparing and six weeks in painting the mural—until officials learned a head of Lenin was in the nearly completed work. Officials ordered Rivera to get rid of the head; Rivera refused, insisting Art could not be dictated to. Finally police threw Rivera out, but not before he took snapshots of it so that later he might reproduce it in Mexico City. The mural was destroyed, an international controversy broiled, and Rivera became notorious.

She knew he'd been panned in San Francisco for choosing to paint Helen Wills as a person representative of California, and she knew he'd been lambasted in Detroit for a painful panel which was said to represent the Holy Family. She knew, too, that all his life he'd been involved in political intrigue, had fought for the underdog and was now hated equally by Fascists, Socialists, Communists and Capitalists.

"I won't be happy until Rivera paints an oil of me," Paulette told friends.

And promptly she set out to fulfill her ambition. She decided to spend a week in Mexico City. Actually, she spent two weeks. Once there, she took a car to Rivera's unusual home—actually a number of separate homes, one for the painter, one for his wife ("to insure domestic peace," he explains), studios, workshops, kitchens, all surrounded by a fence of green cactus plants. In the patio Paulette found workmen building frames for Rivera's paintings and a pet hump-backed monkey and two yelping Dachshunds. She did not find Rivera's third wife, the brilliant half-German and half-Mexican Frieda Kahlo (whom Rivera remarried just a few months ago).

In the second floor room of his pink-and-blue cement-walled studio, attended by his gorgeous brunette Indian model, Nieves, and the attractive Hungarian artist, Irene Borjus, who fell for him while he was separated from his wife, Diego Rivera waited for Paulette Goddard.

"Yes," Diego told me, "that was our first meeting. My opinion of her beauty? Well, my answer is that later when I wanted to paint the type of a beautiful young American girl for my fresco at the San Francisco Golden Gate Exposition, I again asked Miss Goddard to pose for me!"

Apparently, Rivera saw in Paulette Goddard what lesser artists had seen before him. Five feet four inches tall and weighing 115 pounds, her measurements a year ago were: bust 34 inches, waist 23, hips 35, thigh 20, ankle 8. All of which had two years earlier inspired six popular American artists to vote Paulette's "The Most Beautiful Body In The World" and caused Chairman Jefferson Machamer to exclaim, "Artists have sought the ideal model through the ages and rarely have found a perfect combination of face and figure in the same person. Miss Goddard has such a combination!"

And, worshipfully, Rivera says, "Her beauty is for me as great as her brilliance of mind!"

Rumor has it there was one minor disagreement between Goddard and her admirer. He wanted her to pose in the nude; Paulette refused. They compromised on a "classical boudoir scene" of her seated on a mat, attired in white shorts and white sheer blouse, with a naked Indian servant girl combing her hair.

Years before, Rivera admitted to Paulette in the course of her sittings, he had been interested in Communism. Now he hated its tyranny, and he fought against Communism in speeches and in actions. As a result, the Reds in Mexico, (Continued on page 35)

Paulette Goddard and Mexican muralist Diego Rivera arrive safely in Hollywood a few days after their hair-raising encounter with a group of Red assassins in Mexico.

Rumor has it that when Paulette asked Rivera to paint her portrait, he first insisted that she pose nude. She refused, so they compromised on the above outfit.

You will want to know: Who is this Philip Dorn? Where did he come from? What is his story? What is he like in person?

He is six feet two, with a strong, honest, thoughtful face. There is nothing of the swashbuckler about him, yet he has had as many adventures as Errol Flynn. He's the quiet type.

That's partly explained by the fact that he's Dutch. As a race, the Dutch aren't famous for shouting about themselves. They like to live their own lives and let other people live theirs.

He was born in the little seacoast town of Scheveningen, a few miles from The Hague. His father was a small shipbuilder.

As a boy, always around boats, Philip had the ambition to go to sea, to roam the world—and that fever isn't out of his system yet. It helped to bring him to Hollywood just as it took him before to other far places.

To his father and mother, the theatre was a snare of Satan. It was something to be kept out of their lives and out of their son's life. He was thirteen or fourteen when he saw his first play, a Red Cross performance. He had been forbidden to see it, but the curiosity of youth was so strong it pulled him inside the verboten doors.

"I did not know such a world existed," he says today in his careful, heavily-accented English, across a table in a Hollywood studio commissary 6000 miles from Scheveningen. "I was intrigued by it. Immediately I had the ambition to become an actor. It was a way not to be like your neighbor or your brother or sister. That was the original lure, I think. Youth rebels against fitting into molds."

With blunt Dutch determination, he announced his new ambition at home. His father thundered that no son of his would ever go on the stage. His mother used better psychology. She took him aside and told him that she hoped some day he would create beauty for the world—that he would be a painter or writer or musician. An actor, she said, was only an interpreter of other men's thoughts, not a creator.

He listened to his mother and consented to be sent to a school of fine arts in The Hague. But his heart wasn't in his studies. To put it tersely, he flunked out.

Ashamed to go home, he felt as if he might as well make his disgrace complete, even though his father might disown him for it. He made up his mind to find out whether he had the makings of an actor or not.

"I had found out that I could never be what my parents hoped," he says, with a self-deprecating smile. "But how did people get on the stage? I had no idea. Knowing no better, I used the direct approach. I went to a theatre manager in The Hague and asked for a job as an apprentice actor. And—he gave me a job. It was as simple as that . . . I don't know what the manager saw in me. Earnestness, perhaps."

He was only 15 but got away with claiming to be older. His voice had changed and was under control. Also, he was tall, well-proportioned and serious beyond his years. (His failure in school weighed heavily upon him.)

"Two weeks I had been playing a bit part in this theatre when a fellow collapsed on a stage in Amsterdam, and they sent for the juvenile lead of our company to replace him. I was promoted to juvenile lead! That was something that could happen only once in a lifetime. It was not ability that made me an actor. It was opportunity."

But did he say that to himself then? Didn't such sudden success go to his head—a little?

He shakes his well-shaped head now, leaning back in his chair, amused at the question. "No. That was something that couldn't happen. Never have I been able to pound my chest and say, 'I am an actor.' Furthermore, I can't understand all those actors who do. Perhaps that is my mother's fault."(Continued on page 81)

Sometimes it is important to forget. Happiness depends on this.

Take up your pencil and write, and you are identifying your personality as surely as a fingerprint tickets your person! This is the credo of graphology (handwriting analysis)—as exemplified by Dr. Arthur Holz.

Several months ago, LIFE magazine, hard-headed and factual, put Dr. Holz's powers through a tough test, printed the results on its pages, found no flaws.

From MODERN SCREEN Dr. Holz received unsigned samples of the handwriting of eleven stars. In each case, he was informed of the sex and age of the author. Graphology built up the rest . . . enabled him to make the astonishing analyses below.

We hope you readers will be intelligently skeptical. And we have asked Howard Dietz, M-G-M's brilliant publicity head, to vouch for the good faith of the Holz analyses. His own hand is analyzed on page 98, and he has this to say about Dr. Holz's work:

"As far as I can judge, the technique of this analysis by Dr. Holz was on the level. Needless to say, I'll settle for the build-up he gives me, and it's a bit drippy to return personal praise. But with some detachment I read his copy on the others in the test and, since I am assured that the distinguished Viennese did no peeking or snooping, I must say that he's a remarkable and frightening fellow."

GENE TIERNEY . . .

The writer has a strong power of influencing others. Her glance works directly on the senses of her spectators. Moreover, she is endowed with a particularly flowing and graceful body, and she has a way of emphasizing the magic of her eyes with appropriate bodily gestures. She has an indomitable will and is terribly ambitious. She is very bold, has something catlike about her, and she has an almost cruel tendency to make gratuitous use of her wiles.

She's particularly suited to vamp roles and to the presentation of types a little soiled by life's temptations. She has lightning perception and puts her finger with unfailing accuracy on the essential in any role entrusted to her. Her life path is laid along a straight line, and she hates to get lost in non-essential detail. She craves love, and because of her abundant temperament she can easily evoke love in others. She is extravagant in her dealings, and in love affairs is inclined to be domineering and guard her independence jealously.

ORSON WELLES . . .

The writer is highly intelligent, aesthetic—a man with a high power of imagination. This imagination springs from a healthy source, and he doesn't lose himself in planless fantasies. He has a great gift for describing situations, knows how to highlight them dramatically. His facets are many; he is rich in ideas and shows this in the pursuit of his calling. He is always seeking after a living expression. In all his dealings, you can watch his need for harmony and clarity come to life. And yet he has in every respect a warrior's nature—constantly struggling to improve himself, constantly battling forward. He possesses extraordinary powers of creation.

There is no trace of the stuffed shirt about him. But when it comes to his job, he's always deadly earnest, puts his whole self behind the realization of his inspiration. He is the terribly high-strung type that's subject to occasional explosions, and at such times he can be hard and tyrannical.

There are times when he craves strictest solitude. But when he's with people, he is animating and stimulating, has lots of humor and can take his audience by storm. This is the essence of his success, which would be as great in the field of letters as it is in the theatre.

SONJA HENIE . . .

The writer is a simple, natural, good-natured, harmless person. She is definitely not the vamp type . . . instead substantial and comradely. This is not to say that she lacks the feminine qualities of tenderness and motherliness. On the contrary, she is very dependent on any person she likes and very dependable.

She is upright to the extent that any lie or intrigue is quite foreign to her. What impresses you most about her is her vitality, the steam with which she puts through anything she's begun. She is highly disciplined and has iron control over her mind and her body.

She's graceful and yet her body is tough as steel. She loves sport and has special athletic gifts. She's no born actress, and I should say she was better suited to home life. She's made for marriage but can't be happy with a husband who doesn't share her interests.

CHARLES BOYER . . .

This is the handwriting of a man whose charm simply overwhelms any audience. He makes a show of being weary, disinterested, sometimes actually blasé. And this delectable passivity charms women. He is a distinguished actor, and he carries his ability over into real life—can twist most people around his little finger.

He has an air of youthful forthrightness, so convincing that you believe anything he tells you. He knows how to look after his own advantage. Completely irresistible, he fascinates you the way bacon fascinates a mouse. What with his graceful carriage, his expressive glances, brimming with warmth and love, he's predestined for the role of a lover.

The interesting thing about his acting is that he can play the tough guy with the same facility that he brings to his upper-crust roles. At heart, he's a homebody, needs a wife who can give him a comfortable home. But woe to his wife if she is jealous, for the magic of his personality stamps him a ladies' man.

BETTE DAVIS

BETTE DAVIS . . .

The author is intelligent, has keen powers of observation, is charming and lovable. She is more or less a slave to her moods—but doesn't show it. This inner chafing, restlessly striving against a strong will, gives her a distinctive air. Her intellect has declared war on her emotions, she is nervously tense, seeks peace, yet she is terribly anxious to present a serene front to the world.

She is at her best portraying stubborn conflict roles, stubborn people who fight on even if they lose. She plays the naive, sweet type or the fallen woman. Yet she is never what you would call a vamp type and never thoroughly debauched. She brings to such roles a certain inviolable integrity. You feel always that life has kicked her around—bruised her—but not really soiled her. By subtle shading she can leave you with a deeply sympathetic impression of a thoroughly unsympathetic person.

Offstage, she is pleasant, doesn't make unnecessary demands on others. But in spite of all the efforts of Lady Luck, in spite of her outward happiness, she is inwardly a lonely person; she suffers much; she can buy peace of mind only at great cost.

AN INTIMATE CLOSE-UP OF THAT GENTLEMEN-PREFERRED BLONDE

Is a whiz at tennis and mad about flying. Caught the fever from the Bob Cummings. Managed 3-point landing after 2 lessons.

Her two floppy-eared spaniels will movie-début in "Wild Geese Calling." Glenn Ford wants one of her pups (there were originally 7), but she can't part with them.

Carole lives with her mom in a 10-room house. Wardrobe includes 10 evening gowns, 19 street dresses, 3 suits, 10 prs. slacks, 9 blouses, 17 prs. shoes, 5 sport coats, an ermine, silver fox and skunk coat.

"Just call me a free-lance artist!" parries blonde, blue-eyed Carole Landis, with that husky, bubbling laugh of hers, when you try prying into her love life. Charles Chaplin, Gene Markey, Matty Fox, Kenny Morgan, Cedric Gibbons, George Montgomery, Bill Marshall—they've all developed flash-bulb squints playing the casual Landis swain. And Hollywood's legion of gossip-vendors chorus one question weakly: "Who's next?"

Like the smart girl she is, Carole, who began her current climb to glory in the Stone Age sarong of "One Million 'B.C.," won't say. In the tastefully-furnished bedroom of her new (rented) Brentwood home, there's only one male photo—of Franchot Tone—cryptically autographed "Yours without protest." And even he, insists Carole, "is just a friend."

Rather than the new-escort-a-night hot-spotting that's hung a title of "Hollywood's most-dated starlet" around her pretty neck, this restless, exuberant 22-year-old prefers to talk about her passion for flying or her five dogs or the 18 x 24 living room that's being redecorated Chinese style—or the ambitious, unabashed way a San Bernardino school girl battered a hole through Hollywood's closely-guarded walls.

Born Frances Lillian Mary Ridste in Fairchild, Wis., Carole moved with her family to California, grew up a reluctant grade-schooler, within brief hitch-hiking distance of filmland—her ultimate goal. At 7, she sang brashly, untunefully before a bored amateur night theatre audience. At 12, she had curved out precociously enough to walk off with stockings and an electric heater in two beauty contests. Three years later, she eloped to Yuma with a 19-year-old school chum, then snarled in a tangle of annulment proceedings, broke the tie herself in a month's time.

School, of course, was tame stuff after that, but Carole stuck it out for another year. Then, thumbing through a phone book, she changed Ridste to Landis, hit the trail for Frisco and a night club singing job. Cannier than most movie-struck youngsters, she realized that experience helps grease the way past casting office secretaries. And engagements that followed at Frisco's swank St. Francis Hotel and the ultra-ultra Rio Del Mar country club gave her that.

Three weeks after arriving in Hollywood, her next stop, Carole, who had never taken a dancing lesson in her life, wiggled and stomped her way into the chorus of Warners' "Varsity Show." (Continued on page 96)

Is gradually acquiring a library and favorite author is Hemingway. She also collects records (mostly popular songs), figurines, miniature animals and colorful swear words.

THE STRANGER-THAN-FICTION ROMANCE OF VIC MATURE AND MARTHA STEPHENSON KEMP

The whole business was nobody's fault. Nobody could have dreamed up the tragic mess that was cooking that day. Nobody could have prevented it. There's no villain in this piece. Just two high-minded, super-sensitive young fools.

There was Martha with a diamond wedding band on her finger and something dead in her eyes. There was Victor with a 6 foot 2½ inch, 204 pound tapered body that was getting him several thousand fan mail letters a week. With a serious, young passionate face that was attracting attention from women named Vanderbilt and Garbo, as well as the 20,000 named Smith and Jones and Zabldowsky. (Literally, I mean. Mrs. Cornelius V. and Greta G. were among the fans who fought their way backstage to tell Victor Mature how special extra he was opposite Gertrude Lawrence in Moss Hart's super-psychological offering, "Lady in the Dark.")

But it hadn't always been that way.

He was born in Louisville, Kentucky, where his father was a knife grinder and poor. Vic grew up a good-natured, friendly and astonishingly handsome young man, and it came to pass one day that he was invited to a Society dance.

It was painless enough for the first hour or so. And then he asked a certain young lady to dance. She glared at him a moment, then enthusiastically slapped his face.

"How dare you—you dirty son of a common knife grinder?"

Something happened to Victor Mature that moment. Something violent that began at the pit of his stomach, going upward till it flooded his brain.

And it didn't stop—not that night, nor the next year. Nor during the next three years when he was crashing Hollywood. His fan mail became a source of wonder and joy to his studio. He acquired dozens of friends among Hollywood's great and near great, but grim things still went on in his heart.

The matinée idol period came next. Victor had been playing Randy Curtiss in "Lady in the Dark" for four months when he met Martha Kemp. In those months he'd covered the hotspot circuit nightly with some eighteen or twenty different girls. It would have been interesting if anyone had cared to notice that not one of their names appeared in a social register. And that wasn't because Park Avenue didn't try! It was because Victor Mature was a funny guy by then, with a deep, hidden, defensive anger in him and a hot, bitter memory of a Louisville dance.

He wouldn't have asked Martha out, if he'd known what he was doing. That's just to begin with. But it all begins, rightly, with Martha's clothes.

They were black—and so painfully simple. They made her look, in that Bergdorf-Goodman crowd at the British War Relief Benefit where he first spied her, like the children's governess sent down to watch the show. Little and scared and shadowy. She hadn't planned it that way, of course—Martha hadn't planned her clothes in a good many gloomy months. But that's how it was. And Victor started right off, thinking crazy:

"A guy could lift her in one hand . . . and she wouldn't break . . . because she's got strength in her, for all her littleness . . . strength and guts . . . and sweetness . . . now what could a girl like that be doing in this crowd?"

She was introduced as Mrs. Something. He missed the name in all the noise and confusion, but he saw the diamond band on her finger, and his heart shriveled up. Victor Mature was surprised. You don't feel that way because a girl you don't know (Continued on page 68)

He got 60,000 fan letters after his first film. Never wears a hat, hates to dance—though Betty Grable says he's an ace conga-er.

Maureen O'Hara and Anna Lee fell madly in love with 11-year-old Roddy McDowall. He's a British evacuee. crossed the Atlantic pursued by Stukas and submarines.

My Sister and I

BY ROSEMARY LANE as told to John Franchey

THAT LANE DUO MAY PUT ON A SOLID SISTERLY FRONT —BUT THEY'RE RUGGED INDIVIDUALISTS AT HEART!

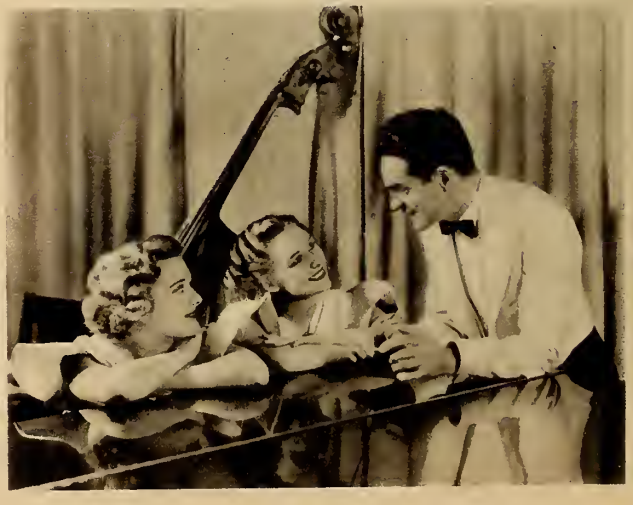
Back home in Indianola (Iowa) life had a wonderful simplicity to it.

If I rolled a hoop down Main Street on Sunday, and a startled stranger wanted to know who the little dear was, there would always be someone around handy to say: "Her? Oh, that's Rosemary Lane. No telling what she'll do next."

That, of course, was before Fred Waring poked his head into a cubicle of a music-publishing house where Priscilla and I were trying out a ditty called "Fit As a Fiddle," made a two-piece choral society out of us and put us in front of his band. The next stop was Hollywood and pictures.

The movies made a sister act out of us—one-two-three. So that what had formerly been a rugged individualist, meaning Rosemary, became overnight one-half a duet which in the public mind ought to dress alike, think alike and behave alike. Hence, if Priscilla happened to be fond of licorice candy (which, by the way, she isn't) it was a dead cinch that I was mad about the stuff. If Priscilla loved kittens (which, by the way, she does) it was perfectly safe to put me down as a sponsor for any cat enterprise that reared its pretty feline head. Likewise, if Priscilla liked her hair combed back nonchalantly in schoolgirl fashion, a hairdresser would automatically start rigging me up in the same coiffure the minute I sat down in his chair.

It worked the other way, too. When I started taking French lessons, my tutor corralled Priscilla and inquired when Pat would be ready to begin her lessons. Let Priscilla start to order her dessert at some restaurant, and a waiter with a memory (and brain) like an elephant is almost sure to come prancing up with a raspberry sherbet which he knew she would adore because I did. Once there was a shoe salesman who almost swooned away out of shock when he found that the slipper Cinderella Rosemary wears was a size too small for Pat's little tootsie.



The point I am trying to make is that my sister and I—we're different.

To begin with, we are not two peas in a pod—even to look at.

Priscilla is the blonde one with large, striking features and a dark complexion. I'm the redhead with small, features and a freckled com- (Continued on page 74)

This is the way Rosemary and Pat looked when they stormed New York with their mom. Shortly after, their parents divorced and Mrs. Lane became mgr. & agent.

When the sisters came East at the ages of 14 and 16, they débuted with Fred Waring and orch. at Roxy's. Of Fred they both say, "He's still the best friend we have."

HOLLYWOOD'S UNDECLARED WAR

Since the movies began, stars and their directors have waged—beneath suave smiles and honeyed words—a sort of undeclared thirty years' war which today stacks them up as natural enemies like cats and dogs or cops and robbers. But strangely enough, the professional rabbit punches which daily illuminate relations between stars and their Svengalis are not often widely publicized. Take the Bette Davis-Willie Wyler tiff . . .

A few weeks ago, Bette walked off the set of "The Little Foxes" in a huff, whereupon the production folded like a paper cup. It was tactfully explained by Sam Goldwyn's press agents that Bette's art had handed her a nervous breakdown. She'd been working too hard . . . the weather was hot . . . etc. But it was also rumored persistently that Bette had been feuding a little too furiously with her director, William Wyler. The skirmish had begun on the set of "The Letter" and simply moved over to "The Little Foxes," where it warmed up and exploded.

Some folks say that Willie Wyler, ace director though he is, just has to have one whipping boy on each of his sets. On this actor he dumps a daily load of sarcasm and disapproval of every word spoken and move made. In "The Letter," Bette's protégé, Jimmy Stephenson, took that uncomfortable rap. After one particularly hectic session, he told Bette that as far as he was concerned, Mr. Wyler could take his "Letter" and eat it. Bette, wise in Wyler's ways, gave Jim a fight talk. Promised him that if he could stick it out, he'd find it worth the effort. Always, for some odd reason, Wyler's whipping boys turn in the performances of their lives—and Jimmy was no exception. As for Bette—she was handy giving out advice, but she had a harder time following it. When it came her turn, she couldn't take it. But "The Little Foxes," all finished now, might very well hand Bette her next Academy "Oscar." If only for the reason that Willie Wyler bent his baneful eye in her direction!

It's funny, but practically every time you land upon a Grade A spat, you stumble across a knockout performance. There's the case of Claudette Colbert, for instance.

In "The Informer" Director John Ford gave Victor McLaglen down to a mumbling frazzle, a performance which capped 1934-35 Acad. Award.

Gable's a headache to directors because of his yen for realism. He won't let his screen partners pull their punches; often gets knocked out cold!

Garson Kanin reassuringly gripped Ginger Rogers' hand for all close-ups of emotional stress 'n' strain during filming of "Tom, Dick and Harry."

Some stars resent being treated like kids by their director. None such is Joan Crawford, who Trilby-ed for Geo. Cukor in "A Woman's Face."

EXPOSING THAT HUSHED-UP SUBJECT —THE UNDERCOVER KNUCKLE WORK BETWEEN STARS AND DIRECTORS!

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

Wesley Ruggles used to be one of her favorite directors. They were as chummy as two bugs in a ruggles—then up came a certain picture. The script locale was a mountain ski resort, and Wesley wanted to shoot it at Sun Valley. He figured it would take six or seven weeks on location. Now Claudette Colbert is notably allergic to locations; besides, she was then the recent and blushing bride of Dr. Joel Pressman. "What's wrong," she demanded, "with the Los Angeles Ice House?" That's where most winter epics are filmed in Hollywood, with frosty breath and everything.

Well, there was a story conference, and Mr. Ruggles got his way. They went to Sun Valley—but not for six weeks. When they got there, there was no snow, and the location trip stretched into three months. They returned not speaking, and that's more or less the way it's been ever since. Ruggles has never directed Claudette again, which is too bad. Because the picture—"She Met Him in Paris"—was a sparkling hit and did more to boost Claudette's stock than any since "It Happened One Night."

Incidentally, "She Met Him in Paris" wound up shooting most snow scenes in the Los Angeles Ice House after all, which handed Claudette a slightly bitter last laugh.

It's not always the director who comes out on top in the eternal scuffle. There's Sidney Lanfield, for instance, a handsome, smooth and self-confident gentleman who used to operate around Twentieth Century-Fox. Tyrone Power was just a raw kid from the East then and had just landed a spot in "Sing, Baby, Sing." After baby had been singing one week, Ty Power looked like a green piece of cheese to Mr. Lanfield, and he told his boss, Darryl Zanuck, that he was certain to gum up the picture. So Ty was replaced by Michael Whalen. And Mr. Lanfield has ever since been trying to live that wrong guess down, like the man who turned down the Vitaphone.

But the little play which scored most heavily for the star team against Sidney Lanfield was put across by Sonja Henie, another green-as- (Continued on page 97)

WHO BUT ROZ THE IRREPRESSIBLE WOULD DARE TO NAME THE NINE MOST EXCITING MEN IN HOLLYWOOD!

Rosalind Russell gave away, free, one of those baleful glares that studios pay her a fortune to register on the screen. "What do you mean," she screamed, "—you want me to talk about The Most Exciting Men I've Known? Don't tell me there's a rabid public interest in my love-life." As an afterthought, she raised her eyebrows and added, "—if any."

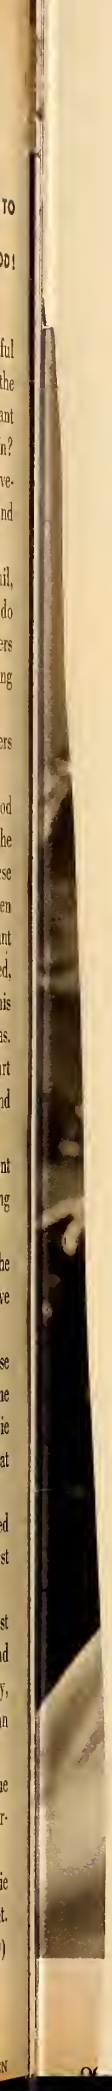
"I've discussed a million times in exhausting detail, how I live alone and don't like it, and how I can't do anything about it until I fall in love. The customers must be asking, 'Can't Russell talk about anything else?' "

That was just the point. She could tell the customers about The Exciting Men She Has Known.

"Oh," she said craftily, as if she suddenly understood this suggestion aright, "you mean—I could give the lowdown about the men I've been supporting all these years? In fact, the story might be called: 'The Men I've Supported.' Of course, it's a steal on a Cary Grant idea—he says he's going to give a story some day called, 'The Women I've Been Supporting.' But if he opens his mouth at the wrong time, people ought to steal his ideas. . . . Sure, I'll tell you about Grant and Gable and Stewart —and others. I'll tell you what it's like to be around them, day after day. People might be surprised."

This wasn't exactly what we meant. We didn't want to limit the discussion to the men she met during working hours.

"But," she protested, with elaborate innocence, "the men I've worked with are the most exciting men I've known."



She wouldn't have it any other way. Besides, those brown eyes of hers had a definite gleam in them. She saw prospects of having fun with the topic of her movie loves. And she wasn't going to be cheated out of that fun.

She began by pointing out: "You can't say I wasted any time getting in with the best men. The very first one, for example, was William Powell.

"The occasion of our first get-together was my first picture, 'Evelyn Prentice'—in which I played the second feminine lead. And I might not be on the screen today, if it weren't for Bill. I learned more from him than from anyone else I've encountered in Hollywood.

"I have him catalogued in my little black book as the understanding, sympathetic type. The amused father-confessor.

SCREEN SPECIALISTS . . .

PROFESSIONAL WRITER . . .

NUNNALLY JOHNSON looked at the movies and concluded that, if this was all they wanted, his child Nora could do as well, and he could improve on Nora. The inquiry was pursued in no spirit of bumptiousness, but with the impersonal logic of a scientist and in the interests of a flattened pocketbook. Now that he's turned out such bell-ringers as "House of Rothschild," "Chad Hanna" and "Grapes of Wrath," he still considers scenario writing a pipe and sings hallelujahs for the invention of celluloid.

At eight he decided to be a journalist because he'd read a book about Richard Harding Davis and didn't want to work as hard as his father, a railroad man in Columbus, Georgia. His first job on a Savannah paper was interrupted by the war. His last order as a lieutenant to one Corporal Steese, assistant city editor of the New York Tribune, was to get him a spot on that sheet. After years as reporter and columnist on various New York papers, he quit to write short stories on the theory that they'd give him more leisure and freedom to work where he pleased.

He says there are two kinds of writers, amateurs and professional. An amateur may be brilliant like James Thurber, but circumscribed to his own field. The mark of a professional is adaptability. Give him a charade or an epic, he'll study its basic structure and grind out a reasonable facsimile. Johnson's a professional. He adapted himself successively to the formulas of True Confessions, Smart Set and The Saturday Evening Post. In '29 his bankbook shrank with the story market. That's when he began dissecting movies. Evidently Paramount made him a grudging offer which he translates roughly as: "If you'll pound at the gate on a certain Monday morning, we may let you in." He had to borrow sixty dollars for fare. Three years later Zanuck took and hung on to him.

He's been associate producer on his own picture for five years and considers it the ideal arrangement for a writer. Zanuck gives him an assignment, they talk it over and don't see each other again till the script is finished. He regards conferences as so much waste motion and staggers his set and fashion designers by admitting they know their stuff better than he does. He says the best producer is one who leaves his writer alone, and the best writer one who asks his producer no questions. If he has a favorite among his own scripts, it's "Bulldog Drummond Strikes Back." Currently he's working on "Chicago." As opposed to those who wait for inspiration, he's strictly a businessman writer who comes in at ten, hangs up his hat, works till the five o'clock whistle blows, puts on his hat and goes home.

He's tall, trim, faintly faunish-looking and retains his Geo'gia drawl. His close friends range back to newspaper days, and his idea of a pleasant evening is to sit, read, talk and have a few drinks. He used to exercise under protest till he managed to dig up a doctor in good standing who said it was wrong to exercise after forty. His sports activities are now confined to dabbling a toe in the pool once a week to see if it's wet.

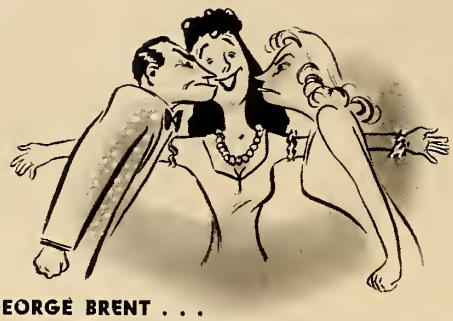
His wife is Dorris Bowdon, who played Rosasharn in "Grapes of Wrath" and is mildly interested in returning to work, if she ever gets their Holmby Hill house thoroughly furnished. Of two daughters by a former marriage, Marjorie's a recent bride, Nora's bringing her dog to spend the summer. Nunnally maintains that dogs are a nuisance and that he'd gladly pay a man to bring one around twice a week, so that he could discharge his obligation by patting it. When he makes such statements, he carefully avoids the eyes of his own two pooches.

WOMAN MAKES THE CLOTHES . . .

THE SWANK DRESSMAKER designs from thirty to fifty dresses for a season's collection. Edith Head, top fashion designer at Paramount, does as many for a single picture and has six pictures going at once. What saves her from the strait jacket is that she loves to draw, and ideas come to her with ease. She thinks—cheerfully—that all studio designers will eventually go crazy, but meantime they have fun.

Except for the extras, she dresses all the women in Paramount pictures, from star to bit player. Each dress must be not merely a dress, but a unit fitting smoothly into the pattern of the picture. She avoids the bizarre to concentrate on gayety and freshness. To ensure originality, she designs her own fabrics and has them woven, appliquéd or embroidered.

She was teaching French, Spanish and art in a private school in Hollywood, attended by the De Mille and other picture children. With them she visited the studio, whose atmosphere she found as exciting as school was boring. So she took an armful of sketches to Howard Greer, then head designer at Paramount, talked herself into a job and was heartbroken when they didn't send her right out to dress Gloria Swanson. From designing scales for mermaids and butterflies' wings, she was graduated into Westerns, then became junior designer under Travis Banton—a feat unique in the annals of her profession.



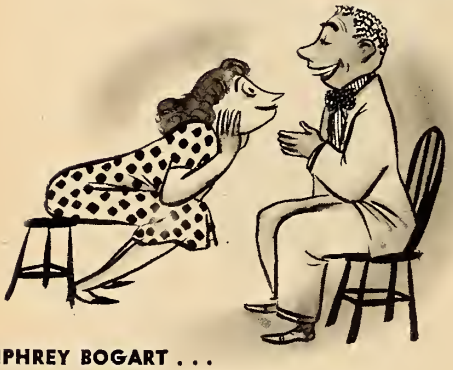
Her first big star was an elephant, for whom she designed the bellyband that supports a palanquin. Her second was Pola Negri. A staff of drapers, cutters, finishers, embroiderers, rising at times to three hundred, carry out her ideas, but she does the designing alone and unprotected. It works like this: She reads the script, confers with producer, director and star, makes her sketches, presents them for approval to producer, director, star, art director, cameraman and—if the picture is in color—to the Technicolor expert. The workroom takes over, preliminary fittings are made on the dummy of the player and at least two fittings on the player herself. Then the clothes are finally tested on the screen.

Miss Head wears bangs, tinted glasses and an air of serenity, and her talk is threaded with humor as lively as the colors she loves. Her principal headache is the necessity for dressing a girl dowdily or in bad taste to meet story requirements. That hurts. Her principal pleasure, apart from the work itself, lies in contact with a variety of stimulating people. She says the most fun she ever had was with Mae West and Charles Laughton, whom she dressed as Nero.

She's married to Wiard Ihnen, art director at Fox. When she wearies of designing clothes for pictures, she'll sketch for the wardrobe of a friend. "For the very same reason," she says, "as sailors buy rowboats."

STYLES IN WILES

THIRTEEN MEN TELL GLADYS HALL WHAT THEY LIKE ABOUT WOMEN!

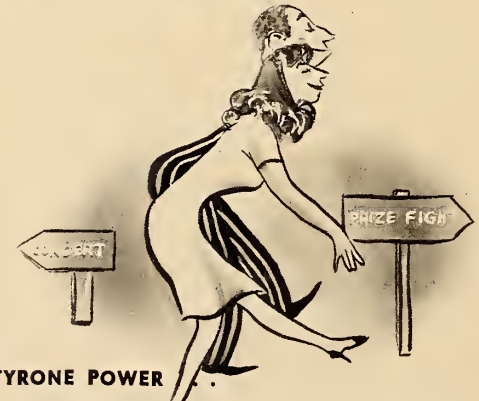


GEORGE BRENT . . .

"For my money, the woman who can say the right thing at the right time, relieve tight domestic situations—she is Venus' fly-trap. Men hate being embarrassed. Therefore, the woman who spares them embarrassment is the winnah! Besides, if a woman hasn't got a feminine, intuitive mind, she can't have feminine appeal."

JOHN SUTTON . . .

"To be, or seem to be, completely feminine is the most delightful of all woman's wiles. They must wear feminine clothes, speak in soft voices, achieve a slightly timid manner. It may well be more wile than Nature nowadays, but if that be true, give us this day our daily wiles!"



HUMPHREY BOGART . . .

"There's one particular feminine come-on that I appreciate the most. It's the girl who is a good listener—or pretends she is. The wiliest woman ever made of sugar and spice is the one who flatters a man with her full and undivided attention. The pay-off usually is that she gets his—for the duration."

CARY GRANT . . .

"A woman's hands get me every time. More than her face, figure, clothes, anything. The girl who, when she smokes, makes the cigarette seem a part of her hand. The girl who, when she kisses you, touches your face with her hands. That always gets me down for the count!"

TYRONE POWER . . .

"The feminine art of giving in gracefully is as appealing a wile as I can think of . . . and as clever a one. If more women would practice it, they'd find more men being equally gallant. It's ladies who insist on having their own way who get it with the least frequency!"

ROBERT STACK . . .

"I guess I'd say that change of temperament is the super-feminine wile to win me. Men get a pack of entertainment watching a woman leap from one mood to another. A poor fellow becomes absolutely dazzled trying to anticipate a chameleon girl's next mood! The unpredictable—that's for me."

GEORGE SANDERS . . .

"I love it when a woman wears an elusive perfume . . . I'm not quite sure where it comes from, what it is . . . want to follow it . . . I love it when a woman knows how to play the piano beautifully . . . so that she can play for me softly in the twilight. . . ."

ERROL FLYNN . . .

"I most admire the wile that enables woman to get her own way, as follows: She tells you what she'd like to do, then makes a brave show of trying to enforce your desires. Being a push-over for unselfishness, you stick out your chest, give in to her, are a sucker—and love it."

JIMMY ELLISON . . .

"I go for the girl who doesn't smoke, doesn't want a career, gets frightened at mice, clings to your arm when you're walking together. It makes a man feel like a man. I love it—and when a girl makes a man feel this way, he'll always love her. . . ."

OTTO KRUGER . . .

"The woman's wile that intrigues me the most? Flattery, with the syrup! The woman who says she hasn't seen you for years but you look 'just the same.' And all the time you're thinking 'Don't give me that stuff.' Actually, what you say—and mean—is 'Really? Tell me more!'"

PHILIP DORN . . .

"The girl who makes a point of knowing a man's mother is the wise and wily lady. A man is searching for his mother's qualities in all other women, and the girl who can make herself most like the mother is the girl he's most liable to love."

CHARLES BOYER . . .

"The charm of woman lies, I think, in her mystery. Perhaps it's the way she dresses. frequently wearing a veil . . . she must make her rendezvous with you in extraordinary places . . . she must not answer questions fully but leave you constantly wondering."

LOUIS HAYWARD . . .

"Wiles? Absolutely none of them. Feminine wiles are painfully obvious. If they weren't, how would you be able to recognize them as wiles? If a man is terribly intrigued with a woman, he'll forgive her her wiles—he'll adore them in fact. He'll be flattered, he'll fall, but—he won't be fooled!"

ACADEMY AWARD AUNT

She takes the cake domestically as well as professionally — that Oscar-winning actress Jane Darwell!

BY JEANNE KARR

To the public at large she's Jane Darwell, this year's Academy Award winner for her heart-warming performance of Ma Joad in "Grapes of Wrath." To Mary and Daphne Ogden, the grandnieces who live with her, she's Aunt Pat. Her real name is Patti Woodard. Her father, who had made the name Woodard important in railroad circles, wasn't too keen about having it transferred to the more spectacular world of the footlights. So a friend said, "Why don't you borrow my maiden name for luck?" Which is what she did.

If you want to see her eyes shine, ask her about the girls. Her speech will be matter-of-fact, even detached, but privately she thinks they're as fine a pair as ever stepped foot into life.

Mary's nineteen—tall, willowy, sweet-faced with dark blue eyes and masses of light brown hair, which she wears in a long bob. Daphne, a year younger, is shorter and thinks she has to diet. Her eyes are like her sister's, but her hair is a glorious mop of burnt copper that people turn to look at when it comes down the street. "It's all right," she admits grudgingly. "But what could be worse than freckles, a turned-up nose and Daphne for a name?"

She's a deadpan Puck, demure amid the hilarity she creates. A couple of years ago her driving ambition was to marry and have a lot of babies. Now she wants to be an actress like Aunt Pat, who's going to send her to the Pasadena Community Playhouse for two years of training after she graduates from North Hollywood High School this summer.

As a model in the school fashion show, she's already won her first notice. "Above all things, remember to walk slowly," Aunt Pat had told her. Daphne paced across the stage, removed the cape of her costume, laid it over her arm, paused smiling before the vice-principal, turned shoulder and hip like the Vyvyan Donner girls in the newsreel and sauntered off. "Daphne Ogden," said the school paper, "was a perfect picture of poise and grace."

She laid it beside Aunt Pat's plate at dinner that night. "A star is born," she announced.

Mary's the dreamer, head in the clouds, dedicated from childhood to the arts. She stares at strangers, murmuring, "That girl has a Botticelli face," spends all her money on Cézanne prints and books about Michelangelo, goes to the Chinouard School and plans to draw for a living. She's not so good at practical things like spelling. "Don't be mizzled," she read thoughtfully from an ad. "Funny. I never heard that word before." The word was misled. "She paralyzes me," says Aunt Pat.

Her second passion is for music. "Do we have to listen to another symphony?" moans Daphne. Or she'll improvise at the piano, while her sister's trying to get to sleep. "That's a daisy pushing up through the grass," she'll call loud enough to be heard through the bedroom door. "Isn't it lovely?"

"Simply beautiful," yells Daphne, to whom it sounds more like a time-bomb. "Better quit now before you spoil it."

She doesn't care for sports, at which Daphne excels, but dances like a dream. "Only by herself, though," adds the irrepressible redhead. "Because she goes out with such arty people, they think dancing's beneath them." To which Mary responds with the indulgent, superior smile one keeps for children.

The fourth member of the household is Uncle Bill, Miss Darwell's older brother. He regards his family with the benevolent humor of a St. Bernard watching puppies at play. He refuses to "go racketing with the girls"—which term includes his sister—and allows himself to be lured out only to the races, where they're all two-dollar plungers. For the (Continued on page 86)

When Jane was a kid, her ambitian to act was nipped in the bud by her socially consciaus parents. Naw she's very careful ta give nieces Daphne and Mary free rein!

YOUR PICTURE IS A RECORD OF YOUR BEAUTY, SO MAKE IT DO YOU JUSTICE

It's important to be photogenic these days, what with candid camera fiends lurking around every corner and best beaus offing to camp with your picture!

To get yourself in condition for a planned or "surprise" photograph take a tip from the experts. The principle of photography, you know, is based on the contrasting of light and shadow, and you can assure yourself of a picture you're proud to have in circulation by using contrasting make-up to bring out your good features.

In making up, always use a foundation base. If your features are irregular, use two, the darker to shadow a too-full jaw or to make a prominent nose, chin or forehead less noticeable. Your regular base is ideal for snapshots and the like, but for portrait photographs, there are special camera foundations that are excellent. However, some of these are too noticeable for street wear. Whatever you choose, begin low at the neckline and pat your base on evenly, carrying it well up to your hairline. Be sure to include those too-often-neglected areas—under the chin, behind the ears, back of the neck and around the eyes.

Unless you use a special powder-type foundation, spread powder on evenly over your base, and here again, it's desirable to use two shades. Be sure that they blend softly into each other so that there is no tattle-tale line of demarcation. Then dust off the excess with a piece of tissue or a special brush to give your face a soft, matlike finish.

Rouge creates shadows, you know, and like foundation, can play down prominent cheekbones or a too-full face, if applied expertly. A careless job, however, will give your face hollows where you least want them. For a planned photograph where special camera make-up is used, rouge is generally omitted.

Your lips will be lovely and natural looking in your finished photograph if you use a deep, clear red lipstick. Model your lips carefully, making them wider or shorter, fuller or thinner, to give your face better proportion. If they're too heavy, use a medium (Continued on page 84)

LIP TIPS ON LOVELINESS

A lip pencil or speciol brush moy be used to outline or reshope lips. Lipstick is then filled in and shorp edges rubbed off.

"Dear Miss Carter: I'm fifteen years old, and I want to use lipstick. My girl friends do, and I look so unattractive without it—but my family objects. Won't you please help me?" "Dear Miss Carter: When should a girl begin to wear lipstick? I live in a small town and am fourteen years of age. Please advise me." "What shade of lipstick should I choose for my very first?" writes a sixteenster from Fort Worth. "Please tell me when I should and should not use lipstick. I am seventeen and live in the suburbs of a big city," writes another little sub-deb friend of ours.

Dear teensters, sub-debs and all you in-betweensters, you have our heartfelt sympathy for those quandaries of yours! We know! Big sisters, brothers, parents, girl and boy friends all take pains to advise you of their own particular attitude about lipstick. When they're through, you just don't know where you're at!

One reason for all the confusion is that there aren't any universal rules set up for teen-age girls. There are so many factors involved—general appearance, social habits, size and type of community—that make-up habits are of necessity highly individualized.

If you're poised and sophisticated for your age and live in a city for example, the answer will be altogether different from the counsel we'd give to girls who are decidedly youthful in appearance, lead a sheltered rural life where social life is extremely conservative.

One rule which does apply to all of you, though, is putting on lipstick artistically and with finesse before you risk your first public appearance. You'll save embarassing moments this way. Lipstick colors range from natural or changeable shades through pale, rosy tints, clear, true reds and on into a variety of blue-reds and orange-reds right down to the deeper, heavier brown-reds.

There's more of a knack to applying lipstick than creams, powders and all the other cosmetics put together. Consequently a girl's got to develop a technique if she's going to avoid that torrent of criticism from friends and relatives.

We're more concerned about how you wear your lipstick than on which mouth make-up you decide. For cosmetics of all kinds are practically foolproof these days what with the U. S. Government bureaus of standards and research fine-combing every product that gets near cosmetic counters. The government controls the colors used, and the manufacturers spend actual fortunes on research to make sure that no color or perfume can in any way conflict with little pet allergies or idiosyncrasies you may have.

In applying lipstick, always start and finish with a clean face. Almost all lipsticks have an under-tint which makes them lasting, but which, left on the lips, will interfere with the next coat. If possible, wash and cold cream your lips before applying lip make-up. At least wipe them well with a tissue. If you have difficulty removing color which has extended beyond the lip line, try a bit of peroxide on a tissue or puff of cotton.

There are two methods of applying lipstick. No. 1: Start in the center of your upper lip and work out to the corners. No. 2: Begin at the corners and color toward the center. While you're doing the job, keep your mouth open with a slightly smiling expression so you'll completely cover the inside edges as well as the outside. Now press your lips together and transfer any excess color to the lower one. Then blot (Continued on page 91)

After pressing both lips together to transfer any excess, blot lips with tissue. This assures a neat, natural look.

Powdering lightly over the finished job sets lip rouge and gives that soft mat-like finish so becoming to young girls for daytime wear.

At recent USO benefit, Janie Withers did a swing version of the "Hut Sut Song" (arranged by the very smitten Buddy Pepper). Gene Autry (in one of his 65 sombreros) sang "Mexicali Rose."

WE APOLOGIZE!

There appeared in the February, 1941, issue of Modern Screen an item by Sylvia Kahn, Hollywood reporter of said magazine, as follows:

ERROL SKINFLYNNT?

An ancient mining engineer, recently returned from the far-away Indies, reports a revolution fomenting in romantic British Guiana. The cause of the trouble, he tells us, is Hollywood's own Errol Flynn who vagabonded through that country before becoming a famous movie star. Our engineer asserts Errol borrowed dough from practically every explorer, miner and native on the island, used his gleanings to pay his steamship fare to America—and, to date, hasn't kicked back a cent! The boys in Guiana didn't mind for the first few years, but they've run into lean times of late and could use the money. They claim they've written Errol on several occasions and asked for it, but they've had no response. This department is fond of Errol and wouldn't want to see anything happen to him. That's why we're tipping him off, here and now, the gang is planning to finance a trip for one among them who will come to these shores and personally put the bee on his neglectful old-time pal!"

This publication hereby desires to correct the misstatements made about Mr. Flynn in said article. As a matter of fact, the story is entirely without foundation, nor was Mr. Flynn ever in British Guiana. Thus, the entire report was inadvertently based upon misinformation.

It's costing Roy Rogers $1,500 to put his beautiful sky blue trailer back into shape. He came back to Republic from a personal appearance tour with 560 fan names scratched, gouged or scribbled on the sides with penknife, lipstick and pencil. We hear that in one town, super-enthusiastic fans dispersed a whole platoon of coppers who tried to stop them.

Bank Knight

For Warner's young Mr. William Justus, the big time should have been years away. And it would have been if Bette Davis hadn't wandered into a movie house on Hollywood Boulevard. Who she wondered, was that wonderful young man in the "short"? Next day Bette reported to her bosses all a-bubble. Her discovery must have a screen test. She couldn't remember his name. But that didn't matter. Okay, said the studio, mindful of Davis discoveries of the past. And the rest must have seemed like a dream to young William. Pleasant-faced, deep-voiced, he's Richard Travis now, and you'll see him in a big fat introductory role: the newspaperman in the much-discussed "The Man Who Came to Dinner"—all because Bette Davis went to a movie one day.

Broncho Bust-up

It's usually the svelte-profiled leading man who takes it on the chin and other places when the script calls for a bit of horse-wrangling. But not so with strapping 190-pound George Montgomery! Born the youngest of a family of 15 children on a ranch near Brady, Mont., in 1916, he's been bringing home rodeo trophies since he was knee high to a jack rabbit. Forking a bronco for a scene in Twentieth Century-Fox's "Riders of the Purple Sage," he found the animal spiritless, gave him a healthy clip to wake him up. It did. That George Montgomery is still puzzled over that Cocoanut Grove mystery? Invited to a party for the "Badlands of Dakota" cast, he brought along Ann Rutherford. "An Obliging Young Lady" is a tailor-made title for Ruth (Mrs. Citizen Kane) Warrick. Right off the bat she meets her leading man, goes into a love scene with him. "Did you mind?" we asked her on the RKO set. "No," grinned Ruth, "the same thing happened when I met my husband" . . . Sea-loving Stirling Hayden chafed so at his 7-year Paramount contract bonds that the studio's advancing $15,000-$20,000 to help him buy a boat. At this writing, Stirling's got his eye on something 120 feet long! . . . Metro producer Carey Wilson has piled up an amazingly complete collection of high school text books. When Warner publiciteasers begged him for intimate life tips for a build-up, Dick warned wisely: "Wait until the fans see me in 'New Orleans Blues.' If they like me, then go ahead." . . . It took three deep-dyed exec conferences to figure out every possible way of quick-changing Humphrey Bogart from villain to good guy for "The Maltese Falcon." For the first time, he wears pressed pants and a necktie in every scene, had two hair-pieces added to his own slick locks to make him look as respectable as possible . . . That little iron door-knob Ida Lupino's been sporting around town on every possible ensemble was designed by Marjorie Cummings, wife of M-G-M Producer Jack Cummings. There's a little gold padlock on the thing, and guess who has the key? Louis Hayward, of course—on a watch fob . . . That stranger M. C. Bob Hope had to hand a prize to as Calcutta Sweepstakes winner at the Hollywood Park Turf Club Gold Cup Ball (Britain benefit) was Alfred Wright, the lad who wrote that nasty piece about Bob in Time magazine . . . We stopped Mother-to-be Veronica Lake in a Paramount hallway. Grinning prettily from under that hank of blonde hair, she announced: "John (Dellie) and I are going off in a car somewhere about a month after the baby comes. Don't ask me where—we're just going for a whole month." . . . Michele Morgan named herself after "J.P.," wanted to prefix an American-sounding "Mike" to it but was persuaded to use the Gallic feminine equivalent . . . Life isn't always a bed of roses for celluloid's lovelies. Dorothy g-Lamour got up at 4, returned at 8, for 45 solid days during location shooting of "Her Jungle Mate" . . . Just a few days after Claudette Colbert rented a house at Santa Monica for peace and quiet, workmen began banging out a home-stead for Jack Warner right next door . . . Take no stock in that bambino-to-be of the Robert Prestons. Like everyone else, rumor-starter Jimmie Fidler mistook Bob for Preston Sturges. Preston Foster, also a top Paramounter, complicates the name situation even further . . . If and when Glenn Ford marries, it will probably be Chile-born, star-in-the-making Evelyn Ankers. Three Rings

The Powder Room Prophets have three new Hollywood marriages to work on. Between lipstick daubings, they'll tell you anything you want to know about the Gene Tierney-Oleg Cassini, Kathryn Grayson-John Shelton and Brenda Marshall-Bill Holden alliances. The same gal who predicted divorce for Lana Turner and Artie Shaw the minute she heard they were married, regretfully announces to anyone who will listen that she feels the same way about the Tierney-Cassini hitching and bases her opinion on "circumstantial evidence." Didn't she see Gene spend more than $50 in small coins calling her parents in the East from the phone booth at Mocambo? And weren't Gene's allergic-to-chocolate eyes turned reproachfully on her husband during the entire conversation? . . . The Grayson-Shelton tie-up is a little tougher to tab. Kathryn has been kept out of the public eye while M-G-M built up the "sweet young thing" angle, but 19-year-old Zelma Hedrick (her real name) has a mind of her own. She realizes all the studio has done for her in preparing her for stardom, but if they're determined to make another Durbin of her, she doesn't see why she can't successfully pattern her private life after Deanna's, too . . . The Marshall-Holden marriage is the only one of the three that gets the "blessings on you, my children" routine from the local gossips. Hollywood, for all of its streamlined glamour and quick romances, is still an old-fashioned town in lots of ways. It beams benignly on long engagements, forgets that they are long in most cases because either person concerned is waiting for his final divorce decree from another!

R. I. P.

The gloom around the Flynn ménage was thicker than a Yorkshire pudding the day Errol's beloved Schnauzer, Arno, was found dead on a California beach. Errol and Arno were two of a kind: Arno was often called the "Errol Flynn of the canine world." The pooch took orders from no one but his lord and master, came and went as he pleased and was the only dog allowed on the Warner Bros. lot. Death stepped in the night he jumped off Flynn's yacht for a swim, and there was no way back for the dog who once jumped from a moving train and delayed a première-going party an entire hour while Flynn hunted for him.

Red Skelton

Red's the only guy in Hollywood who can mix comedy with sex appeal in equal doses. He débuted as a comedian at the age of 10 in a medicine show . . . Has been a minstrel man on a river-plowing showboat, clown with the Hagenbeck-Wallace circus, master of ceremonies at walkathons, night club entertainer, radio comedian, vaudeville funnyman . . . Won't answer a telephone, 'cause the sound of a voice coming over the wire makes him break out in a red rash . . . Always carries expensive cigars and collects pipes but has never smoked . . . Does a perfect imitation of a drunk but has yet to taste liquor . . . Acts like an extrovert, thinks like an introvert . . . Is 6' 2½", weighs 190 lbs., has copper-red hair, dark brown eyes and dimples . . . Once ate half a dozen doughnuts six times a day during a vaudeville tour that lasted weeks (as part of his act) . . . Still likes 'em . . . Loves prize fights, swimming, home-made movies . . . Hired a tutor to work with him between acts when he was on tour, so he could catch up on his education . . . Likes to buy broken-down homes and remodel them.

Death of a Heroine

Three men in shirt sleeves sat huddled around a battered table. The shades were drawn, the air hot and heavy with smoke. A pile of cigarette butts rose from one to three inches before anyone spoke. "We can't just murder a sweet kid like that!" growled one. "Honest, she's grown on me like a sister or something." "We've got to," grumbled a guy with a two day's growth of beard. "She's getting too big for her own shoes." Another silence. Then the third man spoke. His eyes were half-closed in dreamy speculation. "Maybe we could do it a nice way. How about accidental carbon monoxide poisoning? Or we could slit her throat while she's sleeping." Somewhere a clock chimed twelve. The man with the beard pushed back his chair with a noise that made the others jump. "Let's talk about this after lunch, boys." He yawned and stretched. "Laraine Day may be getting too important for that job as Dr. Kildare's nurse. But the fans like her. Maybe we'll have to leave her in the story after all."

Ballyhoo's Who

Let Garbo stub her toe, let Lana Turner's hair-do go into an upsweep . . . if it happens in Hollywood, it's news—and even if it doesn't happen, local Winchells aren't above dreaming up something to titillate the public. All they need is a shred of a rumor. A recent issue of The Hollywood Reporter, filmland bible that graces every breakfast table and soda fountain in town, ran this case in point: "Ellington Joins Welles," said the headline. "Orson Welles," the story continued, "has made a deal with Duke Ellington to collaborate with him on an original. First half of the action in the projected work deals entirely with colored people; latter half with whites." We were intrigued. Here was a rare combination of genius. We checked further. Sure enough, the boys had been dreaming again. The facts: Messrs. Welles and Ellington had met one night for the first time. Said the Duke: "Mr. Welles, I think you're a hot fella." Orson beamed. "I think you're a hot fella, too. We'll have to make a picture together some time." Of such scraps is filmland news fashioned! . . . While on the same subject: a local columnist with space to fill announced in one startling line that Corporal Jimmy Stewart had left his plane in Olivia de Havilland's safe-keeping when he went off to the army. The reaction left Olivia gasping. His agent, (Continued on page 102)

Now that the Johnny Paynes are three, and reportedly going on four, they're moving from their 5-room love nest into a house in Brentwood near the Gary Coopers.

Just when the matchmakers had Olivia de Havilland practically middle-aisling with Bob Stack, didn't we catch her conga-ing with Gene Markey—two nights in a row!

Smart ways to

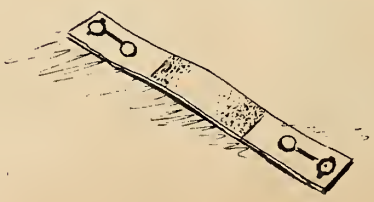
I always envy the beauty editor because each month she gives you so many helpful suggestions on how to make the most of yourself. How to keep your skin smooth, make your eyes sparkle, your hair lustrous and all the rest, which is very fine!

Meanwhile, I show you what we all like to see—new clothes. But in between beauty and the dress, there are various little things for you to do and use which will help you to look as well-groomed as attractive, young stars like Susan Hayward or Gene Tierney.

Did you ever stop to think how many times in a year you put on a new dress? Not many, actually. Even if money is no object, you usually have certain favorites which you wear and wear. And unless you are getting married or have lost everything in a fire, your clothes are seldom brand new from head to toe.

Yet people look at you every day in the year and what they see and remember is you as a whole, not just the bright new sweater, a felt bag, a feather hat or even the pretty face that goes with it. All right, then, let's take time out from fashions and briefly run through what you can do—and easily—to make you look the way you want others to see you.

Do you have a mirror? I mean a really good, full-length mirror placed where you can face yourself in a strong, clear light? If you have, fine; otherwise invest. You probably can find one in a second-hand shop and paint it yourself to match your room. Just be sure it is not wavy!



You love suits, of course, and that means blouses and sweaters. Do you have trouble keeping your blouse down inside your skirt? Your tucking-in days are over if you insert a Kleinert garment gripper in the waistband of your skirt. The strip of rubber stretches as you place it, then on contracting, it grips the blouse and the most strenuous moving about will not lift the blouse from where it belongs. In other words, you will no longer appear to be coming apart.

Do you have your own clothes brush and suede shoe brush? Not just family ones that never can be found? Be fastidious about them, keep them clean and use them even more often than seems necessary.

You know that whatever is attractive as well as handy has a way of getting used often. Well, why not buy, or more fun, make a fancy box like the one shown here and put in it all the gadgets you need for cleaning—shoe polish, cleaning powder and cleaning fluid for removing those little spots. Incidentally, remember what was spilled, don't wait long to clean the spot, and read the directions carefully so you won't ruin your dress. There is much you can do at home to keep your clothes in order, but when a dress really needs professional cleaning, don't hang onto it—go ahead and send it to the cleaner. The money is well spent, and the dress will be back, clean and fresh, in three or four days at the most.

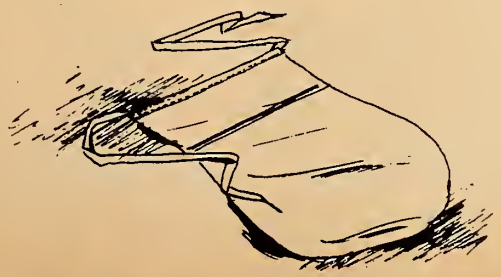
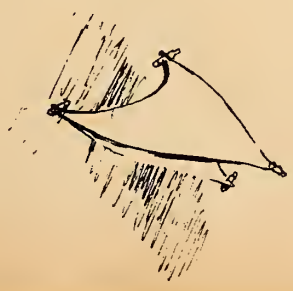
What about an electric iron? Yes, you have one, but is it handy so you press your dress or is it such an effort to untangle from the kitchen cupboard that you decide the dress can go another day? Sometimes, you know, all the difference between looking really well-groomed and looking so-so, is a creased neckline, a wrinkled sleeve or pleats that are not quite pleated. For pleated skirts or plain ones, Kleinert's skirt shields are invaluable for resisting skirt wrinkles.

While it seems as unnecessary these days to mention dress shields as to tell you to brush your teeth, the Kleinert Nu-Pin shields are an important aid to good grooming—so easily removed for washing and so easily pinned in again. With your new woolen dresses this fall, you have to be even more careful about your fresh dress shields than with washable summer clothes.

How is your sewing kit? So complete that you have every possible color of thread in case a shoulder strap breaks, a seam rips or a hem catches? You just don't pin up a hem if you really want to be well-groomed! All right, forgive me for that one. Do all your dresses have zippers? If not, go buy some in the right colors and sew them in. It isn't difficult and makes all the difference in your appearance. You probably use the old but effective trick of collecting attractive buttons to replace the ones that came on the dress. If a snap or hook and eye is needed at the collar or waist to make a better fit, do you bother to put it there? If your dress droops at the shoulder, do you fix it with the right shape shoulder pads?*





And now, if you make your own clothes, do you see to it that they really fit you? You've seen pictures of dress forms for Bette Davis and other stars. You, too, can have a dress form. Made at your sewing center of a wonderful thermoplastic material, the form is quickly molded on you like a second skin. Then when it hardens, the form keeps its shape, your shape rather, and your clothes can be fitted in a truly custom-made manner.

When you wear hats, remember to keep them brushed and their veils pressed and when you go hatless, keep your locks in place with a pretty barrette, a Grip-Tuth retainer which holds your curls, or if you're young enough, a ribbon bow. In fact, have a collection of ribbon bows in every color.

What else? Now that you are well-groomed, it's time to take a last look in that long mirror. Your stocking seams are straight, your slip doesn't show, and you like what you see . . . so off you go to meet the people!

wears a wedding ring.

Victor glanced at the man sitting next to Martha.

"Your husband, I presume?"

It wasn't subtle. But it worked. Martha's green-blue eyes widened slightly, and she said, without expression:

"My husband is dead."

Victor Mature said, "I'm sorry," and the girl said it was all right. She had a voice, he decided dizzily, like one angel asking another angel the time of day.

After a while he asked her what she did for a living. She said she modeled hats. Victor Mature said:

"I knew you worked. I'm not a ball of fire at sizing people up. But you—I could tell you worked. I mean—you don't belong in this crowd.

MARTHA KEMP looked at Victor Mature very carefully. She really saw him. It was the first time she'd really seen anything—anything real, outside of herself—for—how many months was it now?

She said: "So you can tell?"

"Yes. I mean—that's nothing against the Park Avenue element. Some of my best friends and so on. But they don't have much grip on things, do they?

"Yes."

When he asked her to have dinner with him, she said she would.

Going out with Martha wasn't like anything that had ever happened to Victor Mature before.

As he followed her through the swinging glass door at the Stork Club that same night, he knew quite suddenly what heaven would be. It would begin as the Stork Club did—with a flash of many mirrors and Martha in them, smiling, tilting up her face to him. It would be a loud, crowded room with a discreetly restrained decor and a less restrained crowd. A crowd of writers, linoleum manufacturers, playboys, big name bandleaders, politicians, playgirls, columnists, Hollywood moguls, advertising executives and auto men from Detroit. All looking as much alike as the extras in a Chinese mob scene. Only Martha wearing a real face, a real smile and saying real things. . . .

But Martha, in heaven, would be a little different than she was that night! She would never, for one thing, forget you were there. She'd never stare somberly into her drink and forget to answer you. She'd laugh—the same way—oftener.

Funny, how many people knew her. Victor had never been jealous in his twenty-eight years. He'd thought of jealousy, always, as a pretty comic state.

They went to the El Morocco later. And Fefe's Monte Carlo after that. Victor had made the same rounds nightly for months. It was good business. With a Broadway hit on your hands and a flock of movies coming up, it's a good idea to be seen . . . and an easier way to get your name in the papers than getting hit by a street car.

For months then, he'd been doing it. But not with a green-eyed, white-faced, sad-faced, sweet-faced girl. Not in a state of daze with his mind like a dead motor and his heart like a fire engine.

Victor talked a lot about himself that night. It was screwy (everyone knows that now), but the way he figured, she had to know everything there was about him. But all he had to know about her was what she looked like. And the way she listened, while the pupils of her eyes got big and dark. . . .

Victor talked about Louisville—grinding knives and jerking sodas and simonizing cars. There was a story he could have told about a dance—but he didn't. Because that was nobody's business but his—not even Martha's.

Victor, as he'll be the first to tell you, wasn't too bright about it. He might as well have told about the dance—because he made her know, even that first night—so exactly what he felt about "the Park Avenue element." He got on that fascinating subject at 2:00 o'clock at El Morocco, and she was still listening, with the pupils of her eyes very large and dark and her face very pink when they came out of Monte Carlo about 3:40 A. M.

She wouldn't let him take her home. That was a funny thing when you come to think of it. But if she was ashamed of the dinky two rooms that she lived in, well, Victor could understand that, too.

He put her in a cab and asked huskily: "Tomorrow night, maybe?"

"No. Not tomorrow night."

"Wednesday then? Thursday?"

Thursday, maybe. He could meet her at Sally Victor's where she worked. And what was her name again? "Martha Kemp," she told him. That should have done it. That should have rung a bell. But it never occurred to Victor to connect her with a handsome bandleader and sudden death and screaming headlines. He didn't connect her with anything. She was just Martha and no questions asked.

VICTOR MATURE did a matinée Thursday. And thirty stenographers came backstage in a delegation that his press agent had organized, and he kissed ten of them for cameras, and it was supposed to be good publicity. It got, for some reason, on his nerves. . . .

Thursday night Martha talked more. Victor found out that she'd loved her husband rather extravagantly. And that the night he died it was like "looking at a red brick wall without any windows that would be there for good. I don't know if that makes much sense. . . ."

He found out that she'd been left with a ten-month-old child.

It only went on for two weeks in all. But it happened so darn fast. And he thought she liked him. He thought that when she started to say things like:

"What do you really know about me, Victor? You've built up something you like—but what makes you think it's got anything at all to do with me?"

She was terribly shy. Though you might not guess it if you saw her cool friendly manner in the niteries—and all the people who knew her . . . and her greeting them . . . you wouldn't know unless she tried to talk about herself and got scarlet and inarticulate instead, and gave it up.

She must have known that he wanted to marry her when it happened. He'd pulled his punches, of course, because two weeks is no time at all, and there was still the ghost of a dead happiness in her eyes for any fool to see. . . .

But she must have known. The way Victor figured it afterwards, comparing her to the Louisville girl, he'd already asked Martha to dance when she slapped his face.

It happened on a Friday morning.

She'd been unusually silent the night before. But what did that mean?

The letter came special delivery, Friday, June 6th. It said, in essence, thanks for a lot of fun, Victor, but this is goodbye. I'm leaving for a visit to Chicago. It was all there in black and white. Everything he should have known about her if he'd had any sense. She was Martha Stephenson Kemp of Park Avenue. Post-débutante, alumna of Miss Porter's and Miss Spence's. Hal Kemp's widow. She'd modeled hats for fun. It was all there. And then at the end in her small, well-bred hand, "All this should show you that I'm not the kind of person you imagined me or the kind you want. And so goodbye."

"You dirty son of a common knife-grinder—how dare you?"

That's what Victor saw in that letter. Say he was whacky. Or say that he was simply a very proud and sensitive young man. Anyway, remember that for Martha he'd let himself feel what some men never feel for a woman—and most men not more than once in their lives. And he had, after all, been banged in the nose pretty hard—and Martha had made it pretty plain that the bang was not unconnected with her social position.

They tell stories about how Victor blew up. About his not recognizing people—about the night he ran amuck and tried to cancel his contracts with United Artists and RKO for two new flickers. They say the screwiest thing was the way his face changed.

But people didn't know Victor Mature. Even his best friends were a little too civilized to be able to understand exactly what he had felt for Martha Kemp, and even they had never known what fundamentally Victor was like.

When pieces of the story leaked out afterwards, they said he went to Chicago to make it up with her.

That's not true.

He went to Chicago to administer a slap.

By asking around a little he found out the name of Martha's Chicago friends. It wasn't what you'd call hard, finding out about Martha. If he'd asked before—if he hadn't been walking in a blindness and a fever—well, the whole thing needn't have been.

It struck Victor Mature forcibly that the child playing on the sunporch looked like Martha Kemp. Hair, eyes, complexion—just the same. There was one big difference. Baby Kemp was a gurgling, an almost ecstatically happy creature. Whereas Martha—Martha with her haunted eyes . . . but Victor didn't want to think about that. He had his performance to think of.

He didn't stand when she came in. He merely grinned and asked just as he'd rehearsed it:

"H'yah, honeybunch—surprised?"

"Yes," said Martha Kemp faintly. Her face was pink. "What are you doing in town?"

"Family ties, sugar. My brother from Louisville is here, and I came over to meet him. So I thought I'd drop in and say hello."

"Oh."

He was pulling the letter out of his pocket.

"Also, I thought I'd see if you could decode this for me! It's a little over my head."

Martha was no longer pink. She was white.

"I thought it was—plain enough."

There are critics who don't appreciate Victor Mature as a serious actor. They should have seen him then.

"Honey, I'm a dope, and I admit it. But just what is all the shooting about. I mean—say, Martha, you didn't think I was playing for keeps, did you?"

It was perfect.

Martha had been sitting with one foot under her in an immense wicker chair. As she stood up, slowly, she seemed suddenly very tall. Victor had to remind himself that the top of her head didn't reach his shoulder.

"You were playing for keeps," Martha said slowly. "Oh, yes, you were! And this corny act of yours isn't fooling me. You're saying all this to hurt me."

Victor felt cold—in his hands and feet, especially. He didn't feel up to moving or answering. Or taking his eyes from that straight black and white figure with the shining, furious eyes.

"You think you've got the right to despise me, don't you, Victor? Because I'm myself—and not the girl you thought up and wanted me to be. Oh, I could feel you trying to force me to be somebody else—all the time we were together!"

"Listen, you—" Victor began. His deep and slightly ragged voice didn't sound like his. Martha didn't let him finish.

"You listen! I wouldn't marry you if you were the last man on earth! I wouldn't marry anyone now—I wouldn't do that to Hal's memory—that's why I came away. But now—now I'm telling you, even if it weren't for Hal, I wouldn't marry a rotten snob who came a thousand miles to hurt me. Yes—that got you, didn't it?" she added, with a gloating fury as she watched him whiten, "you don't think of yourself as a snob, do you? But you are! In reverse. And a bully. And I'm ashamed of myself that I ever—that I ever—that I ever—get out of here, will you?"

And then Victor stood up. He crossed the room and took her by the elbows—

"That you ever what?" he asked.

But Martha Kemp was crying. Silently, with big tears that spilled helplessly over each other and tasted salt when Victor kissed her.

* * * *

The wedding was at 957 Park Avenue, Martha's mother's home. It was planned originally for City Hall, because the bride thought that the groom would prefer it there. But Victor said that 957 was her home, wasn't it? And was she ashamed of her home, or what? And Martha cried again.

All of which is the strange, and not very gay story of how Victor Mature married the girl he loved. And the only thing that anyone knows, now, about Victor and Martha is the way they look, when they're together. Which is something to make the most hardened characters, like this writer, feel like sneaking off for a good long cry. . . .

They should be happy! Vic's got a 5-year contract with 2 companies!

MOVIE SCOREBOARD

200 pictures rated this month

Turn to our valuable Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. The "general rating" is the average rating of our critic and newspaper critics all over the country. 4★ means very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. C denotes that the picture is recommended for children as well as adults. Asterisk shows that only Modern Screen rating is given on films not yet reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

Why I switched to Meds

—by a doctor's wife

As a doctor's wife, I've known about internal sanitary protection for a long time—and used it. Then, I recently heard that Modess had brought out Meds—a new and improved tampon! I tried Meds—and believe me, they are a discovery! Such comfort! Meds make you feel as free as on any other day. And such grand protection—because Meds are the only tampons, with the "safety center." And best of all, Meds cost only 20¢ a box of ten, an average month's supply—only 98¢ a bargain box of sixty! No other tampons in individual applicators cost so little!

MY SISTER AND I

plexion. Priscilla has the boyish figure. Mine is the feminine model. I admire her hair. She pretends to envy what I call with maidenly modesty my limbs.

In disposition and temperament we go our own way pretty much. Priscilla is the one who knows exactly what she wants. I'm the one who's undecided but searching. Priscilla is full of imagination and creativeness: she writes poems, for instance. I'm not quite so full of imagination or not nearly brimming over with creativeness: I write letters, for instance. They do not sound as clever as those written by Dorothy Parker. Priscilla's a lass who loves to be alone. I'm a somebody who prefers being around people and in the middle of excitement. Priscilla wouldn't cross the street to see a bullfight. Me—I'd hop over the hedge and scale an 18-foot fence. Priscilla's the insomniac. I sleep until hit on the head with a baseball bat.

OUR tastes, naturally, do not follow parallel lines. Take the matter of clothes. In this department we have been the despair of fans and well-wishers who have nursed the frail hope that some fine day we would dress like a sister act ought to dress, which, I suppose, means like identical twins.

And yet . . .

Back in Indianola when Priscilla was in grade school (and Rosemary, too) she was a miniature Lady Mendl. Count that day lost when she didn't affect three changes of costume daily, from hair ribbon to shoes, including slip.

How times have changed!

Today the subject of clothes leaves Priscilla cold, so cold, as a matter of fact, that biennially she has to be dragooned into making a shopping tour and picking up some new items. Even at that, a good many of her numbers never get to see the light of day. At home, more than not, she lolls around in blue jeans. But with gusto!

Me, I'm a dress-designer's best friend and the mortal foe of my budget. If I'm not held in check when I pass I. Magnin's in Hollywood or Bergdorf Goodman's in New York, I'm apt to go berserk and try to buy the establishment. Sometimes I wonder if even my feeble efforts aren't futile. Priscilla is sure to end up by "borrowing" the favorite items in my wardrobe anyhow—especially when I want to wear them.

When it comes to behavior as a sister team, we would baffle a grade-A psychologist. Priscilla is the even-tempered one who takes life in her stride, makes decisions and never looks back. I'm the mademoiselle who's always asking Tom, Dick and Harry for advice and winding up all mixed up, at which sorry point I play a hunch and land right side up, mostly. Priscilla is always Priscilla, which means that a picture of her last year, today and a year from now will look like the same girl. I'm the one who's always changing my make-up, my hairdo or what have you. Last year I was a raven-haired brunette. This year of grace 1941 I'm a redhead, as you may have gathered by now.

Emotionally Pat is the deep and silent type who stores up pent feelings inside of her until she treks to the desert at Yucco Loma as a sort of escape valve. Mine are apt to come out in a mild rage or a crying fit.

Pat is the one who's hard to make friends with. But once you do, you have a friend for life. Whom she loves she loves mightily, so that her friends are few and her acquaintances non-existent. I tend to like people quickly and numerously. Pat doesn't care for small talk. I seem to be forever making trifling conversation.

Maybe you're getting the idea that Pat lives in a world all her own. Maybe she does. But she is quite alive to what this world is all about. With her it's a matter of selection. She knows what she likes and lets the rest go by the board. With Pat there are no acquired tastes, no learning how to like or to do something that she doesn't like or can't do almost automatically.

She could be wonderful in sports if she wanted to. If I happen to be able to beat her in an event or two, it's only because I'm always taking lessons so as to improve my game. Pat wouldn't dream of going about it that way. A natural-born swimmer, she's easily my better. I can trim her just barely in tennis. The differential can be traced to the coaching I've received in the game. In ping pong we're about even. We wouldn't be, though, if I weren't always practicing. I'm a better bowler than Pat is. You guessed it: I've taken lessons.

Pat's indifference to things that aren't second nature with her goes back to the time we were kids. Mother had turned us over to a piano teacher and sat back, I suppose, waiting for us to become piano prodigies. Mother's dream vanished into vapor before the first season was over, when the teacher dropped by to see mother and admitted that paying out good money for Pat's lessons was a waste of money. Naturally, her lessons ended. I managed to stick it out for a few years. Which proves nothing except that Priscilla is allergic to lessons, and I'm not.

PRISCILLA didn't quite finish high school. I did and succeeded in finishing one year of Simpson College, Indianola's pride, where I studied music. Priscilla made fair grades. Mine were disgustingly super. So much so that once when I got an A in a course—science, I think—the rest of the class protested to the professor that he was showing favoritism. Whereupon the good man gave me an oral examination right there before everyone. And I kept my A.

For all this, Priscilla is the wise one, the deep one. I'm the voracious reader. Priscilla is the thinker. I'm the talker. Priscilla is the listener and the spectator.

At the risk of bringing Priscilla's wrath down on me, let me make clear that Pat is no ivory tower dreamer. She can be a miniature saber-toothed tiger when the mood hits her which, glory be, isn't often.

She usually prefers to issue an ultimatum and hope that my natural caution will prevent bloodshed. The sleep situation is a good case in point.

I was born, seems like, one of those imperfect slumberers who need an acre and a half of sleeping space. Unfortunately, this was not even remotely possible during my childhood if for no other reason than that Priscilla and I shared a double-bed. Well, for a while Priscilla put up with my roving bed manners. One night about midnight she shook me good, woke me up.

"Rosemary," she said solemnly, "you are making sleep impossible for me. So what I have decided to do is to draw an imaginary line down this bed so that each of us has her half. Every time you shove any part of yourself over this line, I am going to conk you on the head with a pillow. If that does no good, I'm going to use a shoe."

I hurry to point out that I got religion overnight and became a model sleeper.

Priscilla is not demonstrative. I am. Priscilla, nonetheless, has a fierce family loyalty about her that she has proved at every turn. Beginning with the Fred Waring era when she would go up to Fred and tell him that I ought to be paid more money because there was nobody quite like me (whereas it was actually Priscilla who was the unusual one of the two) and continuing right up to the time I was put under contract by Warners', Priscilla has always been getting in her licks for me. She does it quietly, calmly, where it will do the most good. I'm the opposite. I yip about Priscilla to anyone who will listen, including my mother, who ought to know Pat by now.

Priscilla is not fundamentally a career girl. She wants a husband, a home and a posse of moppets. I'm the optimist who is dead sure she could juggle a career and a home very neatly.

The romantic situation at this writing stacks up as follows: Pat is engaged to John Barry, a country editor, gentleman cowboy and all-around good scout. Description: tall, dark and handsome. I don't know when the marriage will be. I don't think Pat does. As for me, I'm footloose but en garde.

Secret desires? I think that Pat is in secret a stymied poet. She has always been clever at verse-writing. Once I entered one of her poems as my own in a poetry contest and won a prize. I couldn't write a poem to save my soul. My secret desire is to become a success on Broadway if only to prove that I can do it.

Our differences are not without their little ironies. Priscilla hates night clubs but is the niftiest little dancer on the floor when she chooses to cut a rug, as they say. I like the boites occasionally. My dancing I would class as wretched. Priscilla, who hates crowds, always ends up as the life of the party whenever the Lanes entertain. Rosemary, the vivid thing and the one who loves human beings en masse, is swallowed up in the to-do. Priscilla, the nonchalant, reads a lyric over once and remembers it. Rosemary the try-hard works like fury to learn words and forgets them overnight. And so it goes.

A little while back I remember dropping the remark that Priscilla and I were not exactly two peas in a pod. Does anyone dare to doubt me now?

"When I have a baby I'll be different!"

1. My kid sister's cute. Engaged exactly a month and already she's telling me how to raise my baby! "My baby won't be fussed over like yours," she said the other day. "I'll treat my baby like a person—not like a hothouse flower!"

2. "And what," I asked, "makes you think I treat Patsy like a hothouse flower?" "Golly," Sis answered, "look at this row of baby stuff! Special soap, special powder, special oil, and I hear you've even got a special laxative for that little chip!"

3. "Indeed I have a special laxative for Patsy," I retorted. "And I bet you dollars to doughnuts that you'll have a special laxative for your baby, too! I don't spoil Patsy, Sis. I'm bringing her up exactly as the doctor told me to!"

4. "He says a baby's system is delicate. You can't treat it like an adult's. Babies need things especially designed for them—especially the things that go into their little stomachs. That's why they need a special laxative, too. The doctor recommended Fletcher's Castoria."

5. "The doctor said I'd find Fletcher's Castoria thorough—yet it's always mild and safe. It works mostly in the lower bowel so it isn't likely to upset a youngster's digestion. Patsy's crazy about the taste of it, too. I'm going to give her some now. Watch."

6. Patsy took her Fletcher's Castoria like she always does... licking the spoon. Sis grinned and said, "Gee, maybe you've got something there." "You bet I have," I answered. "Patsy's never had a laxative problem, because she always gets Fletcher's Castoria."

HERE IS THE MEDICAL BACKGROUND

Chief ingredient of Fletcher's Castoria is senna.

Medical literature says: (1) In most cases, senna does not disturb the appetite and digestion or cause nausea . . . (2) Senna works primarily in the lower bowel . . . (3) In regulated dosages it produces easy elimination and has little tendency to cause irritation or constipation after use.

Senna is especially processed in Fletcher's Castoria to eliminate griping and thus allow gentle laxative action.

After a hard day's wark an "Week-end in Havana," Cesar picks up at dinner with his favarite Latin dish, "Paella."

Cesar's chaice American menu is chicken craquettes with mush-raam sauce—a pièce de résistance an every gaurmet's list!

Handsome —BUT CAN HE COOK?

By Nancy Archibald

"Emphatically no," says Cesar Romero, but that doesn't keep him from enjoying good food!

Cesar Romero views with alarm the new trend among Hollywood's prettiest career girls. It is said these streamlined darlings now not only expect their escorts to dance divinely and have a smooth line—but they want them to be culinary experts, too! "Today girls go for guys who can swing a mean casserole and toss up a delectable salad while you watch," Romero sighs, "and I'm allergic to kitchen utensils."

Although the handsome star of 20th Century-Fox's "Week-end in Havana" fails as a master chef, when it comes to dining, he's a real epicure. Because his parents are from Cuba and Cesar was born and brought up in New York, his taste is Pan-American. He likes the piquant seasoning of a Latin dish like "Paella" (a combination of fish and rice with a tart Spanish sauce), and equally enjoys the bland flavor of chicken croquettes with creamy mushroom sauce.

SACRED SALAD BOWLS: In Hollywood homes the stars have put salads on a pedestal. Not only because crisp greens contain vitamins, but the ceremony of mixing the salad course at table symbolizes a gracious way of living. The "props" for this feature of the meal have their attraction. Styles in salad bowls are many. Movietown's select favor the old-fashioned wooden chopping bowl. To clean this kind of bowl, wipe it out with a drop or two of oil on a paper napkin—then rub thoroughly with a slice of lemon. Best news—you can find these bowls at the five and ten!

CASSEROLES TO THE FORE: The Good Neighbor Policy has taken Hollywood by storm. Central and South American dishes are the thing—cooked, true Latin style, in casserole. Earthenware vies with Pyrex in popularity among Hollywood's hostesses. And how a casserole does simplify the preparation of a meal!

CESAR ROMERO'S "PAELLA"

To serve 4 to 6:

Spanish sauce
4 tablespoons cooking oil
3 fresh tomatoes or 1 can tomato soup

2 green peppers sliced in rings
3 onions, cut fine
1 clove garlic, minced
2 ample cups rice, carefully washed
2 pinches saffron, pressed
(ingredients to be added if desired)
2 spring chickens, about 2 lbs. each
½ lb. pork meat, braised
1 can shrimps, drained

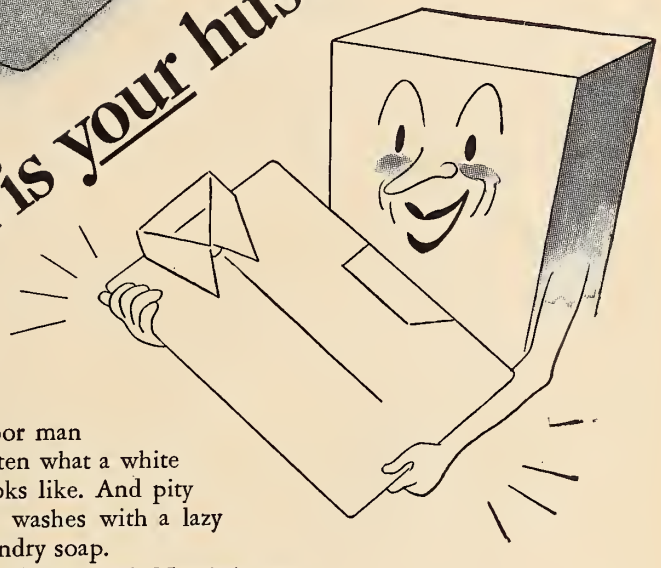
1. Using earthenware casserole allow oil to heat and add garlic and onions, permitting them to brown. Then add peppers, tomatoes and saffron. Season to taste by stirring in salt, pepper, etc. Simmer over slow heat.

2. If chickens are included braise and parboil them after they have been washed and quartered. Add chicken to sauce followed by chicken broth. Allow them to boil for 5 minutes. Then add rice—a little at a time so as not to interrupt the boiling. Cover, turn heat low and simmer 2 or 3 minutes.

3. Add as many other ingredients as you wish. Mix well and cover. Heavy brown wrapping paper cut to fit the casserole seems to preserve the flavor better than a metal cover. Allow rice to cook up into mixture. Baste with a cup of water and place in the oven for 18 or 20 minutes. Serve with green peas and pimentos.

CHICKEN CROQUETTES WITH MUSHROOM SAUCE

To serve 4:



½ can condensed cream of mushroom soup
2 teaspoons lemon juice
1½ cups chicken, ground fine
1 cup bread crumbs, corn meal or cracker crumbs
1 egg, well-beaten with 2 tablespoons water
3 tablespoons milk

1. Mix ground chicken, lemon juice and ½ can mushroom soup. Set in refrigerator to chill. Then shape into cylinders, balls or cutlets.

2. Cover the croquettes with crumbs or corn meal, then dip in egg mixture and dip in crumbs again. Fry in hot deep fat (365°-385°) for 2-5 minutes, or until browned. (If you are averse to fried foods, add mayonnaise to crumb and egg mixture and pan-broil the croquettes.) Mix milk and cream of mushroom soup, heat and serve as sauce over croquettes.

Which is your husband's shirt?

Pity the poor man who's forgotten what a white shirt really looks like. And pity the wife who washes with a lazy 'half-way' laundry soap.

What a difference Fels-Naptha's two thorough cleaners make in homes like this! No grease or grime can be ground in too deep for gentle naptha and golden soap to reach and loosen. No garments need be ruined by rubbing when this 'team' is there to whisk the dirt away.

If you've been struggling through washday with weak, 'half-way' soap, it's high time you changed to golden Fels-Naptha. Then you'll see clothes completely clean and sweet. Shirts and linens gloriously white. No more aching arms and back . . . . . and, if you use husky Fels-Naptha Chips, no sneezing—positively!

Here's the way I help my skin deal with that Summer hangover

RARE is the skin that comes home from a summer vacation without a hangover of sunburn, windburn, skyshine, and a general weather-beaten look.

Now's the time to get after that summer skin hangover. Put Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Creams to work on it!

And also give these special creams a chance to help if you are bothered with such blemishes as rough scaly dryness, oily shine, and enlarged pore openings.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA SKIN CREAM
(Formerly Texture Cream)

Get the full benefit of this cream by using both as a night treatment and as a day foundation. It softens and neutralizes accumulations often acid in nature in the external pore openings. It also contains cholesterol which by retaining moisture acts to keep your skin more supple and pliant.

As a foundation women agree that Phillips' Skin Cream "does something extra." It removes excess oiliness and softens dry rough skin so that powder and rouge go on evenly and adhere for hours.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA CLEANSING CREAM

A new experience awaits you in the way this different cream cleanses! You see it not only loosens and rolls away the surface dirt and make-up but penetrates the outer pore openings and cleanses away the accumulations which daily lodge there. Leaves your skin clean, softened, and refreshed!

"HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY"

"Stagecoach," Ward Bond in "Tobacco Road." Wayne offered Ford $1,000 for the hunk of cloth, but was spurned.

For first time in any film, a new camera technique, on which studio technicians have been working three years, is used to give third dimensional reproduction. Said to be most revolutionary departure in ten years, its details are secret, involve theory of 100% universal focus. . . . Patric Knowles left Hollywood to join up with RCAF as flying instructor at the outbreak of the war. A few months ago he took up a tyro who froze onto the controls. Knowles managed to land with a minimum of damage, but found, after a physical check-up, that the shock had spoiled his eyesight for flying. Mustered out, he returned to Hollywood. . . . Roddy McDowall has the part of the young Huw. Was chosen for it on account of his wonderful English accent (he's a British evacuee). Unfortunately, between casting time and the time he was to appear before the mike, he buddied with Stanley Clements (miniature toughie in "Tall, Dark and Handsome"), began talking with a Tenderloin accent. The studio had to part them. . . . Roddy is an elf. He's Puckish, with unruly hair, an angel's smile, and a strong leaning for baseball, for sliding down banisters, a dead-shot with a pea-shooter, a passion for declaiming Shakespeare. But only when adults aren't on hand. . . . Sara Allgood spent time between scenes knitting a pair of socks for John Ford. Anna Lee knitted helmets for British soliders. Widely traveled she swapped her smattering of Japanese, Arabic and Russian for lessons in Welsh from obliging singers. . . . This cast, like all his others, is devoted to Ford. On studio sets he served tea every day at 4, provided biscuits and sweets. . . . Patient with everyone, he seldom shot more than two takes of any scene, seemed to coax great acting out of his players. In this, as in other of his big pictures, he uses gangs of 10 or 12 perennial Ford extras. Said one: "In 'The Long Voyage Home,' Ford asked me if my rent was paid. I said no. So he pushed me into the water in one scene. I got $35 extra—stunt man's pay."

Maureen O'Hara got into lively discussions of politics, war, world situations with Welsh singers. She loves to go to the movies, especially previews. Dying to go to New York. Crazy about gin rummy, which George Raft and Al Ritz taught her flying out to Hollywood by plane, but insists it must be for fun only. Spent lots of time on the set collecting autographs to send back to her brothers and sisters in Ireland. . . . John Loder and Anna Lee starred in plays together in England years ago. Director Bob Stephenson first discovered her looking over screen tests, happened to ask Loder if he knew anything about her. Loder's response was enthusiastic. Stephenson was so smitten he married her two weeks later. . . . This picture cost more than "Grapes of Wrath" and Tobacco Road" combined. . . . Normally to save time and expense, all studio scenes are shot at one time, all location scenes at another, but Ford shot this one in its correct sequence. Felt that this would preserve the atmosphere and mood of the story. It's the way John Ford does things—part of the magic that makes his pictures great when others are just good.

THE MEN IN HER LIFE

some tips." She underlined that last sentence with an ironic smile.

"I'll never forget one scene in which I was on the witness stand, and he was cross-examining me. 'Where were you on the night of August 15th?' he thundered. 'Why, I was at home,' I said. Several more lines flew back and forth. After the take, I told Bill, 'You nearly threw me in that scene. You never looked at me.' He laughed again. 'I was too busy, looking at the camera,' he said. 'You'll learn, you'll learn'. . . . And I did learn, thanks to him.

"I was very lucky, getting with Willie the Pooh in my first picture. I might have gotten with some so-and-so, who would have said, 'Really, I cahn't take time to teach these stage actresses how to get by in the movies!'

"Bill was the complete opposite of what I, as an actress from The Theatre"—her intonation indicated that she was jibing at her earlier self—"expected a movie actor to be. I expected all movie actors to talk only about themselves and The Cinema. And here, the first movie actor I encountered was a man who was thoroughly real, completely natural, amusing and mentally stimulating. Far from being an egotist, he constantly made himself the butt of jokes. He was a Jack Benny with sophistication.

"I ran into him again six months later when Myrna Loy and the studio had a little disagreement, and I was sent in to pinch-hit for her in a picture with Bill. That was my first lead. The day I walked on the set, Bill came all the way across the sound-stage to greet me. 'Roz,' he said, 'I'm so glad you're doing this picture.' I knew very well that he would have preferred Myrna, but he made the effort of trying to make me feel that I was the one he wanted. . . . A woman can't help liking a man like that. And finding him exciting.

"In my second picture, 'Forsaking All Others,' I met up with Gable and Montgomery, which was no hardship. My principal recollection of Clark on that first set is of playing poker with him. (That was in the good old days before gin-rummy.) They were always yelling for him, and he was always pretending not to hear. 'I've got three 5's,' he'd say. 'What have you got?' . . . He was one of the crowd, mixed with everybody, talked everybody's language. It was a cinch to get along with Gable.

"I came to know him better when we made 'China Seas' together.

"I remember, at the time, when a cer-

WISHING won't make it so!

JUST your luck, you moan. . . . You've looked forward to this jamboree for weeks, but the day that suits everybody else doesn't suit you one bit! For it's the wrong time of the month for you.

If only you could smile and laugh and be gay . . . be the life of the party! You wish it with all your heart.

Well, other girls manage it, and so can you! But they don't get rid of grouches merely by wishing . . .

They've learned the secret of lasting comfort—Kotex sanitary napkins.

You see—Kotex is less bulky, which means you're not bothered by rubbing and chafing. And that's not all . . .

Say "Phooey" to old fears!

Kotex helps take your mind off your troubles because it has a new moisture-resistant safety shield which gives a girl added protection . . . added confidence and poise.

And what a relief to know that with Kotex there can never be any bumps and bulges to give your secret away. Honestly! Kotex has flat, pressed ends that can't show even when you don't wear a girdle.

So is it any wonder that Kotex is the most popular napkin made! It's the answer to your problems when you want to feel gay and happy and carefree!

Be confident . . . comfortable . . . carefree

tain girl friend of mine heard that I was making a picture with Clark Gable—who was getting ballyhooed all over the place as The Great Lover—she asked me: 'Does he go into an act between scenes?'

"And that," said Roz, nodding her head sagely, "brings up an interesting point.

"People seem to labor under the delusion that actors and actresses can't help trying out their far-famed glamour on each other between scenes. Maybe it happens, but I've never seen it, and I've been around and kept my eyes open. The reason it doesn't happen is that acting is exhausting work. If you didn't relax between scenes, you'd get old ahead of your time."

But she was talking about Mr. G.

"You mean, Vitamin G. That's what my beauty operator calls him. I nearly cracked my mud pack the other day, when she pulled that one on me.

"There's always some great elemental reason why people succeed, regardless of the boosts and pushes they get, and that's as true of Gable as of anyone else. I have my own pet theory about the explanation for his success.

"With Clark, I'd say that the elemental thing is that he doesn't mouth his words. He doesn't speak from his throat; he speaks from his stomach. Don't laugh. I'm serious. I don't know whether it's natural or whether he learned it, the way a singer learns to think high notes. But it's there, and it's a great attribute. It's what gives you the feeling of intense power about The Big Moose—it's what makes him exciting."

Roz paused to demonstrate what she meant. She said from the throat, "My dear, I fully intend to shoot you before dawn"—and the line sounded shallow and affected. Then, with the same identical intonation, she said the same line "from the stomach"—and it sounded intense with suppressed emotion. It seemed completely possible that, in that enormous handbag of hers, she had a submachine gun concealed.

"Between 'China Seas' and 'They Met in Bombay,'" continued Roz, "there was a lapse of six years, during which I didn't work with The Big Orange-and-Alfalfa Man from Encino. And being of a naturally suspicious nature, I had my doubts that he'd still be the same guy. After all, he had been a box-office champ for ten years, he had been Rhett Butler, he had married Carole Lombard, and he had taken up gentleman-ranching. I expected he would have gone a little stratospheric. He threw me off-balance when I came on the set by giving me an all-out welcome, as if he remembered me. But I recovered fast. 'Uh-huh,' I said to myself, 'he's still smart—smart enough to make you think he's a pal of yours, when you know very well he'll want 90 per cent of the close-ups.' Right after that, there was a big story conference. I kept waiting for Boom Town to clear his throat and state that he thought his part needed some expansion. He cleared his throat all right, but what he said was: 'You'll have a stronger story if you build up Rosalind's part more'. . . . When a man can take his kind of success and still keep a perspective like that, he's a man worth knowing.

"AFTER six years, the only change I can see in him is that he wears his hair farther out over his ears. He isn't out to impress anybody. Do you know what his favorite greeting to me was? 'You look terrible today—why don't you stay home nights?' He kept me busy thinking up insulting retorts.

"Then," she went on, "there was Bob Montgomery. I've done four pictures with him, and don't ask me the names of all of them, because I couldn't tell you. But each one of them was an experience, largely because Mr. Montgomery is a Wit. Capital W. Around him you have to think of your answers fast, or you're a dead pigeon.

"We fought constantly—but all in fun Everybody didn't understand that. Every time we worked together, we had to deny rumors we were feuding. He called me Razz Russell, and I called him Robbei Montgomery. We'd get in front of the camera, and I'd say, 'For heaven's sake, get in your marks,' and he'd say, 'I'm only out of them because I'm trying to protect myself. You're upstaging me again.' There was never a serious word between us, though we dead-panned everything we said to each other. The gags never stopped. . . . Any man who can make life amusing is, to my mind, exciting. So Bob goes on my list.

"And so does that nice little Cockney boy, Cary Grant—and for the same reason. You never know what he's going to say or do next. He's dynamite to work with. And a very funny man.

"To date, the picture I've enjoyed most, is 'His Girl Friday'—and the main reason is: I had to try to keep up with that human dynamo named Grant. He hits a terrific pace. When he isn't using his eyes or his mouth or his hands to get a reaction, he's using his feet. He's a terrific ham, but—he gets results no one else gets. For my money that makes him a genius. He'll try anything to be entertaining. And that's as true off the screen as on. Any time, any place, he's exciting company."

Roz helped herself to a refill from the teapot.

"Then there's Jimmy Stewart," she said. "People have asked me if I'd call him shy. My answer is yes, definitely. I think he is sincerely and genuinely shy. But—I also think that, much to his amazement, he found out that shyness pays, and he decided not to abandon it. It's a permanent part of him now.

"I can't imagine Jimmy ever being flashy. That, however, is not only forgivable but laudable. It gives him a solidity that's rare nowadays. It sets him apart from the mob."

YOU CAN'T BEAT THE DUTCH

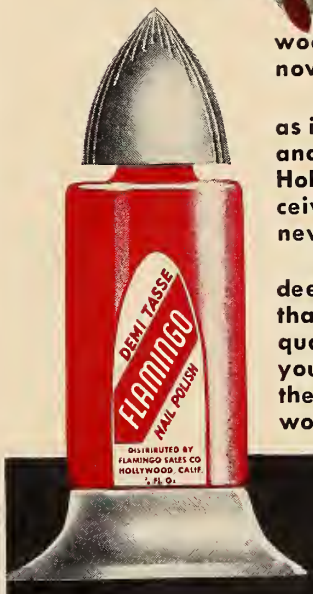
Nodding toward a colorful painting of a California landscape, hanging on the nearby wall, he explains, "If I had painted that, I could say, 'I bought that canvas and those oils—they were mine. And it was my hands that put those oils on that canvas in just that way. I could be proud. It is something I alone created.' But anything I accomplish as an actor is in the hands of other people. It depends on them. I say words written by a playwright, not by me; my actions are governed by a director. Sometimes things I want to do turn out badly, and other things I do with objections turn out well. Either way, I am not alone responsible."

That's unexpected talk from an actor. Most actors, even in their modest moments, don't take any credit away from themselves. But this Dutchman blithely confesses:

"I BECAME an actor by a stroke of luck, and I stayed one because I was just lazy. Conceitness"—his version of the word conceit—"did not enter into it. The life was easy, so it was attractive. I worked at night for three hours. In the daytime, I could be a gentleman, a man of leisure, a sporting man."

After that first lead, he never played Hollywood. He became a fixture of the best theatre in The Hague, staying there nearly seven years. Then in 1928, he started seeing the world.

Every year before World War II, several leading Dutch players, both men and women, were invited to form an acting company and go out to the theatre-starved Dutch colonies on tour. It was an honor, and a very profitable one, to be invited—as Phil was in 1928. Aged 22, he was asked to head the company, whose repertory consisted mainly of Ibsen and Molnar plays. On later trips he also did such plays as "Journey's End" and "Men in White."



That first trip was to the distant Dutch East Indies—Sumatra, Java, Celebes, Bali, Dutch New Guinea. To him, an incredible tropical paradise.

"When the others went home, I stayed," he relates. "To myself, I said, 'It would be a pity to go home before I know if I'm waking or dreaming.' I stayed two and a half years. I had a little money saved, and it is possible to live very cheaply there. I studied parts, but mostly I studied the country. Three or four months at a time I would spend in the jungle hunting. I would go to the police and ask for a prisoner who had hidden in the jungle to be my guide. But I was particular what kind of prisoner I asked for. I didn't want a thief. I preferred a murderer.

"That makes me sound like a strange person, but let me explain. Once I attended a dinner party given by the warden of a prison camp there. During the dinner, the warden confided that the native prisoner waiting on us was a murderer. The women gasped. 'But how can you let him walk around free?' everyone asked. The warden said, 'He is not a killer at heart. No native is. His crime was a crime of passion. He can be trusted the rest of his life. It is the same with my gardener and my cook. They both are murderers. But I wouldn't trust a man who had stolen five cents. A thief is a criminal at heart.'

He admits that he had some bad moments on those jungle expeditions, but he won't elaborate on them nor dramatize himself as an adventurer. "It was not adventure, it was sport," he insists.

It was a money shortage, not career ambition, that finally took him back to Holland and acting. He kept returning to the East Indies on tour, and he went on tour to Dutch Guiana (which also has jungles) and to Curacao in the West Indies. But on none of those voyages West across the Atlantic did he think of going on to Hollywood and having a look around. He wasn't interested in films.

"By that time," he explains, "I had a stage reputation, and always good roles came my way—because I was 'hard to get.'" He smiles in reminiscence of that polite skullduggery. "There were offers from Warners in England—offers that promised to make me rich, if I would learn English—but I turned them down.

"Then in 1935 Holland started its own film industry—you didn't know about that, no?—and in 1936 I signed as a star. There was no star system, however, as here. The stars were not the only famous ones in the pictures. I made a picture called 'Rubber,' for example, in which the man who played the second lead was my first director. He was a man fifteen times the actor I was, a man always the top; I was just a bum, by comparison. I was so grateful to him for his support I always had him with me. If he had had a flair for learning languages, I would have brought him with me here."

In one of the Dutch films Phil made, he was directed by Henry Koster. And that changed his life a few years later.

"Bobby"—his nickname for Koster—"went on to America and became famous, directing Deanna Durbin to stardom. He kept writing to me: 'Study English. I'll be sending for you. This is the place to be.' I kept writing back that I wouldn't be coming. I was scared to death of Hollywood. So many good people went there, and after a few months Hollywood said, 'Goodbye, it's nice to have met you, but we have to drop you.' They came home, and people said, 'They weren't good enough for Hollywood. They had to come back.' And their reputations were shot to pieces. I didn't want that to happen to me. I was going to stay in Europe.

"I made pictures in Holland until the idealists in the industry got in trouble with the business men—or perhaps the other way around. Then I went to Vienna. Altogether, I made fifteen pictures, although only three or four were good. I was in Vienna the day the Germans marched in. After that, it was not fun any more. . . . It was then that I listened to an offer I had from Universal in Paris.

"They gave me seven weeks to make up my mind. I went to London and in six weeks saw two hundred movies and thirty plays. By that time, I could understand the language, at least. I had hopes of learning it. I signed and sailed for America.

"I'll never forget my first day in Hollywood. I had lunch at Universal with Bobby Koster, Marlene Dietrich and Jimmy Stewart—they were making 'Destry Rides Again.' They asked me if there was going to be war. I said, 'No, there will be no war. Both sides are bluffing. I'm sure of that. Otherwise, I wouldn't have come here'. . . . Just three days later," he adds ironically, "the war started.

"Right away, Universal gave me the lead in a picture called 'Ski Patrol,' and right away I gave Universal a headache. They had to put every word in my mouth. I didn't know what I was talking about. They tried me in two more pictures, both B's—then they sold my contract. I can't blame them for that. I am only grateful to Universal. They made it possible for me to learn the language. I hope to go back and do pictures there. I would like some day to do one with Koster. He couldn't take the chance when I was there. Our friendship could not go that far even though he felt responsible for my being in Hollywood. My accent was still too thick."

The fact that the studio that brought him to Hollywood didn't want him after three pictures had little effect on him emotionally. His emotions had all been spent a few weeks before with the invasion of Holland.

"The day that happened, despite all my wishful thinking that it couldn't happen, I rushed down to the Dutch consul and signed as a volunteer in the Queen's Guard. Then I became a crazy man. For four and a half days, I had the radio going night and day. I couldn't sleep, I couldn't eat, I couldn't think of anything but the horror Over There. Then came the end. I still wake up in the night, from dreams of Holland . . . I say I won't talk about the war. But I can't help talking about it. I'm thinking about it all the time. I know from letters I get, from veiled words, how the Dutch people feel."

UNIVERSAL sold Dorn's contract to M-G-M. And the reason why M-G-M was interested was that, after "Escape" had been in production three weeks, with the part of the doctor still uncast, someone suggested testing "that new Dutch actor at Universal." The test proved that he was the man not only for that part, but for future important parts. (He put everything he had into that test.)

He wasn't sorry when M-G-M loaned him to Warners for "Underground," which is probably the most dramatic anti-Nazi picture yet. "The story was good, the director was good, and the part was good. I couldn't be sorry about that."

He doesn't know what's next in the cards for him. He has had an offer to play opposite a famous stage actress on Broadway and would like to accept, if only for the speaking-English-in-public practice that it would give him—but the studio is turning thumbs down, because if the play should be a hit, he would be away from Hollywood at least a year. And he is becoming a valuable screen asset.

"I don't care what kind of role I play," he says, "as long as it is not too sweet and as long as it is different from the one before."

In other words, he's capable of thinking for himself.

He has signified his intention of becoming an American citizen. Some of his fellow-countrymen can't understand that. He explains by saying: "A man loves the woman who is his mother, but then he goes out in the world and meets a woman he wants for a lifetime companion. He still loves his mother—but in a different way he also loves the woman he marries. Holland is my mother, and America is my wife."

The girl who answers to the name of "Mrs. Dorn" also answers to the name of Marianne. She is an actress—"and a good one, too," Phil testifies, "though she will work only on the stage. She was one of the finest actresses in Holland."

They live in a little house high up in Laurel Canyon, where they get a distant view of the Sierra Madre Mountains, which in winter "look like Switzerland." They bought the little house, and Phil is going all-out for gardening "after being cooped up ten years in apartments." It is the first plot of ground he has ever owned. "I get a thrill thinking that it is all mine clear to the center of the earth."

He loves to pile into the car (they have a bag, packed with changes of clothes, constantly in the trunk) and set out on a trip for some destination unknown. "We went down to the beach for a swim a few weeks ago and ended up in San Francisco."

Well, that's typical of him. He started out in Hollywood doing B's, but he's certainly headed straight toward stardom in A's. He's the only one of his particular kind.

TANGEE'S NEW Red-Red...THE RICHEST AND REDDEST OF ALL LIPSTICK SHADES

The jewel-like clarity of Tangee's NEW Red-Red will liven your lips with a glowing new vivacity, soften them with a subtle new smoothness. For Red-Red is true red...the lipstick shade so rich and pure it goes with anything you might wear, a perfect foil for both your gowns and furs. Tangee's unique cream base helps prevent chapping or drying. Of course, there's a matching rouge. And Tangee's famous Face Powder: So clinging, so flattering, so un-powdery!

Another Tangee Lipstick—THEATRICAL RED...a bright and vivid shade with the same famous Tangee cream base. Matching rouge.

What baby powder is smoothest?

These photographs show how 3 leading baby powders look under the microscope. Note the superiority of Mennen (at bottom). It is smoother, more uniform in texture, because it is made by an exclusive Mennen process, "hammerizing."

Being smoother, Mennen gives better protection against chafing. Being definitely antiseptic, it helps protect baby's skin against germs. And you'll like its new, delicate fragrance.

CAMERA MAKE-UP

or rose lip rouge to make them less noticeable. Always remove excess lipstick by pressing a piece of tissue between your lips. Moisten your lips just before your picture is snapped.

Eyes need special emphasis, too. Dark lashes and brows will make your eyes seem brighter, and curled lashes increase their apparent size, so go to work with the mascara, brow pencil and curler! If your eyes are quite deep set, use only a light shade of shadow. Or if they're prominent, give them better proportion with a dark shade. If they're set close together, shadow them more heavily on the outer lids and use more mascara on the outer lashes. If they're set far apart, place the emphasis on the inner half of the lids and lashes. You can add sparkle to your eyes by touching a bit of lash cream to your lids and lashes.

IT'S wise to shampoo a couple of days before photographing if possible. A too-recent set holds the hair too close to the head, and the camera doesn't catch the highlights. Camera-wise stars give their locks extra life and sheen by brushing them vigorously just before the picture is taken. Brilliantines, too, add a yummy lustre.

Bonnet off—when you're having your picture taken—unless you're so fond of the hat, you don't mind dating the photograph to the very year and season. A deep-brimmed hat will throw a shadow over the upper part of your face unless you hold your head up in an unnatural position.

Photography, you know, makes every one seem broader and heavier, so take special care in selecting your clothes. If you have an average figure, choose a simple frock with slenderizing lines and omit all distracting details. Velvets, silks and satins are all very photogenic, and black, ice blue and off-white are excellent colors. For that extra-special picture on your best beau's desk or bureau, wear black if you're a blonde, for it'll dramatize your fair complexion and hair. If you're a brunette, a touch of white near your face will give a flattering contrast.

Your posture is important, so be sure that it's easy and natural—but naturally good. Keep your back straight and take care that your chinline and neck aren't hidden by your shoulder.

The camera's a regular old maid in picking up and magnifying flaws, so watch your grooming to the last detail. And let that next snap do you justice!

Your smile is always lovelier and more spontaneous when your mouth feels fresh and clean. The daily chewing of gum refreshes your mouth, pretties up your lip and cheek muscles by keeping them mobile and feminine-looking, and also helps to make your teeth brighter and more attractive. If you keep your favorite flavor always on hand, you'll be assured of a smile that draws people to you.

Match your lips to the season's brightest, clearest crimsons this fall with Tangee's new Red Red Lipstick. It's the perfect foil for all other fashion shades too, blends with all complexions and makes lips provocatively lovely. Or, if you have fragile, delicate coloring and prefer softer make-up, you'll adore Tangee Natural Lipstick. It's orange in the stick, but when applied to your lips, changes to your own most becoming natural coloring. Each shade has a harmonizing rouge, of course. Try both types.

Grand for kissing the boys "hello" is Princess Pat Liquid Liptone, for it not only makes your lips alluringly red and natural, but it won't rub off on anyone or anything. It's available in nine shades, so find the one that suits you best. It's easy to apply with a handy applicator that helps you draw your lips to their most flattering outline. To prepare your lips for new make-up, you can remove it any time you like with Princess Pat Liquid Liptone Remover.

For that perfectly smooth, sophisticated make-up job, use Hampden's Powd'r Base. It comes in a handy wedge-shaped stick and goes on smooth as satin, giving your skin a clear, natural-looking finish. Not only does it conceal minor blemishes, but you can improve facial contours by using two shades—a light to emphasize good features, and a dark to play down poor ones. Hampden's Powd'r Base is available in natural skin tones to match every complexion.

Cocktail party hostess Bette Davis introduced Richard Travis to Ann Sheridan and Monty Woolley. They're all in "The Man Who Came to Dinner."

"PAULETTE SAVED MY LIFE!"

backed by money from Moscow and headed by a gaunt-faced, big-eared labor leader named Toledano, were after Rivera.

At the time Paulette was having her portrait painted, Toledano, who had trained a quarter of a million laborers with broomsticks for his private Red army, decided to wipe out the enemies of Communism.

The killers first went after a personal enemy of Stalin's, Leon Trotsky. Twenty men, one dark night, all disguised as police, broke into Trotsky's Coyoacan villa, raced up to his bedroom and blasted 300 rounds of bullets into the room from their chattering Tommy guns. They missed Trotsky. He was hiding under the bed. However, they kidnapped Trotsky's secretary, a New York boy, a Duke University graduate named Sheldon Harte . . . A week later the boy's mutilated body, beaten and bruised, was found under the kitchen floor of a nearby farmhouse.

Rivera was No. 2 on the list. One very warm June night during Paulette's stay in Mexico City, she was in Rivera's studio while he worked overtime on her portrait.

Suddenly, the sound of automobiles and the screeching of brakes was heard.

LET Diego Rivera himself tell you in his own simple and undramatic way what happened next.

"That evening at the end of the sitting, Miss Goddard saw around my studio several cars with suspicious looking men inside," Rivera explained. "She investigated, then telephoned me saying, 'If I know my pictures, you're on the spot!'

"I inquired through my driver-assistant, and there was no doubt that they were after me. With a friend, Irene Borjus, I succeeded in leaving the place hidden inside the car. A few minutes later twenty men broke into my house!"

Since Rivera wouldn't reveal every detail, I took it upon myself to learn what actually happened. When the autos drew up around Rivera's house, Paulette heard them, peeked outside and suspected something fishy. She told Rivera so. He laughed.

Chin up, her knees doing the La Conga, Paulette marched down the twisting iron stairs of the studio into the darkened patio. She opened the cactus door and walked outside.

All was silence. Five cars full of men. All staring at her. Poised, she walked toward them, past them, but out of the corner of her eye she spotted one of their guns. The minute she got around the corner and out of sight, she began running, caught a cab, sped to the nearest phone booth and frantically called Diego Rivera.

His line was busy. Suspense grew. Death hovered. She called again and again. Finally he answered.

And that's when she hoarsely whispered that classic sentence, "If I know my pictures, Mr. Rivera, you're on the spot!"

Promptly, before the Red assassins broke in, he had an aide hide him on the floor of the family station wagon. Then he ordered the aide to drive out, while he lay perspiring on the floor.

The killers, duped by the light still bright in his studio, let the auto pass!

And thus, thanks to Paulette Goddard's courage, Diego Rivera made his escape from the murderers who, a few minutes later, broke into his studio to find him gone!

"After leaving my studio," Rivera told me, "I hid for several days in the house of a friend. After that I went by plane to Brownsville, was admitted to the United States with a five hundred dollar bond to go to paint my mural in San Francisco."

Incidentally, when Diego Rivera got safely across the border, he emerged from his place at San Antonio and, disheveled, without tie or coat, began shouting, "Where is Paulette Goddard? Where is that girl?" He wanted to thank her again and again for saving his life. In a few moments she appeared. She'd driven up from Mexico City at breakneck speed to meet him and fly with him to Hollywood.

During my conversation with the pudgy painter in his bizarre studio—a studio lightened only by an entire wall of special glass—I asked Rivera if he detected more than mere beauty in the actress. He did. "In spite of the fact that I had only a professional acquaintance with her," he said. "I found her extremely intelligent and very liberal-minded!"

"I have heard Miss Goddard say, 'I am not an actress, I am a girl.' On the screen she has the same qualities that she has always in life—alertness, beauty and intelligence.

"Charlie Chaplin? Yes, I had the honor to meet him at his home in Beverly Hills. You know, more than twenty-five years ago I was one of a group of writers and artists in Paris, who called themselves 'The Friends of Charlie Chaplin.' I consider him perhaps the greatest living artist of our time. He is as great as Molière or any other great master of tragedy and comedy and as great an author as an actor."

The action was brief. The lines were short. But the best performance by any motion picture actress during the past year has not been performed in Hollywood. It was played on a hot night in a lonely spot outside of Mexico City by an actress the Gods of Art will not soon forget!

ACADEMY AWARD AUNT

rest, he reads, listens to the radio and bosses things generally. He considers it his special function in life to spoil Mary and Daphne. "Why don't you leave them alone?" he growls when their Aunt Pat finds it necessary to correct them.

A couple of years ago Miss Darwell bought an old stucco farmhouse on two acres of tree-shaded ground in the valley. There they live with ten dogs, twenty-five cats, one rabbit and innumerable fowl. The turkeys and ducks, the geese and chicken are for home consumption. Before long they expect to be milking their own cow. The owners of a Norwalk dairy have presented Miss Darwell with a Guernsey heifer, "in return for the pleasure you have given us." She's buying a third acre behind the house, on which to build a barn to house the cow.

Cats ramble at will, peeking from behind bushes and lifting their pussy-faces from the kitchen doorstep. Four small dogs are given the run of the house. Two sleep on Uncle Bill's bed. There are kennels for the rest, whose number varies with their needs. All strays are welcomed, cleaned up and kept till a home can be found for them. Not any home. No orphanage matron is fussier than Jane Darwell. "Are you sure you love dogs? Do you have a fence 'round your house? If it doesn't work out, will you bring him straight back to me?"

One of her friends offered Daphne a blonde cocker spaniel. "May I keep him, Aunt Pat?"

"Not if he's already taken care of."

Daphne lifted a brow. "Wait'll I show you." Never was capitulation more sudden. One look from Sad-eyes in the bend of Daphne's arm, and he'd hooked himself an adoring Aunt Pat of his own.

The farmhouse with its small, low-ceilinged rooms needs plenty of remodeling. "But I'm strictly a cash-and-carry woman," says Miss Darwell, "so we're doing it slowly." Thus far, they've concentrated on the dining-room built between the old house and garage, overlooking the rose-garden. They go downtown together, pick things out, argue over them. "Being an art student, Mary thinks she knows just what's right." The room, in any case, is just right—large, beautifully proportioned, an exquisite crystal chandelier and wall sconces reflected in the burnished mahogany of family heirlooms. The room, like a friend, receives holiday gifts. "We bought it, the andirons and the fire screen for Easter."

They live their personal life outside the movie world. Miss Darwell has kept close to many friends of her youth. The girls have their own school companions. For the rest, their days are filled with work and play and a lively interest in one another's concerns. Most of their evenings are spent at home. The girls must report on what happened at school, Aunt Pat on what happened at the studio. "Who was in the scene with you? Was he cute? What did he say? What did she wear?"

"It's a tossup," says Uncle Bill, "as to which of the three gabbles faster."

When Edith and Summy, who work for them are off, the girls—out of their high regard for Aunt Pat—prepare dinner. Like the master violinist in the story, who fiddled for thirty years but hated music, Aunt Pat's an expert cook who doesn't like cooking. Driven to it, she'll turn out fried chicken and creamy gravy that are gustatory poems. But she'd much rather not.

So the girls take over. They set up two card tables before the fireplace in Aunt Pat's bed-sitting-room upstairs. The menu generally features one surprise, which is sometimes good, sometimes a lemon, but manfully praised in either case.

Aunt Pat sometimes talks about the elegant new apartment she's going to build for herself some day. "Might as well stay where you are," says Uncle Bill. "Your elegant apartment'll still be our sitting-room." She concedes that this one is nice, if mongrel. The fire blazes. A dog or two lies curled at Uncle Bill's feet. Above the mantel hangs an array of family photographs in oval walnut frames. There's one of Grandfather Woodard, a stern-looking old gentleman in a long white beard. "Stern!" hoots Aunt Pat. "I used to braid that beard and tie it up with pink hair ribbons."

They listen to their favorite broadcasts. To hear Uncle Bill tell it—anything bloodthirsty. "When people are killing each other one a minute, you can bet they're tuned in." They mark up their own I.Q.'s by private competition on the quiz programs. They never miss Jack Benny—or if they do, it's a minor calamity.

"Of course," says Mary, "when Aunt Pat gets hold of a crossword puzzle, everything else stops. Especially the cockeyed ones. She bellows with pain when Liberty doesn't have one. Says she's going to sue 'em."

Or somebody suggests a picture, and the three girls tear out.

"And first thing Aunt Pat says, 'I'm thirsty, let's have a soda.'"

"And the doorman at the Chinese says, 'I'll get your tickets for you, Miss Darwell,' at which Daphne and I burst with pride."

"And on the way home, Aunt Pat says, 'I'm thirsty, let's have a soda.'"

And when they get back, "How was the picture?" inquires Uncle Bill.

"Mm—all right—"

"What's the matter? Didn't they shoot more than six or seven people?"

On Sundays they drive to Agua Caliente for the races or to Santa Barbara for lunch. Or they go to the beach.

FOR obvious reasons, the girls enjoy shopping expeditions with their aunt. Especially Mary, who knows how to wear clothes. Daphne, supplied with the full quota of sweaters required by school etiquette, counts herself the well-dressed woman.

At the shop it goes something like this. The girls are trying on coats. Aunt Pat's eye roams and lights. "Darling, this little dress would look lovely with that coat. Slip into it and let's see. Mm—I thought so."

"We never hint," says Daphne gravely. "We don't have to. Once she gets started, we're set."

Mary observes that she'll never forget the time Aunt Pat said no. "She'd bought me a whole new outfit down at Martha Dean's. Well, then, there was this lovely woven dress that I didn't need at all, but the salespeople know what she's like, and one of them said, 'Let your Aunt Pat see you in this.' So I tried it on, and she said, 'I don't think so.' About a week later she tells me to go look in my closet. There's the woven dress."

"They look so well in the darn things," Aunt Pat defends herself, "that you feel like a dog if you don't buy 'em."

They get a good deal of simple pleasure out of poking fun at one another's foibles. Aunt Pat's dieting, for example. "Which lasts about a week. Then she says, 'Heavens, at my age what difference does it make, let's have a soda.'

"Or when she suddenly decides, 'It's terrible the way I bring you girls up not to knit or sew. That's settled now. You're going to make a sweater.'

"It's her guilty conscience. Because she's unhandy with the needle herself.

"She thinks she's living under false pretenses. On the screen she's supposed to be motherly. How can a person be motherly, she says, who hates to cook and can't sew or knit or crochet?

"So one day she brought home these balls and balls of twine, sat herself down in the patio, crocheted a square and then forgot the stitch. Know anyone who can use a ton of twine?"

"Give me a break, girls," she pleads.

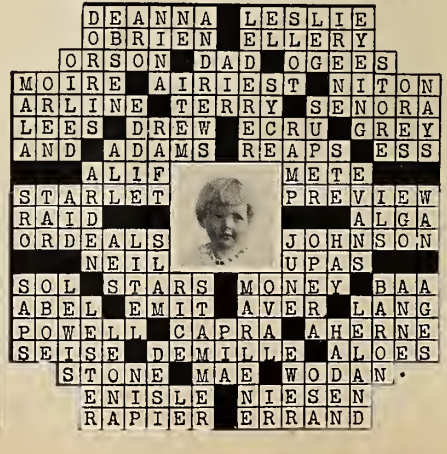
The girls are generous. "Now you can tell about us."

On those rare occasions when she's really annoyed with them, Daphne's likely to melt into tears. Mary comes up with what she calls a "fancy reason" for whatever it is she's done or left undone. "At least, it's a reason to me. Aunt Pat calls it an alibi."

"I'm one of these peremptory people," Aunt Pat admits, "—fly off the handle, say whatever pops into my head. I can't stand beating about the bush. If you did it, say you did it, nobody's going to shoot you at sunrise."

"That's right," Daphne muses. "When Aunt Pat says a thing, it sure stays said." For her it does. She dates events by the calendar of her aunt's displeasure. "Don't you remember?" she'll inquire, limpid-eyed. "It was when you were having that spell about so-and-so." And Uncle Bill chortles with glee.

The big thrill of the year was of course the Academy Award. Aunt Pat got tickets for the girls. Uncle Bill wouldn't go. "Too much excitement. I'll tune in on the radio." That was all right with his sister. The less fuss, the better. She wouldn't even buy a new dress. "Fiddle!" she said, "I go out so little," and had an old one dyed.



She couldn't sit with the girls, having been invited to the banquet as Darryl Zanuck's guest. "Don't be too disappointed, Jane," he warned, "if you don't get it."

"If I do, I'll be overwhelmed. If I don't, the honor of having been nominated will be plenty."

Presently she heard Lynn Fontanne say "Jane—." That was all she heard. There was no other Jane on the list. Mr. Zanuck said, "There you are," but she didn't hear him. As he headed her toward the podium, she caught a glimpse of the girls jumping up and down like crazy. Between her and the goal stretched an endless length of parquet. How'll I ever get there? I have no knees. Bet I'll catch my heel and fall flat. What'll I say? I always talk too much, and now that I need a couple of words, they're gone. Grief! Other people know what to say; something'll come to me. "It didn't though," she insists. "I just grinned and bowed and scraped like an idiot."

Whatever she said or left unsaid didn't matter. The long rounds of sustained applause proved that. Woman and actress, she was the people's choice. They broke out afresh when the girls, laughing and crying, hugged her as she passed their table. They got home late to be greeted by an imperturbable Uncle Bill, still at the radio. "I knew you'd get it," he said.

WELSH RARE-BIT

Glenn the report, candid to the point of violence. "Some day we'll make another," he said grimly. Glenn said, okay, less in agreement than because Moore had suffered enough for one day.

For himself he didn't care. Curran had just cast him for a bit in "Golden Boy" and raised him to forty bucks. He went on the road with it, landing eventually in New York, where he understudied John Beal in something called "Soliloquy," which opened gloriously at the Empire and closed next night. Then followed that interval, without which no actor's life is complete—shabby stairs, snooty office boys, shrinking stomach, silent telephone, little man what now?

But, more fortunate than others, he didn't have to drain that cup to the dregs. Suddenly everything happened at once. He was offered the role of Leo in "The Little Foxes." A wire from Curran summoned him to the coast to play George in "Our Town." Torn between the two, he finally plumped for George. "The Little Foxes" was an unknown quantity, "Our Town" an established success. Besides, he owed Curran something. Besides, he wanted to go home. A week after he got there, George was cut from under him by Jed Harris's decision to take the New York company to the coast. Before he had time to gnash his teeth, he found himself playing Irene Rich's son in "A Broom for the Bride."

He felt fine the morning after the opening. The papers had run good notices. They were going to play Frisco, Santa Barbara, San Diego. The sun felt good on his back as he puttered with the car. "Telephone, Gwyllyn," called his mother.

It was Tom Moore. "I want you to make a test—"

"You're a glutton for punishment, Tom. Not me—" But he went, and it turned out to be the model test of the year, the test everyone was taken to look at. Executives wanted to know where this boy had been. Moore's judgment was vindicated. Expecting nothing, Glenn had clowned and ad libbed his way through the scene and come out natural. They signed him for "Heaven With a Barbed Wire Fence" and changed Gwyllyn to Glenn. For the first and last time, his father saw him on the screen. Glenn knew that, like it or not, he wouldn't say much. You had to watch his face. As they left the preview, it was one large grin. His son likes to remember that. A few months later Mr. Ford died of a heart condition no one had suspected.

GLENN'S plans to return to New York were intercepted by Zeppo, the fourth Marx brother turned agent. "Give me ten days. If I haven't got something lined up for you by then, go to New York." It took him three days. Glenn was put under contract by Columbia, trained through a series of B's and graduated into A's with "The Lady in Question."

Zeppo phoned one day. "Dave Loew and Al Lewin saw your Fox test. They're considering you for Ludwig in the Remarque story." On Sunday Zeppo phoned again. "Dress up. A car's coming to take you to Lewin's. That's all I can tell you because that's all I know. You're on your own, and God help you."

A limousine drove up. In state Mr. Ford was driven to Mr. Lewin's beach home. The chauffeur delivered him to a butler. The butler ushered him to a landing, from which a short flight of steps led to a beautiful room below. Six pairs of eyes were focussed on him. They belonged to Al Lewin and David Loew, producers, to John Cromwell, director, Erich Remarque, author of "Flotsam" from which "So Ends Our Night" was made, Talbot Jennings, screen writer, and a man from the Leland Hayward office to represent Maggie Sullavan, who was to play opposite Ludwig.

Glenn's stomach began to act as if he were in an elevator, going down. Like a squirrel in a cage, one imbecile phrase kept racing round his head. "This isn't for nothing on a Sunday, this isn't for nothing on a Sunday, this isn't for nothing on a Sunday."

"How do you do?" Mr. Lewin said at last and moved toward Glenn, who managed to negotiate the stairs. "I'll introduce you to these people later. Now I'd like you to do me a favor. We have the script of 'Flotsam' here. Will you read a couple of scenes for us?"

"Sure," Glenn said or tried to say. The sound that came out was like nothing human. He was shown to a large soft chair, into whose depths he seemed to sink endlessly. "My God," he thought for one wild second, "it doesn't stop."

"Will you have a drink?"

"Well—uh—maybe a root beer, if you've got it—"

A root beer was produced, they gave him the script, told him to turn to page so-and-so and commence. The familiar look and feel of typed pages between blue covers comforted Glenn.

When he'd finished, he felt better. Now it was up to them. Now they'd have to say something. Maybe they'd invite him to dinner. What they said through spokesman Lewin was: "Thank you very much. It was kind of you to come. The car will take you back."

"Good news," Zeppo phoned next day. "You got it."

WITH the fanfare which attended his performance in the Remarque story, Columbia scheduled him for fewer and better pictures. He's just finished "Texas" with Bill Holden, and plays next in "Go West, Young Lady," a big musical, opposite Penny Singleton. Loew and Lewin have signed him to an outside contract for one year.

He's twenty-five and untouched by Hollywood sophistication. His legs twine for comfort when he sits, his words come in a rush, his smile is shy. He says shucks and heck and golly and doesn't patronize Ciro's, figuring that for the cover charge you can buy two books or two records. Since he likes books and records better than night clubs, that's how he spends his spare cash. He drinks no hard liquor and has been an American citizen for almost two years.

He and his gentle English mother live in a house they've just rented on the Pacific Palisades. She helps him with his fan mail and plays the piano accompaniments to his violin.

He owns a hundred and forty pipes and has smoked them all. Loud clothes, loud laughter and loud people irritate him. He doesn't like girls who rattle paper at shows, and if you're late for an appointment, he won't wait. He wears a large signet ring engraved with his initials, GSNF—Gwyllyn Samuel Newton Ford. His maternal grandmother, who died five years ago, had it made of the gold melted from her wedding ring. Glenn never takes it off.

His close friends, the boys and girls who drop in for supper on Sunday nights, belong to his school and little theatre crowd. There's one special girl who doesn't. Seven months ago, he and Evelyn Ankers discovered each other. She's the blonde English actress under contract to Universal, whom you saw in "Bachelor Daddy" and will see in Abbott and Costello's "Hold That Ghost."

They share the same quiet tastes and spend their evenings at his home or hers, playing gin rummy, listening to records or talking endlessly in front of the fire. They've never been to a night club together. Instead they'll roll up the living-room rugs and dance to their favorite records, reveling in the absence of swing bands and jostling jitterbugs. Glenn made one statement which is open to your own interpretation. "People say you shouldn't marry in the profession. Shucks, it's the person who matters, not what she does." Then, lest he'd revealed himself too far—"I'll probably get married in a couple of years."

His more immediate quest is for a couple of cocker spaniels. He feels funny about buying them. "It's like buying a son or daughter," he explains and thinks maybe he'll pick them up at the pound.

Through the branches of a tree, the sun chequered his face with light and shadow as he waved goodby at the gate, a brush in one hand, a can of paint dangling from the other. Then, whistling, he began to paint the mail-box.

LIP TIPS ON LOVELINESS

both with a piece of clean facial tissue. Now, apply another coat to even all edges, press and blot again as before.

There are two schools of thought on the subject of color—one favoring the vivid, hit-you-between-the-eyes type of lipstick and the other defending the modest, natural-looking, more subdued seducers. If you are the striking type, you just may get away with the first-mentioned kind. But for young girls and beginners in general, we recommend for your serious consideration the gentler and less flamboyant method of approach. For you there are two decided advantages in these less conspicuous colors. First, your mistakes—until you become expert—will be much less glaringly noticeable; second, the very spirit of the milder colors is much more in keeping with your youthful complexion, clothes and coiffures. Besides, these nice, mild shades will be much less apt to put your over-solicitous family into a useless dither. If the natural and pale rosy lip tints simply don't do anything for you, then try the clear, true red-reds that are so popular now. Fact is, these particular reds are always good in lipsticks and are the shades that sell most heavily all year 'round, winter, summer, spring or fall. Orange-reds and purplish reds really are much more difficult to wear and besides aren't half as youthful looking as the others we've just mentioned.

We can't set definite age limits on any girl's lip make-up. It just fits naturally into the picture when a girl has reached the stage when she pays attention to details like clean, shining, well-groomed hair, a good complexion, straight stocking seams and fresh, crisp collars and cuffs. All of the aforementioned niceties, together with lipstick, give a girl a poise and self-assurance not to be gained in any other way.

Time is another element to be taken by the forelock in regard to lipsticks. Make-up looks much softer under artificial lights than it does in the glaring light of day—so let your first be worn with evening things or after-dark dates. Then gradually work up to its use in daytime. School isn't the best place for a girl to start wearing any kind of make-up, neither are church suppers or Red Cross relief society meetings! If you have the good judgment to know the proper time and place for everything you do—we'll give you the green light to go ahead at will. If you haven't this sixth sense of the fitness of things—well, you'd better concentrate right now on developing it—it's going to be that important all the rest of your life.

Some communities are just definitely more conservative than others. And while you can always, with safety and good taste, keep within the unwritten law, woe to you if you have the bad cold or warm, bad or good.

Basically, he is the melancholy type who withdraws into himself. But he has his share of vanity. Artistic recognition is terribly important to him. And so he's developed his own particular type of charm, which hides this deep inner reticence.

To a psychologist, the interesting thing about this man is that there are moments when he is activated by a diabolic force. It appears suddenly, like a shadow, vanishes and lends a terrifying individualism to his screen performances. His love-making is inescapably tinged with sadism. He is of that species of lover who can suddenly overwhelm his loved one with anguished doubts.

As a husband, he is a problem. He doesn't try to camouflage his moods, and they would prey heavily on his wife. Add to this that he's jealous, and that in matters of the heart he has no sense of humor. And beyond a doubt, he must be the dominant partner.

As an actor, he merely suggests—leaves it to the spectator to sense the stormy drama of his troubled soul.

JOHN GARFIELD . . .

As you know, I'm in the dog-house again (for not wanting to do a pan story

The writer is fickle in his moods. There are moments when he is very irresponsible and undisciplined—even with regard to his profession. He is impatient, not easily satisfied, can be sarcastic just to let off steam. But he's putty in the hands of anyone who genuinely understands him. Nevertheless, he's not too easy for a wife to get along with, because he's so uncontrolled. He can only play a role if it interests him. He has the desire to play roles that set the machinery of his own personality in motion. He seeks sensations—nay, needs them in order to relax. For that reason he's suited to gangster roles, because they provide him with climaxes that do justice to his temperament. However, he can also portray sympathetic characters.

. . . RONALD COLMAN

Went to France with original British Expeditionary Force with London Scottish Regiment in Sept. 1914 Wounded in Battle of Ypres

The interesting thing about this writer is that manly as he may be in appearance, he has many feminine qualities. And his confident and energetic exterior masks a shy and reluctant nature. You think of him as a go-getter. He isn't. He is intelligent, and he experiences life much more deeply than you can possibly give him credit for. For that reason, he is an actor of great versatility. He can do as fine a job with the hard, inconsiderate go-getter as with the cautious, withdrawing type, so weighed down with conflicts that he forges of them a chain of troubles for himself and his intimates.

Basically, the writer is a realist, but is nevertheless always striving toward something higher, something ideal. That protects him from getting fed-up and blasé, and signifies that he has lots of chances for further development ahead.

MERLE OBERON . . .

The name of the bath essence is Schenck (Paris)

The writer is a person who thinks quickly and has lots of creative ability at her command. She is a born actress, has absolutely no trouble in playing the most widely varied roles. She has taste and a sense of beauty and both these traits are reflected in her work. She acts with charm and zest.

She can play wild west roles in which she portrays a tempting, half Apache seductress, yet she can play the bold society woman with alluring undertones of the demimondaine. In private life she has a dominant nature, employs radical methods if she doesn't get what she wants. In her relations with people, she subtly compounds feminine wiles with a nice wholesome comradeliness. She's a master at hiding her true motives.

judgment to overstep it. Don't expect your neighbors in Podunk to approve the same kind of make-up that passes unnoticed in New York or Hollywood. They have a true sense of the fitness of things—a whole lot truer than yours if you are foolish enough to try to buck them. Wear conservative colors in conservative places, brighter ones in gayer places—and you'll have a sympathetic public.

And what do boys think about lipstick on their girl friends? They like it—if it's applied with care, restraint and at the proper times and places. Jimmy Lydon, who's playing the leading role in Paramount's "Henry Aldrich for President," had this to say on the subject just the other day: "We fellows don't care how much lip rouge our girl friends wear—just so we don't have to watch the repair work out in public. Why can't girls do their make-up jobs somewhere besides at tables, picnics, on dance floors or standing on street corners!" Take your cue, girls. Jimmy is pretty typical of all the boys we questioned. Freddie Bartholomew chimed in enthusiastically, "Yes, that goes for me, too, 100%"—so don't say we never warned you, my pretties.

As for what you should spend on lip make-up, we have only this to say—real economy is getting what you need for the amount you want to spend. And with the variety of lovely lipsticks everywhere available at chain and variety stores all over the country, keeping within your budget will be a perfect cinch. You can even have a set of several shades and types for various times and places and still earn the approval of your budget-conscious elders. Take our tips on the hows and whens and whys—and we'll bet you a lipstick there'll be no more to-do with the "conscientious objectors."

Did you ever try choosing your lipstick by the color of your eyes? Sounds funny, but looks wonderful! With Hudnut's Marvelous Matched Make-up you blue-eyed girls wear Dresden type Lipstick; brown eyes, Parisian Lipstick; gray eyes, Patrician Lipstick; and hazel eyes, Continental Lipstick. Part of the secret of these Marvelous Lipsticks is their smoothness and the way they go on, but their big charm is their becomingness to your face and the color of your eyes. The price? 55 cents.

YIPPEE, FANS!

V. S., Marietta, N. Y. Bob Preston's a thorough-going Yankee, born in Newton Highlands, Mass., in 1918. When he was only two, his family moved to Los Angeles and Bob was providentially plunked right in the middle of the movie industry. During high school he played in many amateur Shakespeare productions and upon his graduation joined the Shakespearean Repertory Company and trouped through Cal. Some time later, a Paramount lawyer saw him perform and persuaded his studio to give Preston a test. Two or three "B" pictures broke him in, and in "Union Pacific" he had a chance to strut his stuff. He's married to Kay Feltus, is six feet one inch tall, weighs 175 pounds, has dark brown hair and brilliant grey eyes. You can reach him at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon Street, Hollywood, Cal., where he's working on "New York Town."

Joyce Marcus, Los Angeles, Cal. Cammie King, the daughter of Scarlett O'Hara and Rhett Butler in "Gone With the Wind," is the six-year-old daughter of a Los Angeles Public School elocution teacher. Her real name is Cammack King, after her father. Her only other movie part was furnishing the voice for one of Walt Disney's characters some time ago. She happened to get the part in "Gone With the Wind" when her older sister was turned down for the part because she was too old and suggested Cammie. The studio consented to try her out and took her practically on sight.

Usa Castro, Brazil, S. A. Bad news to their fans, Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald are not going to do another picture together. Jeanette's working on "Smilin' Through" with Ian Hunter, and Nelson's playing opposite Rise Stevens (opera star) in "The Chocolate Soldier."

Anna Mary Doyle, Buffalo, N. Y. Nope, Cesar Romero's not making any Cisco Kid pictures at the present moment. He's currently appearing in "Dance Hall" and working in "Week-end in Havana" for 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box No. 900, Beverly Hills, Cal. You can get an autographed picture by sending 25c in coin or stamps to him at that address.

Shirley Gray, Muskegan, Mich. Born in New York City on February 2, 1923, Bonita Granville's five feet tall and weighs a scant 102 pounds . . . Dick Greene's pictures are distributed by 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box No. 900, Beverly Hills, California, at 25c apiece.

Autry Fan, Van Dyke, Mich. Gene Autry put in his first appearance near Tioga, Texas, on Sept. 29, 1907. He's 5' 11" tall, weighs 170 pounds, has sandy-brown hair and blue eyes. He hasn't a business suit in his wardrobe but it's chock-full of gay cowboy outfits (numbering about sixty)! He's been riding ever since he began to walk. His horse is Champ, who goes everywhere with Gene from an airplane trip to a barber shop! When Gene was ten years old, a traveling medicine show came along and he became the fourth member of a quartet attached to the show. With his money, he bought a second-hand guitar and taught himself to play it. At 18, he left home and became a telegraph operator in Oklahoma. Encouraged by Will Rogers who happened to hear him singing to himself, he went to New York but was advised to get more experience back West. After attaining considerable fame as the headliner on the Barn Dance radio program, he went into movies. "Down Mexico Way" is his next. He's happily wed to Ina Mae Spivey, who is almost as much a cowgirl as he is a cowboy!

Ann Leibowitz, York, Pa. Your friend Larry Nunn was born in Marshfield, Ore., 14 years ago. He's five feet four inches tall, weighs 125 pounds and has light brown hair and blue-green eyes. He's completely athletic-minded. Plays soccer and football; boxes, fences and bowls. His career started modestly enough when he was given a role in Irene Rich's weekly radio program after almost six years of continuous radio and stage performances in Seattle and Tacoma. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studio officials heard him and asked him to make a screen test. The results of this was beyond all expectations, and he was immediately cast as Judy Garland's admirer in "Strike Up the Band." Since coming to Hollywood, he's continued schooling in the Hollywood Professional School's junior high division. In addition to his ability to emote, he's a clever cartoonist and drew pictures of Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland on the set. He lives with his mother in a small Hollywood bungalow, and has just completed work on "The Bride Wore Crutches." Jeanette MacDonald and Robert Donat have always been his favorite stars.

Sheila Gibbons, Pelham Manor, N. Y. Whoever told you Joan Bennett had a 16-year-old daughter was sadly misinformed! Her eldest child, Diana, is only 10. . . . You can get an autographed photo of Ann Sheridan at Warner Brothers, Burbank, Cal.; of Joan Bennett at 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box No. 900, Beverly Hills, Cal.; of Clark Gable at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.; of Stirling Hayden at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon Street, Hollywood, Cal. They all cost 25c except Clark Gable's at M-G-M's which is 10c.

A reader, Toledo, Ohio. Sleepy Hollow, N. Y., gave more than Rip Van Winkle to the world! On Dec. 30th, 1904, it produced George Duryea who was to grow up into nationally-known heart-flutterer Tom Keene. Left an orphan at six, he lived with his aunt and uncle until he was eleven when he ran away out West and picked up a living working on ranches and driving stagecoaches. After one year of dramatics at Carnegie Tech in Pittsburgh, he came to New York and was such a success on the stage that in a very short time he was playing the lead in "Abie's Irish Rose" on a world tour. Hollywood beckoned, and now he's in the movies. He's six feet tall, weighs 175 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. His favorite sports are horseback riding, tennis and swimming, and his leading off-screen lady is Grace Stafford, his wife.

E. Morgan, Baltimore, Md. RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower Street, Hollywood, Cal., would be glad to send you Ray Whitley's picture for 25c in coin or stamps. Born in Atlanta, Ga., on Dec. 5, he's five feet eleven inches tall and weighs 185 pounds, has dark curly hair and gray-green eyes. Yes, he's married, as yet has no kids.

Beatrice Cohen, Manville, N. J. The young man who played Fred Sheplock in "Chad Hanna," was Ted North, 24-year-old Topeka, Kansas, boy. His family were stage people, and he had the theatre in his blood. He tried a career at law, but gave it up to join his father's stock company. When he went to Hollywood, Warner Baxter, an old family friend, helped him get a test. He was enormously successful and signed to a long term contract. His one and only ambition is to hit the top; his greatest fear is that he won't. He likes all sports (basketball's his favorite) and Shakespeare's plays. Ted's six feet one inch tall, weighs 170 pounds and has blonde hair and blue eyes.

A fan, Regina, Saskatchewan. Here are the leading ladies you asked about—Sally Eilers starred in "Lady Behave," Ann Sothern in "Smartest Girl in Town" and Anita Louise in "The Go-Getter."

Theresa Nobert, Glen Falls, N. Y. If you'll send 25c in coin or stamps to 20th Century-Fox, Box No. 900, Beverly Hills, Cal., you'll get a slick autographed photo of George Sanders.

Larry De Simone, Brooklyn, N. Y. Bouquets to William Henry for his superb acting in "Operator 13," "The Thin Man," "A Wicked Woman," "Society Doctor," "China Seas," "Double or Nothing," "Madame X," "Yellow Jack," "Ambush," "Persons in Hiding" and "Jennie."

Betty Anderson, Cincinnati, Ohio. Your tall, dark 'n' handsome friend Russell Hayden comes from Chico, Cal., and is 28 years old. He's wed to Jane Clayton and has a bouncing baby daughter, Sandra . . . Tim Holt has brown hair and eyes, is five feet eleven inches tall, weighs 165 pounds and is only 22 years old. You can write to him at RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower Street, Hollywood, Cal.

E. D. Ruccio, New Haven, Conn. Yes, "King Solomon's Mines" was a picture produced in England in 1937, with the following actors in the cast: Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Paul Robeson, Roland Young, John Loder, Anna Lee, Arthur Sinclair, Sydney Fairbrother, Robert Adams, Frederick Leister, Alf Goddard and Arthur Goullett . . . Mary Martin's now playing opposite Bing Crosby and Brian Donlevy in "Birth of the Blues" due in November.

Wanda Atkin, Portland, Ore. Just send in your 25c to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal., and they'll be glad to send you an autographed picture of Sheppard Strudwick.

Jeanne Hulme, Stoneham, Mass. Dennis Morgan's thirty years old and has been in the movies for four years. Eddie Albert's thirty-two and has had two years of film experience. Both of them welcome mail at Warner Bros. Studios, Burbank, California.

Glenwood L. Jordan, Fredericksburg, Va. You'll probably be surprised but—Edna May Oliver's considerably the jolly soul off-screen and is famous for her uproarious sense of humor! You can get her photo at M-G-M Studios, Culver City, Cal.

Lois Goodwin, South Bend, Ind. Claire Trevor was born one March 8th in New York City and attended school in nearby Larchmont. Later attended the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York more for the lark than because she had acting ambitions. However, before she graduated, she'd become so intrigued with the theatre that she went right into a stock company, played for several seasons and loved every minute of it. Movie shorts in New York followed, then the New York stage and finally Hollywood.

INHALE?

(SURE—ALL SMOKERS DO)

LET'S admit the fact! Every smoker inhales some of the time. And when you do, there's an increased chance of irritation. But — note this vital difference — reported by eminent doctors!

On comparing — the irritant quality in the smoke of the four other leading brands was found to average more than three times that of the strikingly contrasted Philip Morris . . . and the irritation lasts more than five times as long!

IT'S OUT - LANDIS

But even a choice bit of footage in the finale with Star Dick Powell was no special break. For weeks she knocked on studio doors, finally cracked the lead in a horse opera opposite John Wayne, then in "Daredevils of the Red Circle," a 15-chapter thriller.

The next four months pinched Carole's 25-inch waistline and her pocketbook alike until Hal Roach decided he wanted her for "One Million B.C." And it was a hungry, if sensational, starlet who went on to intrigue Twentieth Century-Fox with her work in "Turnabout," "Topper Returns" and "Road Show."

From that point, any movie-goer can bring the Landis life saga up to date. "Dance Hall" and "Moon Over Miami" have polished her up for solo stardom. In her next, "Cadet Girl," she'll turn loose a husky soprano on four new songs. On her marital scoreboard, she's marked up another error: last year's elopement with Stockbroker Willis Hunt, Jr., that fizzled into good-tempered friendship after four months.

LAST January tall (5'5¾"), chesty (36½"), athletic (118 lbs.) Carole rented a lovely, rambling 10-room home in Brentwood that once belonged to Edna Mae Oliver, brought Mother Ridste from San Bernardino to live with her and went into a huddle with Twentieth Century's Dick Smith on a redecoration program that should be winding up about this time. Only other occupants of this new dwelling are a maid, three Malemute Huskies—Mother Lucky and her two rubber-legged offspring, Jinx and Skeezix—and the two famous black Landis spaniels, Sensible and Foolish.

A faithful blueprint of what movie-going America considers a glamour queen to be, Carole finds outlet for an amazing physical vitality; swimming, horseback riding, flying, playing Sunday morning tennis with neighbors Gary and "Rocky" Cooper and roaring around town in her new Cadillac convertible. Her walking pace is a half-run, and music makes her feet twitch, although some of her tastes contradict her personality: André Kostelanetz' music, Hemingway, white fox furs and the Scheherazade "because it's one night spot where you don't have to scream to be heard."

For Carole, the girl whom discerning American bee-keepers nominated "American Honey Girl," as for many another starlet, Bette Davis is tops among dramactresses. Unlike Bette, however, Carole will have to make producers and public alike forget that she's just another slim-legged, svelte-figured ornament to a sound stage before they'll add meat to her film diet. And she'll do it, too. Judging by her record to date, anything can happen if Carole really wants it to. It may seem out-Landis when you hear about it, but it will probably be true!

grass star who did not appeal to him as prospective box-office bait. Furthermore, he was inclined to treat her like a little girl. He did not consider her very S-M-A-R-T. Sonja noted this, and her Norse blood boiled.

Her chance came one evening when she was leaving the rink at the studio. She'd been spinning around all day, and in some spots the ice was littered with wiggly curls. Lanfield noted these and said, "What are those things?"

"Ice worms," replied Sonja calmly. "It's all right as long as the lights are on, but the minute it gets dark, they eat the ice. I wouldn't be surprised," she added, "if the rink is riddled in the morning." Then she smiled sweetly and glided off to her dressing room, noting with satisfaction a slight change in Mr. Lanfield's healthy complexion.

That night he ordered the big lights left on, and I'd hate to tell you how much it cost. Anyway, the front office called him on the carpet next day, and when he explained about the ice worms the caustic comments he collected were Sonja's sweet revenge.

Of course, not all stars resent being treated like little kiddies in the interest of art. George Cukor and John Ford have been known to get away with it beautifully. George, for example, verbally spanked Roz Russell in "The Women" by saying, "Oh, for God's sake, Rosalind, forget the Plaza crowd and try to make sense in Hoboken." As for Joan Crawford, he tamed her over-dramatics in "A Woman's Face" by methods not too flattering to a dignified artiste of the drama. He had her chanting, "One and one make two—two and two make four—four and four make eight—" and so on for hours on end to help her acquire those tragic, dispirited tones that made her performance so powerful.

THERE are a dozen variations of the technique John Ford used to get that climactic scene of Vic McLaglen's in "The Informer"—the one where Vic gets grilled by the Sinn Feiners he has betrayed. The straight of it is that John simply threw big Vic into the scene without any preparation, wore him to desperation by rapid unrelenting takes, and when he broke down in a blur of exasperated fatigue and moaned, "I don't know what I'm doin'—I don't know what I'm sayin' "—the camera rolled right on as he pawed his harassed face like a tired kid. And Vic collected a statuette.

But mighty few directors are wise enough to pull stunts like that and keep their friends. Still fewer stars have sense enough to take it and keep their tempers. Most Hollywood directors have to skirt hostilities cautiously by playing to the opposition.

Lana Turner, for example, from the start has been skittish about criticism and purry as a cat about praise. Her allure can wilt like a winter strawberry at the tiniest reprimand. And when she turns her anger inwards—(she's always more mad at herself than the director)—the company might as well stop shooting. Director Sylvan Simon found a way out of this by bawling out his crew when Lana faltered. Suffering grips and cameramen hung heads and said, "Yes sir, I'm sorry," when Lana blew a line. But she never saw them wink.

Hedy Lamarr's dismal starts at M-G-M, on the other hand, are traced by some canny kibitzers to a lack of just such set tact and her bad luck in drawing Woody Van Dyke, M-G-M's rush captain, for her Hollywood début. Van Dyke, a hurry-up legend in Hollywood, like another director, Lloyd Bacon, seldom rehearses a scene. Instead, he bounces right into it with unceremonious vigor. Most stars adore this, likewise Woody's glib, chummy setside manner, which gets by with calling Garbo "Kid" and Shearer "Baby." But to Hedy, still mentally in old Vienna or somewhere, it all added up to confusion. A lot of people said Lamarr simply wouldn't take direction. The other side is, she simply never caught up with it.

When "I Take This Woman" was on the fire with Van Dyke pumping the bellows, Hedy was perched on Tracy's lap in one scene, and he was asking her if she'd ever played hooky as a kid. Hedy's face remained beautifully blank for that scene when it should have turned tender. It was not until weeks after the picture was over that Lamarr uttered a remark which explained why. The word hooky came up, and Hedy

"Hollywood Extra"

T.M. REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

The face cream that proved to "extra" girls that a quality cream need not be expensive.

Star or "extra"... film players simply can't take chances with their complexions. They must use a quality cleansing cream... and scads of it... even though their budgets are often slim. They demand a high quality cream at a sensible price. That's why eight years ago "Hollywood Extra," the big half-pound tin of quality cleansing cream, was developed. Mass production and economical packaging made possible the low price of 25c for a big half-pound tin, without sacrifice of quality. From Hollywood the good news spread everywhere. Now millions of smart women who can afford far costlier creams, agree with the stars and "extras" who say "it's foolish to pay more." Get your big, economical tin of "Hollywood Extra" now!

THE RABIN COMPANY, LOS ANGELES

BILL MADSEN, United Artists Studio's Make-up Expert says, "Film players must use lots of cleansing cream for frequent make-up changes, and it's got to be of finest quality. 'Hollywood Extra' Theatrical Cold Cream is a real quality product, popular on the lot with all players."

The readiness is all, since no man has aught of what he leaves, what is't to leave betimes?

. . . ALBERT BASSERMAN

The writer is exceptionally intelligent, has a sharp, critical power of observation. When he presents a role, it is only after he has penetrated the finest nuances of the personality. He is an actor who can unleash tremendous energy with an inflection—a glance. Yet he never stoops to tricks. He is a many-sided performer, but he doesn't care much for shallow roles. He demands in each part a challenge to his deep understanding of mankind. He likes unusual types, brings them to the stage or the screen intensely portrayed. There is something classic in his mode of presentation.

In private life, he is modest and unassuming—and though he is by no means unaware of his worth as an artist and as a man, he is not the least bit demanding. He is a battler who champions an idea and never sacrifices an inch of ground. He is fearfully skeptical, a man difficult to convince of anything. And because he has a strong will and personality of his own, he cannot be cast into a mould of someone else's making.

I went to a few dances and also to Judy Garland's Party that she gave for Rose.

JANE WITHERS . . .

Just at present this girl is suffering through a very trying period of adolescence. She is spiritually oppressed, sensitive and easily excited. However, she is the type to know exactly what she wants, and she has both feet planted firmly on the ground.

She has lots of physical temperament and, though she is still a bit childlike, there are times when she is a woman, ripe, mature. At such times, she will say astonishing things.

There is no doubt about her great gift for the stage. And if it were only that she is natural, never forced, never abandoned by her mother-wit, she would still be dynamite to any audience. She has that facility of identifying herself with any roles she plays.

Beyond that, she's very independent, plucky and energetic. Already she knows how to dodge people who bore her. She's shrewd and knows how to detour around tough situations. If she marries later on, she must pick a husband who shares her abundance of temperament, who is emotional, and yet strong enough to assert himself. She has a strong will and would crush a softie. But don't assume from that that she's wild and headstrong. Good commonsense always gets the upper hand.

She's up to the most strenuous physical and mental exercise, therefore able to make a fine showing in the theater. At the moment, she's particularly suited to those roles which combine childhood and maturity.

Millions for Defense and not one cent for tribute. A slight distortion of a phrase by C. C. Pinckney

. . . HOWARD DIETZ

The author has many-sided intellectual interests. He is possessed, moreover, of a high degree of creative energy. Once he has conceived a goal, he goes after it like an express train. Coupled with this unflagging drive is a richness of imagination. He is the temperamental type of idea man, doesn't produce by the sweat of his brow—gets his inspiration spontaneously.

In spite of his imaginative gifts, he is a realist. Businesslike, he can skillfully exploit his ideas. He has a knack for combining art and commerce. It fascinates him to create something important out of apparent trifles. He is perenially modern—shows keen interest in any new idea.

No one could deny that this man has a weakness for women and that they have played a great role in his life. All in all, he is quite an epicurean who has mastered the art of making life pleasant for himself and others.

inquired, "What is 'hooky'? It's a game, isn't it?"

Such once-over-lightly-and-no-hot-towel treatment is perfectly okay with some stars. Bill Powell and Myrna Loy have been romping through the same screwball situations with each other for so long that all they need is a nod from Van Dyke to set them off.

Bawdy, bored John Barrymore takes evil delight in driving his set bosses crazy with a dozen delicious flavors of ham before he does a scene in a printable fashion.

When John was knee deep in his own screwy saga, "The Great Profile," he was called upon for a dying scene. John has expired in his billboard years more times than a carload of cats. So he proceeded to reminisce with gestures, rolling eyes, drooling tongue, chesty sighs and guttural rattles until finally Director Walter Lang called time out.

"All right, John," he implored. "You've died twenty times for yourself. Now—please—die just once for me!"

Clark Gable is one star who is relaxed and pleasantly manageable with his camera coaches in spite of his virility, and if Gary Cooper's director will shoot skeet with him, Gary will do practically anything. You can get opinions at Warner's that the reason Gary was so terrific in "Sergeant York" is because Director Howard Hawks lugged a shotgun around from set to set and banged away with his star between takes.

Of course, easy-going guys like Gary and Clark and a few others wouldn't have trouble with the meanest man who ever hoisted a megaphone. Give them a he-man to hustle them around, and they're like contented cows. Clark is so pliable before a camera that they still tell about the "$50,000 poke" at M-G-M. Jack Conway was directing a fight between Gable and Spencer Tracy in "Boom Town." It was on the tail end of the picture, and about the only scenes left were Clark's. Conway hired a double to sock Clark, thinking he could do it deftly and not dreaming Gable would be other than movie sock-wise after all these rough and tumble years.

Hell hath no fury like "Hellzapoppin'" . . . or, for that matter, like Olsen and Johnson. Universal has cast its latest screwball accretions as two Cupids whose efforts to strew love's bed with roses get bloodied in the thorns. By way of a happy ending, the picture closes with Olsen and Johnson slowly sinking from sight in a pool of wet cement.

Well, he made the mistake of yelling, "Take it like it hurts, Clark!" right before the action, and the next thing he saw to his horror was Gable stretched out in the mud, bleeding like a stuck pig. He'd stepped obediently right into the punch. It took an expensive week for his split lip to settle down again.

Cary Grant is almost as gentle and easy-going stacked up against the right director. His only temperamental requirement is a piano to peck on between scenes, and his only nuisance value (from his director's standpoint) is a a Baby Snooks complex. Cary wants to know "Why?" about everything—not because he's cagey but because he's interested. As Director Leo McCarey once said about Irene Dunne and Cary, "Put those two in a picture—and they'll direct each other!"

That miracle man Preston Sturges always has breakfast, lunch and dinner with his cast at what Paramount commissary kibitzers term "Sturges' Training Table." If he can, he takes them home with him and sits around all evening, bedding the males down on handy cots. One star, we'd better not mention, cracked the other day, "When I have to leave Preston's set, I feel like I ought to raise my hand and ask to be excused!"

Such familiarity does not always ripen into star-director friendships—but there have been some instances of that, too. Henry Hathaway is a top-flight director today pretty much because Gary Cooper, a hunting pal, laid down the law at Paramount when "Lives of a Bengal Lancer" was about to roll. Hathaway, an ex-assistant, was swarmed under by B westerns at that point. "He'll do 'Bengal Lancer,' or I won't!" stated Coop. Then there's the story of Harry Buquet, who does all the Kildares these days at Metro. In the old days when Lionel Barrymore was a director, Harry was his assistant. His chance at a canvas chair arrived after fifteen long years. But his first assignment loomed as a turkey because he couldn't rustle up a cast. Lionel was seriously crippled with arthritis at that point. But when he heard of Harry's dilemma, he stormed, "I'll do the part for Harry if I have to do it in a wheel chair!" Which is just what he did and has been doing ever since in the Kildares.

Some directors have married stars and made a glorious go of it. But most of these aren't directors to the Hollywood hilt.

That is, they don't consult astrologers about when to start a picture à la William Dieterle. They don't swoon and get carried off the set in a trance—as Gregory Ratoff did periodically through "Intermezzo" to the amazement of Ingrid Bergman. They don't stalk around like Imperial Caesar in the DeMille manner. They don't dress up in Prussian officer's uniforms and play Teutonic tyrants as the eccentric James Whale did making "The Road Back." They don't brood swami-fashion like Joe Von Sternberg.

Most happy couples molded from this enemy clay are very normal numbers—on both sides of the fence—and what's more, one or the other usually retires for harmony's sake after wedding bells.

John Farrow and Maureen O'Sullivan kept right on going after their nuptial idyll, it's true, as director and star, until the Canadian Navy beckoned to John. But they steered clear of each other on sets and maintained separately the professional hostilities we've been talking about. Maureen's Irish spunk has popped up in directors' faces in many places, and as for John on his farewell picture, "Bill of Divorcement," he did everything but

The American consul of the squalid Mexican border town is telling George Iscovescu (Boyer) he must wait five years for his U.S.A. quota number. Iscovescu is a dancer, a high liver. Five more years in Mexico. A jail sentence!

Today is the 4th of July. Tourists have spilled over the frontier. George, alone, sees a girl who used to be . . . Yes, Anita (Goddard)—his former dancing partner. "Darling," she says. But he is looking at the wedding ring. She laughs. "Yes, married," she says, "and divorced. He was a citizen. So am I now." George chuckles low. "So that is the game?"

The tourists are gone—except for Emmy Brown (de Havilland)—stranded, with a school-bus and a gang of pupils. Boyer begins his campaign. It takes a few hours. Emmy says yes, her eyes drunk with sudden love.

Back in Bordertown from his honeymoon, George has changed. Overwhelmingly, he loves his wife. Anita "understands." Her partner has gone soft!

And so she takes the new life that love has forged for George Iscovescu and smashes it, tells Emmy the whole cruel story of George's deception.

This is "Hold Back the Dawn"—all but the bitter end—or, just maybe, the sweet end?

take to daggers with Maureen O'Hara.

That pair cordially detested each other. The fireworks flew from dawn till dusk most disgracefully. Adolphe Menjou remembers one little episode to his painful sorrow.

It was the scene where the daughter pops her father one to snap him out of his fog. Katie Hepburn did it originally to John Barrymore. Maureen wasn't giving out the same smacking good job on Adolphe. "Good Heavens!" yelped John Farrow at last. "Slap the man! I'll tell you, Miss O'Hara," he added, with a happy inspiration, "just pretend you're slapping me!"

So the next time Maureen knocked Menjou for such a loop his face swelled, and he couldn't come to work the next day!

That's the attitude that's normal and healthy on a Hollywood set. Like Director Archie Mayo chasing Connie Bennett into her dressing room and tossing a stink bomb in after her. Like Bette Davis hissing Frank Capra every time he eats on the Warner Lot. Like William Dieterle donning white gloves on his set in case he has to contaminate himself by touching a star.

Only, if he did, I'm afraid Mr. Hitchcock would have to forego the pleasures of his whispering campaigns which manage to shatter the nerves of most unhappy stars he directs. Jolly Alf quakes his three hundred pounds in perverse glee as he spreads ominous fibs and disturbing stories around his sets, playing every star against the other. His favorite method is to pat stars on the back and tell them how good they are. Then to whisper confidentially to another star how awful they really are. Of course it gets back right, and no one knows which side is up or what time it is. Poor Joan Fontaine was a nervous wreck all through "Before The Fact."

Underneath the curls and decolletage it's glamorous Johnny Downs, lighting up a cigar between scenes of Hal Roach's "All American Co-ed."

Like the old song . . . "Sometimes I love you, sometimes I hate you. But when I hate you, it's 'cause I love you. . . " That's Hitchcock.

Malicious Al in this manner has scored many points for the directors since he floated over from England. But stars have their innings, too, and I would like to wind up on a retributive note by relating what befell one wise-cracking directing gent named Wild Bill Wellman.

Wild Bill is the type of set boss who makes gag love to all his feminine stars. On this particular picture he was in exceptional form with a certain beauty of spirit, whose identity you'll have to guess. After each take, Bill would chortle, "That's my sweetheart! What has So-and-So (her husband) got that I haven't got?" and so forth. He extolled the merits of the star's face and figure, the charms of her personality with extravagant and florid prose. He sighed for romance, panted for passion in his ribbing vein. The lady took it all in grimly.

Came the last scene and with it the usual Wellman nifty, a sigh for romance.

"Okay," said the star. "Now that the picture's over." She faced him with a twinkle in her eye, and as the whole company watched, launched boldly into a strip-tease. The costume was an old fashioned rig, and there were plenty of articles to remove. Before she got down to the final unmentionable, there were beads of sweat on Mr. Wellman's panicked brow, and he was swallowing hard.

When the beauty yanked this off dramatically, the company gasped.

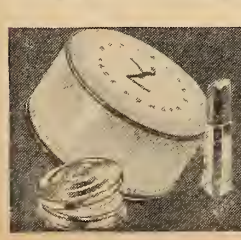
Underneath the last dainty, of course, was a bathing suit. But Wild Bill never saw it. He had made hasty tracks out of there, a sober and chastened director.

Exciting New Beauty in Three Minutes

FOR 5 OUT OF 7 GIRLS

Richard Hudnut offers a new and exciting idea in cosmetics—"matched makeup"—designed to give the added glamour of harmony in makeup!

● Beauty experts say your powder, lipstick and rouge must "go together." Yet recent studies reveal that 5 out of 7 girls use makeup that lacks this color harmony—the secret of natural beauty.



Richard Hudnut has solved this problem by developing a new idea in cosmetics—"matched makeup." And based on this idea, has created Marvelous Matched Makeup. Powder, Rouge and Lipstick in beautifully harmonizing shades!

A mere three minutes to smooth on this exquisite beauty trio—and thrilling new loveliness is yours!

. . . How This New Powder CLINGS! Marvelous is an exquisitely fine-textured powder. It gives your skin an alluring natural finish. Thanks to two special adhering ingredients, Marvelous Powder stays on smoothly up to five full hours!

These ingredients are so pure they're often advised by doctors for sensitive skins.

Try Marvelous Face Powder . . . and matching Rouge and Lipstick, too. In true-to-type shades—one just right for you! At your favorite cosmetic counter. Large sizes 55¢ each Blonde hair is so lovely when it shines with cleanliness. That's why I want you to go to your nearest 10c store and get the new shampoo made specially for you. It is a fragrant powder that whips up into lavish cleansing suds. Instantly removes the dull, dust and oil-laden film that makes blonde hair drab-looking. Called Blondex, it helps keep light hair from darkening and brightens faded blonde hair. Takes but 11 minutes and you do it yourself at home. Blondex is absolutely safe even for children's hair. For extra lustre and radiance, top off shampoo with Blondex Golden Rinse. For all shades of blonde hair. Both cost little to use. Get Blondex Shampoo and Golden Rinse at 10c, drug and dept. stores.

HAPPY RELIEF FROM PAINFUL BACKACHE

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys — and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

her agent, his studio, her studio, an insurance company and half a dozen other worried souls phone. The plane was registered in Jimmy's name. She couldn't use it, mustn't use it. It took a whole day for an exhausted Olivia to convince everyone that she was no airplane guardian.

PERSONALITIES

W. C. Fields: Laurel-copper in a field where screwball-ism has been raised to a fine art, he wrote the script for his newest Universal effort "The Great Man" (formerly "Never Give a Sucker an Even Break"), though screen credits modestly go to "Otis Crible Coblis." On preceding "Bank Dick," Fields signed himself "Mahatma K. Jeeves." Gloria Jean, 13, who plays with him in this one, was scared of the maestro until she discovered the courteous gent he really is. High spot is a soda-drinking episode that will leave you aching. Add note: name of 62-year-old Fields' pretty secretary really is Belinda Boss. That's not a gag . . . Jean Gabin: This brand new menace confesses, in still badly broken English, that he loves Hollywood, thinks American women are wonderful, but wishes they could talk French! So far, he's squired Michele Morgan, Ginger Rogers and Marlene Dietrich.

LONG VOYAGE HOME

Long John Carradine, they're calling him now. And all because he picked up "The Bali," a trim, 65-ft. schooner, on one of those flukes that all would-be navigators dream of. Seems that the chap who owned it loved it with that passion only a seafarer can understand. Down on his luck, he lost the craft to creditors, but still couldn't bear to part with his beauty. One night he approached the night watchman stationed on the craft, begged "one last party for his friends." Unsuspecting, the watchman went ashore to be out of the way. The ex-owner promptly dug out a cache of provisions he had been hoarding in a nearby garage, set sail, and slipped out of harbor under cover of darkness. Many days later police in Ecuador nailed him, accused him of having murdered his crew. Actually, he had sailed his big, 5-crew craft all the way by himself! Cleared of that charge, he was finally booked for embezzlement, and the boat was brought back to San Pedro where it was knocked down for a song—to Carradine.

HAMBURGERS FOR THREE

Philip Reed does a scene in RKO's "Weekend for Three" that requires a long stretch of puttering around with pots and pans in a kitchen. Watching him wrestle in this unaccustomed milieu, co-players Dennis O'Keefe and Jane Wyatt scoffed the suggestion that Phil probably couldn't even boil water! Indignantly he bet them $5 on the spot that he could whip together a tasty lunch for that day. So all morning, while the cameras ground, Phil sweated—and his hecklers feasted at noon on the tastiest $5 worth of hamburgers and French fried potatoes they'd ever eaten!

HE OTTO BE ASHAMED!

A sun-tanned chunk of 20th Century's "Swamp Water" company is back from location at Georgia's grimly beautiful Okefenokee Swamp, bubbling with stories of adventures and mishaps. Choicest was Dana Andrews' rueful account of how Assistant Director Otto Brower had gotten back at him for heckling the former's swimming ability. On one hectic day, a boat overturned. Principals and crew were mystified over Brower's near-drowning struggle to keep afloat until they discovered that he'd been clutching a script and expensive little camera in one hand over his head to keep them dry! The ribbing was unmerciful, but Brower took it manfully, a "bide-my-time" look in his eye. A few days later Andrews and the boys were ready to push off for a day's shooting, when a lovely stranger approached, asked prettily if she could go along to watch. Gallant Dana, all hospitable smiles, invited her to come, spent the day, between scenes, explaining intricacies of picture making. Came quitting time, and the group set out for home. Just as their boat was putting in at the studio's camp dock, two truculent bruisers came rowing up. "What the blankety blank are you doing with my wife!" grated one of them furiously, fingering a heavy revolver at his belt. Dana blenched, began sputtering apologies. One of the prop men begged to be allowed to go for a piece of artillery. The situation had gotten tense as any celluloid melodrama, with Dana sweating big wet drops. Suddenly the "irate husband" and his "wife" broke out laughing. They had been hired by Brower to toss a scare into his chief heckler!

POWER'S MUDDLE

The pooch-fanciers among you might like to bring your records up to date on Tyrone Power's assorted collection of dogs. Bringing the total to five is a black cocker spaniel pup given him just before he and Annabella left for that "Liliom" stint in Westport, Conn., by Flossie Friedman, Annabella's European dramatic coach, now working out on the Twentieth Century lot. Ty labelled it "Julie" after his wife's "Liliom" role. Other Power purps: "Lady," a mongrel police dog; "T.A.P.," (Tyrone Annabella Power), one of Lady's offspring; "A.P.," (Annabella Power), a French poodle; and "Princess," a strange black unidentifiable item.

VIEWS ON PREVIEWS

One California 'quake not registering on local seismographs is the current fuss rocking Hollywood over picture previews. Since September 1, new films are being shown upon completion only to the trade press, and the rest of the Fourth Estate has to wait until close to actual release date. Reason given by studio moguls: reviews, often unfavorable, prejudice exhibitors and public when published a couple of months in advance. This line of dubious reasoning got its most solid and pungent blasting from Manhattan's Ed Sullivan who commented acidly: "I think that of all the asinine things to which the master minds of Hollywood have resorted, this action is a new low in community stupidity." No review could hurt a good picture, Mr. Sullivan argued. By barring some 300 filmland scribes and correspondents from first showings, studio pundits have not only questioned their journalistic honesty, but have muzzled a publicity force that spread reams of valuable advance ballyhoo throughout the nation. At the root of all this hullabaloo, according to Columnist Sullivan, was plain buck-passing on the part of the producers. Accused by exhibitors of turning out bad pictures and thus causing the current slump in movie attendance, the latter had to find a goat—and so picked on local Fourth Estaters, blamed poor business on the nasty things they'd been saying.

KISS THE BUCKS GOODBYE

Trust Jane Withers to figure out a brand new way to keep those nickels and dimes trickling into U. S. O. coffers. She wouldn't let anyone, whether big shot producer or visiting fireman, put foot on the set of "Small Town Deb" without first kicking in something for national defense. And to squeeze out a few extra pengos, she fined herself and co-players for blow-ups, muffing lines, etc. One scene called for Jackie Searl to make an entrance with his face heavily marked up with lip-stick. Janie offered to fix him up the pleasant way, by kissing him—but her fee would be $1 per kiss for the U. S. O. Jackie was only too happy to accept—especially when it took six good smackeroos to do a good job—only too happy to dig out the six bucks . . . Speaking of Jane, she got an unusual fan request the other day. Frances Sadowski, 15, of Wilmington, Del., wrote offering to design her some shorts in exchange for the dress that "had given Jane her biggest thrill." Jane sent along a red velvet evening gown—her first—got back four lovely pairs of shorts.

TOO MANY HUSBANDS

It was on the set of "He Married the Boss' Daughter." Bruce Edwards got ready for his first love scene with Brenda Joyce. But one take followed another, and Bruce's nervousness spoiled each one. Finally Director Thornton Freeland took him aside and wanted to know how come. Edwards pointed surreptitiously to a figure standing on the sidelines watching. It was Brenda's husband! "Would you take him aside, so as not to embarrass him, and ask him to go away?" asked Bruce. Freeland nodded grimly and walked up to a mike. "Will Mr. Owen Ward get off the set," he bellowed, "so my leading man can make love to your wife properly!" . . . Brenda, by the way, refutes the notion that film actresses are all hothouse luxury-lovers. On a recent mule-back trip through the High Sierras with Husband Owen, she slept for five nights in a row with nothing between her and cold, clammy snow but a sleeping bag. On the sixth night, there was nothing but an ice field available for camp, and the shivering pair had to mush on to bunk at a ranger's cabin in Inyo National Park.

Merle made "Lydia" for Husband Korda; worked on her birthday to economize on the high cost of shooting!

ALL PASSION SPENT

A tough moment: When Eddie O'Brien had to go on making love to Nancy Kelly in RKO's "Parachute Battalion." Just before the picture started, they wound up a quivering romance offscreen by getting married. Before the film was three quarters through, they had squabbled, were ready to call the whole thing off!

BAREFOOT BOY

Robert Benchley can be forgiven an occasional memory lapse. He's been almost too much in demand by studios during the past few months. On the set of Columbia's "Three Girls About Town," came time for one of Bob's scenes. He came within camera range, rattled off his lines perfectly. But Director Leigh Jason groaned, clutched his brow. "That was swell, Bob, but why did you keep your head down the whole time?" "I was just looking to see if I was wearing any shoes," admitted Bob meekly . . . Mr. B., incidentally, always does a slow burn when visitors come up and ask him how it feels to be in pictures. He made his first trip to Hollywood in 1925, worked in the first talking picture ever made! There's little chance now, he confesses, that he'll go back to New Yorker dramreviewing. Hollywood is home.

BITING REMARKS

One of the least known nuisances of a glamour girl's career is the braces she sometimes must wear to make her teeth absolutely straight. One molar out of line, magnified on the screen, can make a cutie's pearly smile look like an uneven stone fence. Joan Leslie's wearing 'em right now. Loretta Young's beautiful teeth are one of her most important assets, so she guards their perfect alignment by wearing a "retainer"—a wire band across the teeth in front, held in place by a piece of composition material that fits across the roof of the mouth. Alice Faye's teeth were too widely spaced when she first arrived in Hollywood, but she was shot into a picture so fast, there was no time to do anything but fill the gaps with cement. Later, when she had more time, she had them corrected. Dottie Lamour, who everyone thought had perfect teeth, surprised the town by appearing with a platinum wire brace designed to close a heretofore unnoticed gap between her two front teeth. The gap had gone unnoticed because she had always worn removable caps to hide it, but decided to have it fixed permanently because the darn caps used to fall off everytime she took a bite out of anything.

GLAMOUR, TOUJOURS, GLAMOUR

Wonder if Rosalind Russell noticed that famous glamour gal watching her every move at Ciro's a couple of nights ago? Roz breezed into the club with three handsome men in tow, bon mots, wisecracks and puns leaving a verbal trail behind her. Directly across from her table sat one of the most important feminine stars in Hollywood with an unspectacular gent, obviously a business acquaintance. From the time Roz parked her silken-swathed torso at the table until she gathered her furs and men about her and swept into the night, the gal across the aisle kept her eyes trained on Russell's every gesture. The watchful one has no romance in her life at the moment and we happen to know she's the kind of gal who isn't happy unless surrounded by lots of attention. So maybe she was trying to figure out where along the way her technique for attracting every man in sight has weakened.

POSTSCRIPTS

Though stars receive enough fan mail to keep the U. S. Post Office Department out of the red, their personal mail, says the postman on our beat, is embarrassingly skimpy. Wayne Morris, for example, receives only two missives a month, and one is generally a bill . . . Ian Hunter must be content opening his wife's mail because he seldom gets any himself . . . Brod Crawford and Dick Foran, who share a swank penthouse, have pitched their letter opener into the trash basket. They receive one letter apiece, each week. Whenever they feel slighted, however, they borrow their colored valet's mail. He, Florida Hinton by name, receives a half dozen letters daily, much to the amazement and envy—of his employers.

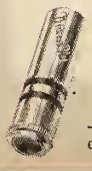
English Tint

The Englishwoman's Complexion Secret



POEMS have been written about it—and pages of prose—the Englishwoman's complexion is rightly the envy of us all. Beautifully different from others—prominent because of its exquisiteness—breathtaking when first you see it—those delicate, hedge-rose tones create a fragile cameo loveliness not found in American skin. But now Princess Pat has successfully made a true English Tint rouge—a very exciting cosmetic which actually brings to the American skin the Englishwoman's soft hedge-rose cheeks. Someone who used it said, "It's astonishing—I would never have believed that tones so frail, could make such a difference in one's appearance." Any American skin can wear English Tint and be more adorable for it. Ask for Princess Pat English Tint in either compact Rouge 50c or creamy Cheektone $1 at any good cosmetic counter.

That Garland gal's a full-fledged matron these days! Here's the inside story on her sudden elopement with bandman Dave Rose!

SHE'S A BIG GIRL NOW!

Hollywood's back on its heels, fanning a helpless brow. The elopements have been coming that fast. First Tierney, then Grayson—then Garland.

Judy's overnight dash to Las Vegas to become Mrs. David Rose, of course, wasn't too much of a shock. The two of them had been advertising something like that ever since they met at a party two years ago—holding hands, talking music, building, out of friendship and mutual respect, the kind of a romance that soon shamed gossip-mongers into silence.

But after Judy's engagement announcement at her 19th birthday party, Hollywood was looking forward to something big and splashy in the way of a Fall wedding—the kind of a prospect that makes shy, soft-spoken Dave Rose panicky. Then one Sunday night as they sat beaming at each other across a quiet corner table at Mike Romanoff's, waiting suddenly became intolerable. Thick steaks had just been served them, but neither could eat. Dave called for a check. The waiter became alarmed. Was there something wrong with the food? Worried, he called the maitre d'hotel. Judy grew impatient. "We just want to get out of here and get married!" she announced to the flabbergasted man. And off they went to the airport. No time to buy a ring. But Judy had her mother's with her.

They made plans as they flew toward Nevada. A quick, simple ceremony, then off somewhere for a week of honeymooning—where no one could find them, where they could be alone.

The first part of it worked like a charm. But a phone call came to the hotel where they were staying next day. M-G-M would like their perky-nosed, golden-throated runaway to report back immediately for work in "Babes on Broadway." Mickey Rooney and an M-G-M production schedule never wait on honeymooners. But Judy and Dave, the two happiest people in the world, didn't mind. "This is no ordinary Hollywood Marriage," Judy told newshawks who met their returning plane. "It's the result of a wonderful romance of two years, and it's the real thing."

Dave said nothing—just grinned approval, his brown hair wind-mussed. Naturally retiring, he's still embarrassed by the spotlight that follows Judy wherever she goes, still a little sensitive, perhaps, over some of the things Hollywood has had to say about the troubles that broke up his first marriage with Martha Raye.

In a place like filmland, where reputation-shredding is a 24-hour pastime, people say amazingly nice things about the man Judy Garland picked for a husband. English-born, though now a citizen, he's average height and at least 12 years older than Judy, though you'd never guess such an age gap watching them together. In his own quieter, quizzical way he shares her enthusiasm for all the more strenuous sports but is bothered by typical shy man's inhibitions on a dance floor.

Though executive blood pressures at Metro would reach a new high at the mere thought of it, Judy would probably chuck movies for housekeeping if Dave said the word. And if she did, he could support her comfortably on his salary as musical director of the Mutual Don Lee network. Though people have insinuated nastily that Dave has capitalized commercially on his courtship of a star, it's really the most fantastic accusation that could be leveled at him. A brilliant musician, he's reached a position comparable to Judy's in his own field, just recently earned a handsome plaque from grateful Hollywood merchants for "Hollywood Boulevard," one of three original tone poems.

Strongest Rose-Garland bond, in fact, is music. It brought them together originally, gave them a common language from the start. Now Judy's writing lyrics for some original theme songs that Dave plans to have published. She believes that some day he will be a great man in the music world, that his success will far overshadow hers. That alone tells you a lot about their relationship.

Right now the David Daniel Roses are living in an Ambassador Hotel suite in Hollywood—until the house they're planning is built. And it's Judy who's doing most of the figuring. What she likes and wants, Dave will, too. All he cares about is a flat spot big enough to set up tracks for the 700-pound locomotive and five freight cars that take up so much of his spare time—and a bit of room for Liebchen, his Schnauzer—and most of all, of course, Mrs. Judy Garland Rose.

The greatest star of the screen!

We are about to usher in a most usherable morsel. It is called "Smilin' Through", that timeless classic of American theatre annals written dramatically by Janes (Cowl and Murfin) and screenatically by Donald (Ogden Stewart) and John (Balderston).

★ ★ ★ ★

Those who have bathed their eyes in the romance of Moonyean Clare will be interested to know that in this moon-drenched incarnation, the director, Frank Borzage, has rendered us a musical version.

Starring the incomparable Jeanette MacDonald. And co-starring the logical choice—Brian Aherne as Sir John Carteret.

★ ★ ★ ★

Gene Raymond and Ian Hunter must be emphasized, for they are major curves in a rounded cast.

★ ★ ★ ★

As the theatre darkens and the travelling curtains part, leaving an afterimage of the main title, the strains of "Two Eyes of Blue Come Smilin' Through" pleasantly massage our hearts and a lovely wistful story of honor and chivalry unfolds.

★ ★ ★ ★

Many of us are in love with the spirit of "Smilin' Through". Many more of us will be when we see and hear Jeanette's Moonyean in perfected Technicolor.

★ ★ ★ ★

There are songs that no one can deny. All of us will react soulfully to Miss MacDonald singing "Drink To Me Only With Thine Eyes" and "Just A Little Love, A Little Kiss".

★ ★ ★ ★

And to the more rousing, gayer melodies that throng through this visit to Nostalgia.

IT STARTED WITH ADAM—AA-1*

Other actresses are equally pretty, can sing as sweetly and act even better, but no other actress, with all of these accomplishments, can keep getting herself into such persistently good pictures as Deanna Durbin. How she does it is her own trade secret; but as a result, even an actor like Charles Laughton can gratefully accept second billing in her current production, and what's more—possibly because his part is one long, luxurious death-bed scene, an inducement no actor could resist—obviously like his subsidiary role. "It Started With Adam" is a home run for Joe Pasternak and Henry Koster, and those boys are still as hot as Babe Ruth at the top of his batting form.

This time Deanna has grown up sufficiently to learn something about life: at least, as much as a pretty hat-check girl in a big hotel can pick up in a nice way. To her comes distressed multimillion-heir Robert Cummings with an honorable proposition: his dying father can't go peacefully without first getting a look at his son's prospective wife, and his son's prospective wife (Margaret Tallichet), a guest in the hotel, can't be located. Deanna, an ambitious voice student, accepts a $50 gratuity and proves such an effective fiancée-substitute at the deathbed that the old gentleman recovers, causing endless complications among undertakers, newspaper people and friends who have marked him down as dead. Mr. Cummings has to retain Deanna on a long-term basis, and when she begins doing vocal solos and obliging with encores, we don't like to tell you what happens to Miss Tallichet and her matrimonial designs.

"It Started With Adam" is an expertly constructed comedy with a wealth of light gags and neatly executed drolleries of situation. We don't know where Mr. Pasternak got his script (there is no writer credit), but it's all pretty wonderful. (Universal.)

P. S.

Hollywood's most beautiful, but most unpublicized chassis belongs to Deanna Durbin. Proof: height, 5 feet 5 inches; weight, 115 pounds; buzoom, 35 inches; waist, 25 inches; hips, 35 inches; calf, 12 inches; ankle, 7½ inches . . . Bob Cummings had to consult his production schedule before combing his hair in the morning. Working in two pictures at the same time, he wore his locks parted on the right and tousled for one role; parted on the left and combed smooth for the other . . . Charlie Laughton spent five weeks lolling around in Universal's specially made 14 x 10-foot bed, built of California redwood, with posters 9 feet high . . . He hates cigars, but the script called for him to puff endlessly on dollar stogies. Set workers who can't afford more than the two bit variety were crushed by the irony of it all . . . No more orchestras will blare out from nowhere when Deanna is supposed to be singing alone in a garden or any other place. Universal's top money maker plays her own piano accompaniment in this one. Studio executives want to build her as a dramatic star, placing less and less emphasis on her singing ability . . . Charles Laughton says Deanna and Edgar Bergen have the best sense of comedy timing of any stars he's ever worked with . . . Director Henry Koster is to Universal what Director Mike Curtiz is to Warner Bros. when it comes to instructing actors. When he wants 'em to act more confidential, he'll plead, "Please! More FBI!" He always refers to dialect comedy roles as "alien corn" . . . Instead of a loud bell or a small boy being used to summon her to the set from her dressing room at the opposite end of the sound stage, Deanna decided that a light flashed on the wall would be less trouble for everyone concerned . . . "Other woman" Margaret Tallichet, ex-studio secretary discovered by Carole Lombard, is married to "Little Foxes" director, Willie Wyler . . . Guy Kibbee climbs out of the comedian groove to play a bishop . . . Walter Catlett, for the first time in his years of show business, had his hair bleached for his role . . . Photographer Rudolph Mate, who had never worked on a Durbin production before this one, prepped for his job by disappearing into a projection room, completely equipped with lunch and dinner, to watch all nine of Deanna's previous pictures. Roy's horse "Trigger" has a phenomenal repertoire of tricks. Can, among other things, sit up, smile, add, subtract and multiply.

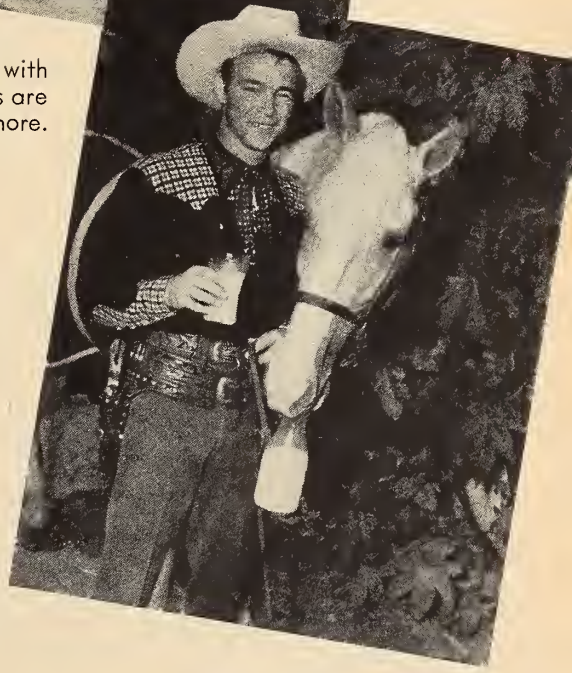
BY JAMES REID

Roy Rogers hasn't yet discovered a couple of high school girls under his bed, as Robert Taylor once did in New York. But he has seen other demonstrations of fanatic feminine worship.

When he set out on his last personal appearance tour, he had a shiny, brand-new, two-horse trailer. But you should see the trailer he brought home. Everything removable had been removed from it by demon fans. Every square inch of the paint job was scratched with feminine names and feminine protestations of love. And that wasn't all. His handsome trick horse, Trigger, came back minus a foot of tail. Women had torn out that much of the horse's hair to have something that belonged to Roy!

After he appeared in person in Carnegie, Pa., a Carnegie girl trailed him to McKees Rocks and then on to Washington, Pa., with one purpose in mind—namely, to get within kissing range of Roy. Every time she thought she had managed it, she leaped at him. For three days running, she smeared his face, neck and best cowboy shirts with indelible lipstick.

She embarrassed him almost as much as that Arizona girl who was so smitten that she followed him in a car borrowed without the owner's permission. He never talked so fast as he talked that time, persuading her to get back home before the sheriff organized a posse.



Roy was only 20 then, completely unknown and so poor that he owned just one pair of pants, which were two sizes too snug for him. But even in those lean days, apparently, he had some

from hillbilly to HERO

HE'S TALL, BLONDE AND NOT TOO HANDSOME—BUT WOMEN CAN'T HELP LOVING HIM! JUST WHAT'S ROY ROGERS GOT?

Cheryl Darlene, aged 1½, steps out with her adopted mom and dad. The Rogers are mad about kids; plan to adopt lots more.

Roy, who used to have a lone pair of pants, now has so many he's lost count. Wears them inside his boots; Autry wears his outside.

special brand of allure for the female of the species.

Now there's no doubt about it. In three short years, he has climbed from total obscurity to the position of Cowboy Star No. 3, and he's giving Gene Autry and Bill Boyd—both long-established favorites—a hard run for their money. He appeals to kids as all cowboy stars do. But he appeals even more to women, if his fan mail is any index. Ninety-five per cent of those thousands of letters a week come from females, from 16 on up.

He can't explain why, and neither can anyone else. He's no Valentino on horseback. Women don't get a vicarious thrill from seeing Roy take the heroine in his arms and smother her with a passionate, he-man kiss—because kissing scenes are carefully omitted from all Rogers scripts. Neither can his appeal to women be traced to the subtlety of his acting, because when he's in front of that camera, he's just trying to be himself as much as possible. Nor does his singing voice, pleasant though it is, have the emotion-rousing qualities of Caruso's—or even Bing Crosby's. And he isn't exceptional in appearance. He's five feet eleven, well-built, athletic-looking, with a young face, blue eyes, sandy hair and an easygoing, playful smile. He talks with a slight drawl and is apt to drop his "g's."

Except that his all-cowboy wardrobe is a little snappier than most, he's the type of unspoiled, unaffected, happy-go-lucky young Westerner you might meet on any colorful ranch. Maybe that's the secret of his appeal.

YANK IN R.A.F.—AB-1*

It seems that Tyrone Power was the real hero of Dunkirk, and the real reason the British came through so admirably on that occasion was Betty Grable—a new Betty, with Serious Interests as well as those legs—who was serving at home as a morale-booster; dancing for the R.A.F. by night, mothering their wounded by day. This film contains more aerial action than story, which is all to the good. With the help of James Basevi, whose specialty is the reproduction of large-scale maritime events in a bathtub, Mr. Zanuck is in a fair way to lift your scalp with this opportunistic opus.

The story, on the other hand, just goes along for the aeronautical ride. Seems that Tyrone, a girl-chasing American pilot, ferries a bomber from Canada to England for a sizable cash consideration. He decides to join the R.A.F., not only to please his old Dallas, Texas, girl-friend, Betty—who is as ardently pro-British as the newspaper PM—but because a couple of Messerschmitts attack him when he is testing an unarmed American plane and make him personally mad, which is just too bad for Germany. Meanwhile, back in the elegant London pub where Betty is dancing, he encounters considerable competition for her favors with Wing Commander John Sutton well in the lead.

You knew all along, of course, that in spite of Dunkirk and a few minor misunderstandings, Tyrone would ultimately grab Grable. First, though, he gets into a fight with Commander Sutton; is saved from German anti-aircraft fire by the death of heroic Reginald Gardiner, (also a Grable fan); is grounded with Morley in Holland but escapes via the channel, and so on. The less interesting parts of the story, the non-combatant parts, take place in London. But, as we all know, London can take it.—TCF.

P. S.

Evacuation of Dunkirk took the British three days . . . 20th Century-Fox spent 27 days and $190,000 completing a 15-minute film version . . . First shots were taken along the Pacific coast, but the waves were too treacherous. "Dunkirk" was moved to the studio back lot so the water could be controlled by pressure . . . "Extras" who had to retreat into the water wore light tennis shoes instead of heavy boots, received $16.00 instead of the usual $11.00 daily stipend, and were plied with hot coffee after every take . . . Scenes requiring shots of German Messerschmitts blasting away at English Spitfires were made at Mojave desert. Studio execs figured that in a lonely spot like that, there'd be the least possibility of anyone starting a panic by reporting the Luftwaffe in action . . . After years of forbidding Tyrone Power to fly, the studio did an about-face and urged him to get all the practice he could, so his flying scenes would be the McCoy. During production, he bounced out of bed at 5:30 every morning, rushed to a nearby airport and took a plane up for a couple of hours before reporting for work . . . Lord Beaverbrook, no less, approved the story, said he was glad it had so much comedy and romance in it and gave the studios the complete co-operation of the Air Ministry . . . Cameraman Otto Kanturek and Jack Parry were killed filming actual dogfights over England. (Kanturek photographed "Night Train.") . . . English war regulations forbid women in auxiliary services the use of bright red lipstick or nail polish, so Betty Grable went without both during filming of the picture . . . Production halted for four days while she had her impacted wisdom teeth yanked . . . John Sutton, 6-foot-2-inch, 170-pound protégé of Bette Davis, was born in Rawalpindi, India. The first studio that signed him changed his birthplace to Orange, New Jersey, because they wanted to build him up as a "typical American" . . . Ronald Colman warned Reginald Gardiner that Director Henry King was a stickler for realism. Reggie read the script and began biting his nails. Story called for him to plunge to earth in a flaming plane. Sure enough, King planted him in a cockpit, gave him an asbestos suit to wear, surrounded him with leaping flame (from gas jets) and spent an entire afternoon shooting close-ups of Reggie grimacing horribly. Mr. G. emerged with singed cheeks and a bad case of jitters.

NOTHING BUT THE TRUTH—AB-1*

Evidently Paramount has at last decided to take a chance and go "all-out" on Bob Hope, a comedian who has earned this belated vote of company confidence by turning out a succession of solid hits. Here, surrounded by an expensive supporting cast and a story which has been filmed successfully twice before, Bob may be regarded as virtually surefire box-office. Sophisticated patrons may snicker at the quaint spectacle of stock-brokers lolling on yachts and tossing $10,000 bets around, but once they accept this out-of-date plot premise they'll probably have as much fun as the yokels.

The aforementioned betting involves the farcical proposition that Bob, an impecunious junior partner, can't get through 24 hours of social and professional life without telling a single lie. His partners, Edward Arnold, Glen Anders, Leif Erikson, do all they can to sabotage Bob's manly efforts in this truth marathon, while Paulette Goddard, his romantic interest, works even harder to outwit and frustrate his tormentors. Between them Bob is reduced to that state of wild-eyed dishevelment in which he seems to operate with maximum comical efficiency.

Without substantially altering the story from its early-1929 version and genially ignoring all that has happened to Wall Street in the interim, Paramount has altered its locale all the way to Miami. There is no reason, of course, why Paramount shouldn't shanghai its plots to the tropical zone if it feels like it; we merely mention it in passing so you won't forget to bring along your quinine and mosquito netting. Helen Vinson, Grant Mitchell and Rose Hobart are others prominently concerned in the cast.—Par.

P. S.

950 temperamental anchovies made their cinema debut in this one. Dumped into a tank of sea water with Bob Hope, they were supposed to cavort and splash around Bob's lightly clad torso. Instead they dived straight to the bottom and wouldn't move. Experts solved the problem by smearing Hope's body with sardine oil to lure the finny creatures from the depths. Bob's hoping the anchovies name a sandwich after him, in recognition of all he's done for their race . . . The gold compact Paulette Goddard totes around in the film is her own. It was insured by the studio for $3,500. Only duplicate of it belongs to the Duchess of Windsor. Paulette dropped it so many times, she finally had the mirror replaced with a disc of highly polished steel . . . Leif Erickson made the trip to Hollywood for this picture on a motorcycle. Ran into a herd of cows en route, and was laid up in a hospital for days . . . Glenn Anders recites mottoes from Chinese rice cookies just before stepping in front of the camera. Says it gives him confidence . . . Hope showed up for work one day with a portable radio, so he could listen to a special broadcast. When he invited the crew members to listen with him, they all flashed similar radios, presented to them half an hour before by Paulette. "Look, fellows," Bob cracked, "don't drive to work tomorrow. I'm buying you all new convertible coupes!" . . . Salt water taffy proved a little rough on the cast's dental fillings, so an imaginative prop man substituted flat slabs of stale marshmallow . . . "Nothing But The Truth" was made by Paramount as a silent picture, too. In 1929. Richard Dix and Helen Kane played the Hope-Goddard roles . . . Cameraman Charles Lang is handsome enough to be in pictures himself . . . Paulette crashes to the floor so many times during the picture, she took tumbling lessons to prevent wear and tear on her valuable chassis . . . Helen Vinson operated her 150-acre peach farm in Virginia from the set, by means of daily long-distance telephone calls . . . Hope loses his clothes again. The script calls for him to grab the first thing at hand that'll cover his exposed epidermis, and of course it's a woman's negligée. The first day Bob strolled onto the set wearing his swishy chiffon costume, his brother Jack turned to a friend, shuddered, and whispered, "Thank heaven we never had a sister!"

APPOINTMENT FOR LOVE —AB-2*

Although we have here a fine specimen of elegant, upper-professional class domestic comedy, some folks may leave the theater thinking wistfully how nice it would be to see a movie some time where the principal characters wouldn't all be rich, handsome, gorgeously attired, their behavior constricted by Emily Post; their conversation affected with dialogue-writer's cramp. At the same time, we have to be grateful for a picture like "Appointment for Love," which, after all, is lightly amusing, competently written and ends with a rough-and-tumble brawl between Margaret Sullavan and Rita Johnson during which Charles Boyer is narrowly missed by a hurled lamp.

The story: Miss Sullavan is a lady doctor who piques the interest of spoiled-playwright, Boyer, by going to sleep during one of his plays, and also, of course, just by being Margaret Sullavan. When she turns down his invitation to dinner, Mr. Boyer puts in an ambulance call, since that seems to be the only way to woo her from her work. He's cute that way. Though Doc Sullavan has more emergency calls than Dr. Kildare, and no wonder, she and Charles find time to get married. They would have had a honeymoon except for one of Charles' old flames and another emergency call, to which the doc rushes off protesting that she is too modern to feel anything as uncivilized as jealousy.

The rest of the story is concerned with this formidable couple's touching efforts to fit their instincts together without renouncing either their streamlined principles or their respective professions. The final solution, worked out in the incident of the hurled lamp, is calculated to gratify masculine vanity and a strictly feminine sense of logic. It's all pretty cute. (Universal).

P. S.

Charles Boyer had to force himself to march right by the cigarette counter for a couple of weeks. His vocal chords were getting too husky from smoking to record well. Usually a chain smoker, he carries two different brands all the time. Uses one kind in the morning, then switches to the other after noon . . . Four-year-old Brooke, Maggie Sullavan's oldest daughter, visited the set during production and met Joseph Valentine, chief cinematographer. Couldn't wait till she was alone with mummy to ask if Mr. V. was the "man who cuts out the hearts" . . . Familiar faces from silent picture days: Aileen Pringle, Jack Mulhall, Charles Ray and Reginald Denny. Denny's miniature plane business takes up most of this time. Started a few years ago to supply youngsters with model planes and parts for 'em, the business took on more serious aspects when the government discovered that his large sized robot-controlled toy planes were valuable to the army as moving practice targets . . . Boyer had to tone down his heavy French accent for his role as a playwright. Asked Margaret to correct his pronunciation whenever it leaned too far over the Gallic side . . . Universal bought $15,000 worth of the most modern streamlined furniture for use in the picture. High spots of the collection are the new types of plastics, and lavish use of blond wood and curved glass . . . During lulls in production, La Sullavan brushed up on her flying technique, piling up hours of air time for her pilot's license. Husband Leland Hayward, top-notch actors' agent, owns an interest in T.W.A. airlines and a training school for pilots in Arizona . . . Monsieur Boyer got the desirable photographic quality for a close-up of his tongue by giving a red raspberry lollypop a couple of quick licks before the scene was shot . . . In a more serious moment, the Dean of Hollywood Screen Lovers had this to say about romance: "Hand-kissing is passé. Delicacy of approach has nothing to do with modern greeting. Today it's results that count—quick results—in the minds of modern romancers. There's no parrying for advantage, no deception or suspense in the modern approach to the inevitable clinch!"

THE MEN IN HER LIFE—AB-2*

Under an unfortunately commonplace title and with Loretta Young not altogether at ease in the role of a ballet dancer, the screen version of the novel "Ballerina" turns out to be a touchingly sad tribute to the iron self-discipline essential to the creation of a great solo dancer. Thanks mainly to the screen play by Frederick Kohner, Michael Wilson and Paul Trivers it achieves some measure of realism. It should not, however, be mistaken for a conventional love story; the only real passion involved is Loretta's for the art of the dance.

Almost all the way, romance is resolutely pushed aside. When it appears at all it is incidental, accepted only with the reservation that art is long and love is fleeting. Though smitten with a handsome young English Lord, John Shepperd (formerly Shepperd Strudwick) this consecrated ballerina marries her aging teacher (Conrad Veidt), and after his death her amorous relationships, even with the father of her daughter, Rose, are secondary to the dance. Finally there is the implication that true happiness for her lies in training Rose to follow the same stoical ideal of self-dedication to beauty.

Well, sir, as we said before, this is pretty deep stuff for Loretta and a bit high-falutin' for the average movie fan in the bargain. But the character of the ballerina lives in its own right, and the incidents involving her illuminate the necessary path of her destiny. "The Men in Her Life," on the whole, is a picture worthy in aim and by no means negligible in achievement. (Col.)

P. S.

The film was produced and directed for Columbia by Gregory Ratoff through his newly organized independent unit, Gregory Ratoff Productions . . . His wife, Eugenie Leontovich makes her second dramatic screen appearance. She was so afraid that the studio caterers wouldn't tickle her husband's palate sufficiently, she cooked him all his meals in her tiny studio bungalow . . . Cherished dream of Loretta Young's has always been to be a dancer. She studied dancing extensively as a youngster and adored it. Six months before the start of this film, she went into active daily training with her ballet instructor, Sergei Temoff . . . She had 32 changes of costume, most of them of the voluminous hoopskirt type—some nine feet in diameter. All the costumes were designed in New York by LeMaire, and when they were air-expressed to Hollywood, it was discovered that they weighed half a ton . . . The picture is a record-breaker, since "Gone With The Wind," in number of sets employed. There are sixty of them . . . Lilly Daché designed all the millinery in the film . . . Loretta Young, who has a terrific fear of horses, had to ride bareback in one part of the film, and in another she takes a frightening ride through a forest on a galloping steed . . . Intrigued by the ballet slippers she wore as a ballerina in the picture, Loretta has ordered several pairs of shoes patterned after them. Black suede street shoes, with rather low heels, are tied across the instep and ankle with strips of suede. Another pair, designed to wear with slacks, is in colored suede with cork soles.

DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE—AB-2*

It was very odd of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer at this particular time to think of remaking "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." Odder still was their decision to cast Spencer Tracy in that classic dual role previously essayed by two of the screen's most romantic profiles, John Barrymore and Fredric March. The result is quite the oddest picture of the year: a picture which is funniest when apparently it is trying to be most serious and never so routine as when it is trying hardest to be different.

Of course, Mr. Tracy personally does bring something original to the characterization: his various transformations from Jekyll to Hyde seem to affect his dentistry less than they did Barrymore's and March's, which—as you may possibly recall—were a series of orthodontic nightmares. But the mechanics of the personality change remain unchanged; when he feels like going out and snapping a few garters, he mixes himself a diabolical smoke cocktail and downs it with a shudder; when he wants to be respectably Victorian again, he throws together an ethical highball and tosses it off with a suitably wry expression.

In two noteworthy respects, Tracy is luckier than his eminent predecessors. With Lana Turner for his good angel, and Ingrid Bergman for his bad angel, it is hard to see how any man could really go wrong. Miss Turner's dramatic talents do not appear to best advantage in the late 19th century, sweaterless styles required by her role. But Miss Bergman, though incongruously cast as a free and easy barmaid, again reveals that she has the most interesting and incidentally the most gratifying camera-proof face since Garbo. It anything in the world would justify such arrant pseudo-Stevensonian nonsense, Miss Bergman's presence would do it.

P. S.

Ingrid Bergman's sexy love scenes with Spencer Tracy had the set workers muttering to themselves. Censors viewed the filmed results, tut-tutted, my-my-ed, took another look, and finally okayed the scenes. . . . Tracy was physically and mentally exhausted by the time the picture was finished. . . . He began working on his characterization three weeks before actual filming began so he'd have the sanity-to-madness transition down pat before he stepped in front of the cameras. . . . No advance ganders at Tracy's make-up as Mr. Hyde were allowed, but word leaked out that it wouldn't be half so scary as Fredric March's hairy-ape facade in an earlier film version. . . . Ann Rutherford, who's not in the picture, offered to loan Tracy the fangs used by her cousin, Richard Mansfield, as part of his make-up when he played "Dr. J. and Mr. H." on the stage. . . . There was no clowning on the set. No chummy chatter. . . . Only visitor allowed was Author Somerset Maugham. Introduced to Spencer for the first time, Maugham said, "Tell me, Mr. Tracy, are you made up for Jekyll or Hyde?" . . . Director Victor Fleming and Tracy have been wanting to do this picture together for years. Fleming jolted high-salaried executives out of their upper-bracket composure by insisting on casting against type, a risky step. Wholesome, innocent-looking Ingrid plays the part of a wenchy bar-maid, saucy Lana is a demure English maiden, and M-G-M's "Father Flanagan" does a complete about-face as the maniacal Dr. Jekyll. . . . Lana had a tough time with the long trains on her period costumes and never did get the hang of maneuvering her bustle. . . . She and Bergman aren't in a single scene together, and met only once, by accident. . . . Longest close-up in the history of the movies—250 feet—shows Tracy's expression slowly changing from Jekyll's to Hyde's as he walks down a hospital corridor. . . For the biggest scene in the picture, the dessert course of a dinner, the players ate pastry and fruit smothered in wine sauce for three consecutive days, staggering out each noon for plain hamburger and coffee. . . .

SUSPICION—AB-2*

An Alfred Hitchcock thriller full of unconfirmed suspicions is news, and that's the cute twist in the present exhibit. Seems that Joan Fontaine (like Eadie) is a lady—and very English about it—a lady sufficiently fascinated by a strange, handsome, amorously aggressive gent to marry him without knowing much about his background or economic status. By a series of carefully Hitchcocked circumtances, an obsession is built up in Joan's naturally cringing mind that the man means to do her in (he has taken an insurance policy on her life, it seems) although to the naked eye he is just our big, familiar friend Cary Grant who we know wouldn't harm a fly. But it's amazing how one of those obsessions can grow, especially when old "Hitch" begins sneaking around it with camera angles, close-ups, enigmatic fadeouts, etc. This one becomes terrific before it finally explodes in relieved and slightly hysterical laughter.

Unfortunately, this film, which begins on a pleasantly racy note, ends in an unpardonable British muddle of sentiment, patriotism, and propaganda.

Cary's and Joan's supporting cast is a distinguished one, including as it does those pillars of the conservative British dramatic structure, Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Nigel Bruce, Dame May Whitty and Heather Angel. Except for a definite thumbs down on the thumbs up and cheerio ending, we cheerfully recommend it.—RKO.

P. S.

Joan Fontaine has had eight hours instruction in flying and is ready to solo . . . Dame May Whitty has been in show business since she was sixteen, starring in London and New York stage productions and just recently in films . . . Alfred Hitchcock has made films in four languages, all with equal success . . . His hobby is tracing name origins of famous English pubs . . . Hitchcock's prize sealyham, Johnnie, is playing an important role in "Suspicion." It is his first film venture. Johnnie is the first dog in film history with a set-companion. Hitchcock's other dog, Edward, accompanied him to the set daily . . . With the single exception of Joan Fontaine, who was born in the cosmopolitan International Settlement of Tokyo, the large cast of the picture hails 100 percent from the British Isles . . . Both Mr. and Mrs. Nigel Bruce have featured parts in RKO's "Suspicion." Mrs. Bruce, former London star under the name of Lelia Campbell, is better known in Hollywood film circles as Violet Shelton . . . Pax Walker, young English actress blown into the sea when the Athenia was torpedoed at the start of the war, makes her American film debut in "Suspicion."

SMILIN' THROUGH

The murder of his fiancée by a disappointed suitor has shadowed Englishman Brian Aherne's life for 30 years. His only solace is her orphaned niece, Jeanette MacDonald, whom he brings up from childhood. When she falls in love with Gene Raymond, the American son of the murderer, Brian flies into a rage and forbids the match. Not until he realizes that he has lost both the love of Jeanette and his dream-bride by his hatred, does he unbend and condone their marriage. His reward comes soon after when he is reunited with his bride in heaven.—M-G-M.

CADET GIRL

George Montgomery and John Shepperd are brothers whom their father, leader of an army band, always wanted to be West Pointers. George is in the Academy; John, unable to enter because of slightly defective eyesight, is leader of a swing band in New York. The girl soloist, Carole Landis, is in love with John, but he's not aware of it.

George gets a summer furlough, goes to New York and John gives him a job singing in his band. Carole is told by John to help George see the town. Before the summer's gone, he's madly in love with her and begs her to marry him. She doesn't give him any answer.

The boys quarrel over George's hitting the high spots of the town, and George leaves to form his own orchestra, taking Carole with him. His orchestra is a sensation, while John's—lacking Carole—skids. George insists he's going to leave the Academy and that Carole is going to marry him. There are a few tense moments, but a happy ending is effected when George goes back to the Academy and Carole returns to John.—TCF.

WEEK-END IN HAVANA

John Payne is being fitted for his wedding suit—preparatory to an altar-trek with Cobina Wright, Jr.,—when his boss rushes in with the news that one of the company's steamers has piled up on a Florida reef. Nothing will do but for John to rush to the scene (missing his wedding rehearsal) and straighten out potential legal difficulties with the passengers. All the passengers are willing to settle for future passage, except Alice Faye, a Macy's salesgirl. This is her vacation, she won't be able to get away again, and the steamship company has killed her one big chance for glamour and romance. To pacify her, John's boss tells him to escort her to Havana and do his best to give her a gorgeous time.

Everything is far from rosy in Havana. Alice loses fabulous money at the roulette wheel, which John must make good, and also gets herself mildly embroiled with Cesar Romero, Carmen Miranda's no-good manager. Cobina further livens things up by flying to the scene to see what's going on. Everything gets straightened out beautifully, however, with John and Alice inevitably discovering that they're made for each other.—TCF.

HARMON OF MICHIGAN

After graduating from college, Tom Harmon (in person) turns to coaching football where he concentrates on earning money with a winning team rather than good sportsmanship. In a moment of stress, he initiates an illegal play to his team and wins the game of the season. In so doing, however, he loses the respect of everyone, including that of his wife, Anita Louise, who leaves him. The severe injury of one of his players sobers him up, and he decides to turn over a new leaf. When she sees that he's going straight, his wife returns to the fold.—Col.

INTERNATIONAL SQUADRON

Ronald Reagan flies a bomber to England and on his arrival meets two of his old flying cronies, James Stephenson and Bill Lundigan, now members of the International Squadron. He's no sooner introduced to the rest of the Squadron when he goes on the make for one of the members' girl, Olympe Branda. He takes her to dinner, and she's obviously infatuated. During the evening, there's an air-raid in which they see a little girl killed. Infuriated at the Jerries, Ronnie joins the Squadron. He's a crack pilot, but a playboy and he's constantly in and out of scrapes. A hero one minute, in disgrace the next. It isn't until the dramatic finale that we see him in his true colors—magnificently gallant and totally unafraid.—W.B.

LAW OF THE TROPICS

This one involves much intrigue and romance on a South American rubber plantation. Jeffrey Lynn is jilted by his American fiancée practically on his wedding day. The native workers would lose all respect for him if they learned the truth, so Jeff strikes a bargain with night club singer Constance Bennett. She'll masquerade as the fiancée and marry him if he'll give her $500. She turns out to be a fugitive from justice, but Jeff is in no position to be choosy.

There is a sub-plot concerning a rubber process Jeff has invented and for which the president of the company is trying to take full credit. Both themes work out eventually, and the fadeout shows Connie going back to Brooklyn to prove her innocence of an alleged murder with Jeff standing beside her.—W. B.

HENRY FOR PRESIDENT

Jimmy Lydon (as Henry) gets in more trouble than ever when he decides to run for the presidency of his high school student body. His adversary, Kenneth Howell, school's No. 1 heel, gives him plenty of opposition by way of ice-cream-soda-bought votes, crooked ballots and vampish June Preisser who lures Henry into one pitfall after another. Pulling for our hero are Mary Anderson, who's madly in love with him, and his campaign manager Charles Smith. With their help he's elected president—after kissing a multitude of babies and innocently reading a stolen campaign speech. He's no sooner accepted the office, than he's called to the principal's office and accused of stuffing the ballot box and expelled from school. After a series of ingenious detective work and a wild airplane flight, he returns, shows up Kenneth as the rightful crook and becomes town hero—with Mary at his side.—Par.

TEXAS

Fortune seekers Bill Holden and Glenn Ford get all the blood and thunder they can take the moment they start adventuring through Texas in 1866. After a series of hold-ups and near-hangings, they meet up with a bunch of cattle rustlers, headed by George Bancroft, Addison Richards and Edgar Buchanan, father of cowgirl Claire Trevor. At the same time they realize they've both fallen in love with Claire, trouble starts with the crooks. Relations become strained all around, Ford is shot, Holden is accused and flees town. In the meantime, Ford comes to, testifies to Holden's innocence in the shooting and seeks revenge from Buchanan who double-crossed him. In killing him, Glenn loses his own life. Picture ends on a fadeout of Holden and Claire, reunited.—Col.

BUY ME THAT TOWN

Sheldon Leonard, mob leader, is caught in the draft. Before leaving for camp, he warns his henchmen that he'll be back in a year and not to get any big ideas about who's running the show. However, the gang wants Lloyd Nolan for their new leader. Lloyd refuses; tells them that he and his pal Albert Dekker are taking a vacation. The pair go off in their expensive car, and while driving through unincorporated Middle Village, are arrested and fined $42.

It develops they haven't been speeding or anything, but the town is bankrupt and fining prosperous-looking car owners is their sole source of revenue. After paying their fine, they learn that the town's for sale. They buy it and get the rest of the gang to help them run it.

After a number of lucrative but crooked schemes, Lloyd, smitten with the constable's daughter, Constance Moore, persuades them all to go straight. Complications arise when Sheldon returns from camp. There's a near-fire, a slugfest and eventually a double knot-tying—Lloyd and Connie, and Albert and Barbara Jo Allen, (radio's Vera Vague).—Par.

ALL THAT MONEY CAN BUY

This is Stephen Vincent Benet's tale of a debt-ridden farmer (James Craig) who sells his soul to the devil in exchange for seven years of prosperity. All good things begin to come to James and his wife Anne Shirley. They find a lot of gold pieces, their crops flourish and a lovely son Daniel (named after their friend Daniel Webster) is born to them.

The night he's born, Simone Simon, a strangely attractive, out-of-this-world creature appears and announces she's come to be the baby's nursemaid. Time passes and wealth changes James terribly. He spends most of his time with Simone, ignores Anne completely. When the seven years of prosperity is almost up, the devil's mediator (Walter Huston) comes to remind him of the pact. James runs to Daniel Webster for help.

Daniel prevails upon Walter to hold a jury trial. Then, although the jury is composed of such arch villains as Benedict Arnold and Simon Girty, Daniel sways them in James favor. His soul is once more his own, and he returns to Anne and little Daniel to live happily ever after.—RKO.

SWAMP WATER

When Dana Andrews' hound, Trouble, gets lost in the slimy, green Okefenokee swamp of Georgia, Dana sets out to find him—strictly against his father's (Walter Huston) orders. Walter tells him never to return home if he goes after the dog. The first night in the dangerous alligator-infested swamp, Dana runs into Walter Brennan, who'd been sentenced to hang for murder, but who'd escaped from the Sheriff. The two become friends, and Brennan begs Dana to look after his daughter, Anne Baxter, and to return

JINX FALKENBURG

She loves champagne, Noel Coward, black dresses and Tabu perfume—which makes her sound very Tallulah Bankhead, but she isn't. No long cigarette holders for this gal (she doesn't smoke), and no zombie-ish make-up (she's perennially suntanned). Furthermore, her name's Jinx and she has a million freckles, both of which items cramp her style if she ever tries to put on the heavy glamour. A couple of thousand college boys recently voted her the ideal date, on the strength of her cute puss—but they didn't know how indescribably ideal she really is. She loves men in loud sports jackets, is an Artie Shaw fan, goes mad at a football game and doesn't gold-dig. What's more, she adores beer—and for good reason! Got $2000 for endorsing one brand last year. Jinx, who was born in Spain and spent most of her life in Chile, has been trying to crash the movies for five years. Managed to pick up a Chilean tennis and swimming championship en route, to say nothing of slues of modeling jobs (she's been on 60 magazine covers, posed for hundreds of ads). In her opinion, though, she hadn't really arrived till she'd snagged that fat and glamorous role in Columbia's gay new opus, "Two Latins From Manhattan."

HENRY FONDA

Paradoxical guy, this Hank Fonda. He looks like a malnutrition case, but he's always eating. Likes every food in the world except apples. . . . Always preferred brunettes, but married two blondes. His pre-Hollywood, love-in-a-garret merger with Maggie Sullavan cracked up because he was chronically unemployed; his 5-year marriage to New York socialite Frances Brokaw remains idyllic. . . . Ultra-modern in most ways (he loves flying, Nylon socks and Dali art), he still uses a straight-edge razor; prefers tubs to showers. Paradoxical but sweet is Hank. He's incredibly generous. Got attached to a family of Okies while making "The Grapes of Wrath" and gave them a job taking care of his 325-acre ranch. Semi-supports a mob of chaps he knew when he was Theater Guilding in New York and rooming with Jimmy Stewart. Hank's beloved by Hollywood hostesses because he's an Arthur Murray-ish dancer, in demand for stag parties because he plays beautiful poker and adored by fans because he's so endearingly natural—and never more so than in Twentieth Century-Fox's "Wild Geese Calling."

LORETTA YOUNG

Chief of the Tastienenos tribe in Mexico offered $26 to purchase Loretta Young for his wife, but the studios said no sale! Among the bigger and better plans in store for her was the choice role ballerina-ing in Columbia's "The Men in Her Life." Besides, she was already wed—to Tom Lewis, big East-West coast commuting advertising exec! He's fast gaining weight on her fatty food menus (creamed potatoes, beans and chili) because she's hell-bent on adding pounds to her scant 107! Her willowy 5' 3" figger looks twice its height, and she claims her legs are much too skinny for cheesecake art. Born Gretchen Young in Salt Lake City in 1913, she was as homely as a hedge fence until she went into movies in her teens. She's always had a soft spot in her heart for dancing and would probably be kicking in a ballet nowadays if she hadn't been such a swell actress. She's scared to death of fires. Goes to movies religiously and pastes every item written about herself in a giant scrapbook. Likes blue and white in her clothes and interiors. Picks out her own togs and designs a goodly number of them herself!

A. L. WHITEY SCHAFER

GARY COOPER

Playing the reticent mountaineer role in Warner Bros.' "Sergeant York" is right up Gary Cooper's alley. All he has to do is relax and be himself! A crack shot, he's learned the art of taxidermy to preserve his more exciting bull's eyes. That singing (for the first time in 14 years of songless movie-making) is the real McCoy, too! He's a hillbilly from way back, plays the guitar and horn and constantly hums "Bury Me Not on the Lone Prairie." Never much of a hand at conversation, he's reputed to have uttered a total of 16 words during a 4-day hunting trip! Only subjects on which he'll wax lyrical are his 4-year-old daughter Maria and his wife. She's N. Y. deb Veronica Balfe, who fell for him via fan magazine pictures while she was in finishing school. He likes to wear old togs, shapeless hats, garterless socks and no undershirt. Hates to shave! When not working in a scene, he lounges around in old slippers and sketches, more often falls dead asleep. He has a true mountaineer's relish for pipe and food! For breakfast he's been known to devour 6 eggs, ½ pound bacon, 5 slices of toast, orange juice and coffee!

WELBOURNE

BONITA GRANVILLE

If it's autographs you're after, Bonita Granville's your ticket! She's been giving 'em out ever since she was a starlet of 7 and still loves it! Wherever there's a crowd, you'll find her headed straight for it! She adores her mom, Timmy, goes everywhere with her (when Jackie Cooper isn't around), eats with her at the studio commissary, wears her togs and vice versa. She won't even buy a dress unless it looks okay on both of 'em! She's never without her knitting and last year netted a total of 18 mostly blue sweaters. Her after-party coffee's famous among her chums, who creep in on tip-toe to have a sip in the wee small hours. One night a week they get all dressed up and dine and dance. The rest of the time they roller-coaster, munch hot dogs and romance in the Tunnel of Love. She steers clear of politics and prefers to relax to T. Dorsey discs. If and when she does get mad, she slams things around, then forgets the whole thing in a split second. Her hair's naturally blonde and curly, and she's never once been beauty-shopping! You'll be seeing her soon in M-G-M's "Down in Santiago."

"It was an impulsive little girl trick," confesses Maureen in this exclusive exposé of her marriage and divorce

Maureen and director Will Price have known each other 3 years and reportedly will merge when she gets her final decree.

BY WOLFE KAUFMAN

MY ONE-DAY MARRIAGE

This article is not one of those biographical items; it is intended to explain the background and details of Maureen's recent front-page activities. But in order to understand Maureen O'Hara's divorce and why it was necessary, you must first understand Maureen. And Maureen is not an easy person to understand.

The thing you remember about her once you've met her is her eyes—large, hazel, steady, sincere. They are the key to her personality.

Maureen O'Hara has never done anything in her life for any reason other than that she thought it was the honest, the sincere, the right thing to do. She is like that, always. Simple, straightforward.

She married George Brown because she thought it was necessary from the standpoint of honesty and sincerity. Four years later, not having seen him at all in the interim, and after thinking it over carefully for a long time, she filed suit for divorce. Again for the same reason. Because she felt it was the honest thing to do.

I saw her the other day at Cal-Neva, a hop and skip from Reno, where she was living quietly, establishing legal residence for the purpose of divorce. She looked up at me, a slight frown on her smooth forehead. She spoke very slowly.

"I suppose," she said, "that a lot of people will misunderstand, but I've got to get this divorce. It's so unfair to him for me to continue being his wife. After all, I don't love him."

When I talked to her that day, she was a few days less than twenty-one. And my mind wandered back involuntarily to a day in Elstree, just outside of London, barely four years ago. That's when I first met Maureen. Only four years ago. She was hardly seventeen and acting in her first moving-picture. She was excited, tense, full of fear and hope and dreams.

I was told that she was a new discovery. A little Irish girl who had been recommended to Charles Laughton by (incredibly enough) Harry Richman. Laughton and his partner, Producer Erich Pommer, were sure she was going to be a big star (Continued on page 80)

CHARLES BOYER says:

"I am a man of many loves!"

CHARLES BOYER tells about his newest picture, "HOLD BACK THE DAWN."

"I am a man of many loves in 'Hold Back The Dawn'—a sort of international 'heel'—a man who lives by his wits and his way with women . . .

"Frankly, I was worried about playing a role which could be compared to my Pepe le Moko in 'Algiers.' But when Mitchell Leisen told me the entire story...how the rogue, Georges, who has known many loves, is at last taught the meaning of true love by the sweet, unsophisticated Emmy . . . then I knew that the role promised to be one of the best I have ever had. I was sure of it when Mr. Leisen cast lovely Olivia de Havilland as Emmy . . . and the fiery Paulette Goddard to play the role of the dancer who plays such an important part in Georges' life.

"'HOLD BACK THE DAWN' is finished now . . . and I am proud to have had a part in its making, for Paramount feels that this is one of the greatest emotional dramas ever to be put on the screen."

Gossip columnists live by telling the inside on Gable and Durbin. Now, no holds barred, we're telling on them!

SNOOP TO CONQUER

This is a strange creature. It lives under tables, in closets and at keyholes. It breathes new gossip and old gags. It talks in question marks. It is a repressed cross between Carrie Nation and M. Nostradamus. It thrives largely in Hollywood and may be found mostly on the corner of the lot where leg art is being shot for Film Fun.

What is it?

It is 300 odd—very odd—Hollywood columnists. It is Jimmie Fidler and Sidney Skolsky and Hedda Hopper. It is John Chapman and Harrison Carroll and John Truesdell. It is every Hollywood scribe with a head full of stories that can't be repeated and a heart full of love for the movie business, scribes ranging from big-hearted Louella Parsons, of the Hearst papers, to dynamic Herb Stein, the Hollywood Reporter.

There are so many. And almost all good. But we have room and energy to tell you, in detail, about only three—a trio of very different and very widely read professors of big-time daily pillars. Jimmie Fidler, Sidney Skolsky and Hedda Hopper.

The first up for diagnosis would be Mr. James Marion Fidler, a slight, handsome gentleman well-surrounded by a live-wire Southern accent. Jimmie Fidler may be distinguished largely by his three lawyers who read his every bombast for libel, his taste for Russian caviar and thin toast, his stinging "open letters" via column and radio which have advised (in the old days) Carole Lombard to steer clear of Glenda Farrell's boy friends, Miriam Hopkins to stop burdening studio typists with her fan mail and to please hire her own stenographers, and Tony Martin to please stop overacting in his warbling.

More than any other single thing, Jimmie Fidler's public criticism of stars has brought him fame. Today, 157 newspapers, from coast to coast, carry his verbal wrist-slappings. Publicly, he has advised Alice Faye to watch her health, Greta Garbo to let M-G-M select her stories, Martha Raye to keep out of night clubs, Nelson Eddy and Jeanette MacDonald to halt their feuding, and he has bawled out Ginger Rogers for being snobbish in Hawaii, Joan Crawford for double-crossing him on a scoop. All this linen, Mr. Fidler has aired. There was only one kickback. When Fidler gave Constance Bennett hell, she fought back by suing him to the tune of $600,000!

Naturally, this rough-and-ready columning hasn't brought Fidler all love and roses. Cecil B. DeMille described Fidler's items as "preying on defenseless people and poisoning the public mind!" Another time, in a trade paper, an exhibitor labeled our hero "Adolph Fidler!"

We mentioned these niceties to Mr. Fidler, across a restaurant table, and he pushed aside his caviar, pulled up his sleeves and indulged in firecracker rhetoric.

"Yes," he said, "I remember when I was called Adolph Fidler. It was a vicious attack and it got me sore, but there was no use fighting about it. I decided the Adolph Fidler tag would only make more persons read my column to find out if my attacker was right or wrong, and when they read my column, they would find out he was wrong."

Jimmie Fidler insisted that, when he criticized an individual or the entire industry, he spoke not for himself alone but for his millions (Continued on page 84)

THAT SEE-WORTHY HAYDEN LAD COULD HAVE A DOZEN GIRLS IN EVERY PORT, BUT HE'S HEART-WHOLE AND FANCY-FREE—WELL, ALMOST!

LOG OF A

BY IDA ZEITLIN

Because Stirling Hayden wanted a schooner, he became a movie actor. He prefers the screen to anything else he could find to do ashore, but if some benevolent gene should appear tomorrow and say: "Your contract's off, and there's a sweet two-master waiting for you down at San Pedro," he'd head like a homing bird for the two-master.

Considering the aftermath of his début in Paramount's "Virginia," there's no chance that the gene will show. His single appearance deluged the studio in fan mail. Gary Cooper still has the inside track on the Jordan part in "For Whom the Bell Tolls." But Hayden is runner-up, which tells the story more strikingly than many words.

He's unique in my experience of movie players. He's the only one I know who, with his heart set on another goal, sidestepped into the Hollywood limelight.

He's not ungrateful for what the gods have provided. He doesn't blab of his feelings nor press his viewpoint on you. Whether by temperament or the tradition of the sea, he's laconic about what most closely touches him. But a fish might as easily try to breathe on land as Hayden to suppress the fact that his one pervading passion is for sailing ships. He doesn't suppress it. It's just there, like his nose, for anyone to see.

There was a large scrapbook in his dressing room, which I leafed through as I waited for him, expecting idly to encounter some of the press bouquets tossed at him after "Virginia." The book was stiff with clippings all right—about the ships he'd sailed in—photographs showing the beauty of masts etched against the sky. His eyes lighted when he came in and saw me looking at them. He owns eight such scrapbooks, and there's not a lone clipping about Stirling Hayden, actor in one of them.

He crashed the movies on the strength of his looks. Six feet five of lean brawn, his face presents odd and attractive contrasts—dark eyes under a thatch of hair bleached by sun and wind to the color of ripe corn—white teeth against deeply bronzed skin—an air of gravity older than his years which heightens the effectiveness of his sudden smile. But looks alone can't be held accountable for the impression he made, else every curly-headed Adonis in town would be making his hundreds and directors could stop tearing their hair. Untried, unsung, he brought to his role an ease and authority which he may have been born with or may have mastered through nine years of learning to master the sea.

Hayden is pleased with his movie success. "The way you're always pleased," he says, "when you set out to do something and do it." On the other hand, he's neither elated nor dazzled. If he views his position more clear-sightedly than most, it's for two reasons. Since he was fifteen, he's been coping with realities which have shaped his mind as soundly as his body. Besides, films don't represent to him a dream come true. They're an opportune way of making a living. He gets a kick out of them. Yet, fêted and fussed over at the Richmond première of "Virginia," he bore in mind "that if I'd come through here two months ago, I'd have come through and that's all. Even now," he grinned, "they wouldn't lend me a hundred bucks. It's all part of a bubble, and the bubble's fun, but there's nothing behind it."

It was at Gloucester that the sea laid hold of his heart. Born in Montclair, New Jersey, he and his mother moved to the Massachusetts fishing town after the death of his father, advertising manager for a New York newspaper, when Stirling was nine. An only child, his interests were those of any normal boy—football, baseball, throwing bricks at windows. Not school. At seven he concluded that he'd had enough of school. Authority kept him in thrall eight years longer.

He spent his summers fooling around the water. One day—he was thirteen—a cruise book fell into his hands and applied the spark to imagination which took fire and began devouring him. He read every book he could lay his hands on about long voyages in small boats. He badgered his mother to let him leave school and sail. At the end of two years she threw up her hands. "If you've got to do it, go ahead and get it out of your system."

He hotfooted it down to the yacht broker who'd promised him a job and presently found himself ship's boy on the schooner "Puritan," sailing from New London to San Pedro. For three months, at a dollar a month, he did all the dirty work nobody else would do. It wasn't like the books. By the time he got home, he thought he'd had enough, retired himself from marine life and went to work in a department store.

His disenchantment lasted just three months. Escaping from his counter to a fishing vessel, he fished the Grand Banks for a year and a half, took a small schooner down to Palm Beach for its owner, shipped as fireman on a passenger steamer for fourteen trips between Miami and Havana. That was almost as bad as working ashore. He has no use for steamers. He has no use for anything but sailing ships. So he heaved a sigh of relief when a berth was offered on the "Chiva," plying among the West Indies. On the second trip out, they fired the captain and gave him command, though he was only nineteen and didn't have his papers yet. At twenty he shipped as a mate on the schooner "Yankee," which took him 'round the world. At twenty-two, he was licensed for sailing vessels up to seven hundred tons. That was a milestone. He planned to go on from there.

"But you can't do this all your life," people protested.

"Why not?" he asked, and they were stopped.

He was happy. He had his adventures but refuses to allow them any large significance. "Things don't happen that make very good reading. The world isn't full of cannibals and shipwrecks. It's a job like any other—like working in a mine or on a ranch. Has its high points and low points. In between, to most people, it would be monotonous. But if you like it, it's your life, that's all."

Whatever his own feeling, the press viewed him as a romantic figure, and publicized his youth, his exploits and his attractiveness. Tom (Continued on page 75)

PARTY OF THE MONTH

When half of Hollywood treks 90 miles to see a play, it must be something. It was!—Ingrid Bergman in "Anna Christie"

It's a 2-hour drive to Santa Barbara, but Lana Turner and Tony Martin wouldn't have missed the opening for anything. Lana and Ingrid became good friends while making "Dr. Jekyll."

During intermission everyone whipped out for cool drinks. (Temperature was over 100°.) That's Kay Aldridge with Alfred de Liagre, co-director of the play.

After the play, Ingrid dined with John Houseman, managing director, at Ronnie Colman's eatery, "Harbor House." Her hubby was in Hollywood a few weeks but has returned to Sweden.

Dick Barthelmess' daughter, Mary, is that gal in a million who's actually turned down screen tests! She's working as stage assistant with the Selznick Company.

Bergman was thrilled that the Lobero Theater was so packed, and more than half the 700 customers were Hollywood-ites.

Best friends Geraldine Fitzgerald and Livvie de Havilland left their respective husband and beaux in Hollywood and had themselves a time alone. Geraldine will star in the next Selznick play.

The irrepressible Bob Benchley snored through most of the play but perked up afterwards. He was with Elizabeth McAneny, who's rumored to be the future Mrs. B.

Mind you, we are not trying to prove that they are the People's Choice for the Loony Bin. Maybe the things they do are mere whimsies, the light and lovable caperings of childlike spirits. Maybe. We can only suggest that you who read be their psychiatrists, classify the case histories about to be recorded as you think wisest and best.

As a take-off, when Barbara Stanwyck was making "Pioneer Woman" for Paramount last winter, she had, in the old lady sequences, a very elaborate and tedious make-up to put on. It took three hours. To save time, she arose at five-thirty every morning and put the base on at home. On the morning of which we speak, she got up at five-thirty, spent an hour over the preliminary make-up, did what she had to do with her hair, grabbed a hasty breakfast, got out her own roadster and, without waking her lord and master Robert Taylor, slid off to Paramount. She arrived. The gates were locked. It was Sunday morning.

Now, that's what we mean. Mere absent-mindedness, no doubt. Still, the Freudian pages are filled with lesser lapses.

Jean Parker and her husband recently bought a small farm adjoining that of Bette Davis in Burbank.

BY GLADYS HALL

They also bought a horse. The trainer from whom they bought him impressed upon them that in order to get the best out of their animal, they must spend as much time with him as possible. So that he would become accustomed to their voices, touches, smell. Jean and her husband were both working, didn't have much time to horse around with their horse. So, one Saturday night they gave a small party. Ann Sothern and Roger Pryor were there, Mrs. Robert Donat, Richard Arlen and a few others. They brought the horse into the living room. He mingled freely with the guests. He seemed to fit in beautifully with the trailing ivy wallpaper. This is the truth, s'help me.

On the set of "Ladies in Retirement" where, if you know the play, you know that each character is decidedly psychopathic, the players, mad Idesy Lupino, mad Louis Hayward, mad Elsa Lanchester, et al., all behaving like fugitives from a padded cell, took their roles very grimly. After each scene, they would retire into their portable dressing rooms and crouch there, hugging their morbid moods, and could not be lured forth again for the next scene. The poor assistant director had himself a time. At the start of each new scene he would go from portable to portable making up little speeches, saying little prayers to induce the Mr. and Mrs. Moonbeams to come forth. This took time, not to mention patience. He finally hit upon a device. He bought him a flute. Then he'd stand in the center of the sound stage and play it, whereupon the doors of the portables would fling open and the cast would burst forth.

In Hollywood there are a few select people more or less known to be slightly "tetched" . . . among this number, Ida Lupino, John Carroll, Marie Wilson, Eddie Albert and Louis Hayward figure rather prominently. In a nice, non-violent way, of course.

Eddie, for example, has a divine faith in Mankind. He says so. He is always investing money in a number of strange experiments designed to benefit it. On a recent trip to Mexico, he met an aged Indian who claimed to have found a herb which, properly brewed, makes the weak strong, the strong stronger, etc. Eddie concluded he would be a guinea pig and drink some of the brew himself. He did. The next day great bumps and humps appeared all over his face, head and elsewhere. He looked, in his own words, like "a man from Mars."

But not to be deterred, Eddie is now said to be interested in a device that, if (Continued on page 97)

DATES, MAKE-UP, CLOTHES — THAT GARLAND GAL HAD PROBLEMS, TOO. HERE'S HOW HER MOM SOLVED 'EM!

We take pleasure in introducing to you Judy Garland's mother, Mrs. William P. Gilmore. We took greater pleasure in meeting her. She's small, gay, gracious and combines the best features of good humor and good sense. Asked to talk as an expert on mother-daughter problems, with particular reference to Judy, she demurred only at the word expert. "Sounds so formidable for a parent," she murmured. "Makes me think of blueprints."

So we'll mention her qualifications informally. She's brought up three girls—Virginia, called Jimmy, the mother of a three-year-old—Sue who expects to marry when Uncle Sam gets through with her young man—and Judy who's just become Mrs. David Daniel Rose.

Since she's in the public eye, we asked Mrs. Gilmore to concentrate on Judy. What's true of her relationship with her youngest, however, is true of her relationship with all the girls. Judy's being a movie star has injected perhaps a minor complication or two, but nothing of any consequence. It hasn't affected Mrs. Gilmore's views, which were established long before "The Wizard of Oz," nor her application of them. She considers Judy an average daughter, herself an average mother. She's dealt with the problems presented to every mother. We believe that her manner of dealing with them will interest the mothers and daughters who read Modern Screen.

"I started," she says, "with the single idea that I'd enjoy having confidence rather than fear from my children. That's still my only yardstick. As youngsters, I never spanked them. I don't believe in it. If they misbehaved, I'd sit them in a corner, face to the wall. Didn't even make them stand. Standing gets pretty tiresome for babies. There they'd sit till I told them to come out, and that did it. To tell the truth, I don't think it was the corner so much as the fact they realized they'd hurt me. They're pretty nice kids.

"Once they grew too old for corners, I'd just go quiet on them. They can't stand that. 'If you'd only rave at them,' their father said to me once. 'When you just shut up and don't talk, it's horrible.' I suppose it is. But that's my way when I'm hurt, and since I'm a natural talker, it's rather noticeable. I don't mean sulking, mind you. If there's anything worse than ranting, to my mind, it's a sullen face. But the girls get the idea. Pretty soon I hear, 'What's the matter, mother?' I tell them, after which it's over and done with. No grudges, no throwing it up to them weeks later. That incident's buried.

"In most cases, I think a flat 'no' is unwise. Automatically, it stirs rebellion in a girl of spirit, starts her thinking, 'Wait a minute now—' I've always talked things over with the girls. We may not agree, but I'm always ready to discuss it. If they're wrong, they admit it, and I'm just as likely to be wrong. Motherhood doesn't necessarily wrap you in wisdom. As a matter of fact, I find myself being pretty careful how I air my views to Judy. She's inclined to lay too much weight on them, which isn't good either. It may be because she was so terribly close to her father, and when he died I had to try to take his place with her as well as my own. She carries our pictures in a double frame wherever she goes. Every few days I've got to clean it up, where it's smeared with lipstick from kisses.

"That's the kind of trust you don't break faith with. Judy knows she can come to me with anything. If she's unhappy, she knows I'll try to fix it. If she's made a mistake, she knows I'll understand it can't be anything so dreadful if Judy did it. So I hope I'm not smug in feeling that I haven't hit too wide of my original mark. Dave, for one, will vouch that my girls aren't afraid of me. 'I can't get over the way they talk to you,' he said once. For instance? Well, if I say, 'Now, listen, girls, you do so and so,' they'll come back with, 'Okay, mother, why don't you do it too?' That's fine with me. I like the comradely sound of it. I never did care for the notion of a little autocrat 'round the house.

"And yet, in fairness to us all, I ought to point out that when I do put my foot down, that's it. There's no argument and no pouting. Something happened here a few years ago—if you don't mind my dragging another daughter in for a moment—"

Mischa's swapping the mayoralty of Universal City for pound master. Says he already leads a dog's life around Martha!

ON THE SET WITH

You'd think after working in Broadway's screwball saga "Hellzapoppin'" for three years, Olsen and Johnson wouldn't have two coherent thoughts to rub together. However, they really aren't as crazy as they look. They're getting a fat chunk for doing a screen version of their brainchild and a share of the profits into the bargain. In private life they are on the board of directors or are executives of 16 important business corporations. And in their spare moments, they're whipping up a 1942 edition of "Hellzapoppin'"—which has already grossed over $4,000,000. Darned lucrative insanity, any way you look at it.

The celluloid version will be given a plot of sorts, which the stage show did not have. Story concerns two guys—Olsen and Johnson—who score a hit in "Hellzapoppin'" in New York and come to Hollywood to film their show. In Hollywood they are told they can't produce a picture without a story. A plot is written which brings Mischa Auer, Martha Raye, Robert Paige and Jane Frazee into the script, and the picture thus becomes a story within a story.

Lewis Howard and Robert Paige play a young millionaire playboy and a poverty-stricken young playwright respectively. Both are in pursuit of Frazee. Martha Raye is a vaudevillian who plays a Baby Snooks character called Baby Betty. She always carries a doll in the bottom of which she keeps a bottle of Scotch. Martha is in pursuit of Mischa Auer, who plays the part of a real prince masquerading as a phony. He can get more free meals out of people that way because they find him more amusing as bogus royalty than as the McCoy. All of which gives you some idea of the thing.

Off the set nonsense kept the entire cast in good humor from the

B'WAY'S "HELLZAPOPPIN'" WAS A SUNDAY SCHOOL

Jane Frazee (pron. Fray-zee) and Bob Paige are stage vets from way back. She's been singing and dancing ever since she can remember; he played a wicked piano at age of 10.

Clowning didn't stop at mealtime with Mischa and the boys—real names, Harold Ogden Johnson and John Sigvard Olsen. Their library of over 500,000 gags took 20 years to collect.

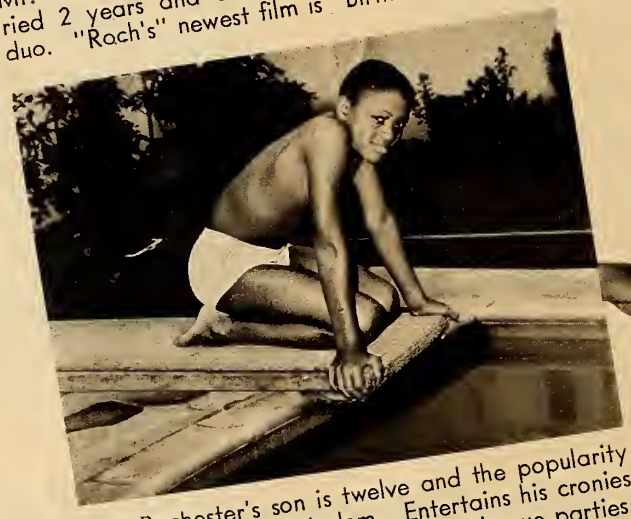
first take till the fadeout in spite of one of California's torridest heat waves. F'rinstance . . . First day of shooting, the boys received the following gifts, all accompanied by gag notes:—From Mischa Auer, a stuffed crane because Mischa wanted to be the first to give them the bird. From Abbott and Costello, a huge pair of boots with the message "Hope you follow in the footsteps of the Broadway 'Hellzapoppin.'" From the Marx Bros, a Christmas tree. From Bob Hope, a ham, a wash basin and board. From Jack Benny, a squealing pig. From Bing Crosby, a crowing rooster. . . . An auto accident put Martha Raye's leg in a cast. Kept her there about two weeks. After the accident, the boys sent her a note saying they didn't object to a fellow player resorting to arson or mayhem to grab the headlines—but attempted suicide!—that was too much! . . . All visitors on the set were initiated into the "ancient and august order of screwballs" and presented with a pin formed by a tiny screw and ball. Prominent members of the order are Charles Laughton, Wendell Willkie, Shirley Temple, Charles Boyer and Mrs. Lou Gehrig. . . . Olsen and Johnson used to arrive on the set about an hour early every morning so's they'd have time to think up new tricks to perpetrate on the cast and crew. The gang eventually retaliated by converting their dressing rooms into padded cells!

With a bit of luck, the picture will be completed in September and will be rolling you in the aisles at your local theater around October or November. At which time, Olsen and Johnson will be back on their home beat rehearsing that revised edition—which is going to include Carmen Miranda. "And you can bet," says Olsen glancing up from his "Spanish in Ten Easy Lessons," "that we're for that good neighbor policy—and just think, we get paid for it!"

The fadeout shows them recording their footprints in Grauman's Theater. Cement's so soft they go in over heads.

PICNIC COMPARED TO THESE CELLULOID ANTICS!

When Bob and Martha discovered that Jane's birthday came while "Hellzapoppin' " was in the making, they sang "Happy Birthday to You" by the hour; partied her with ice cream.



Johnson (left) is a hypochondriac and the dead pan of the combination. Olsen is the sociable quipster. Both own huge cars and homes in Beverly Hills and on Long Island.

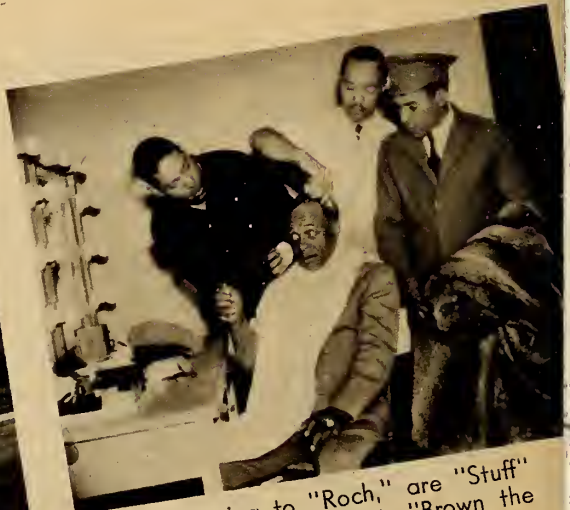
ROCHESTER, THAT MAHOGANY MIRACLE MAN, HAS ACQUIRED A VALET, A YACHT, 13 RACEHORSES AND 40,000,000 FANS. BY HARD WORK? DON'T BE SILLY! JUST A COLOSSAL SUPPLY OF GOOFER DUST!

Mr. and Mrs. Eddie Anderson have been married 2 years and are Hollywood's most blissful duo. "Roch's" newest film is "Birth of the Blues."



Mrs. Rochester's son is twelve and the popularity kid of Hollywood's Harlem. Entertains his cronies royally with dips in his pool and barbecue parties.

Their 14-room house is always mobbed with guests Telephone exchange is "Rochester," but the maid answers the phone with "Anderson residence."

Above, catering to "Roch," are "Stuff" Crouch, his secretary-valet, "Brown the Barber" and stand-in Gonzales Jones.

One reason why so many tourists return to their homes from Hollywood convinced that it is one of the screwiest towns on earth is because of Rochester, Jack Benny's man Friday. Riding past Benny's Beverly Hills mansion in See-The-Movie-Stars'-Homes busses early in the morning, thousands of sane Americans have spied a queer-looking little chocolate-brown man sitting on Benny's front steps alternately swigging from a quart bottle of milk and waving and yelling yoo-hoo at them. A gregarious fellow, Rochester loves almost any kind of people, even tourists.

Benny holds the first rehearsal of his weekly Jell-o program in his home, and Rochester, who invariably shows up late, won't go in to work until the milkman arrives on his late rounds, and he has had his breakfast. Then he struts in and tries to "loud talk" everybody else in the place, showing not the slightest regret that he is late.

Until a few years ago, Rochester did well to eat his breakfast anywhere he could find it; in fact, he often suffered severely from miss-meal cramps, that universal ailment which comes from a lack of funds and which knows neither race, color nor creed. Today, however, he is in the chips and can afford to eat wherever he chooses. He owns, among other things, a 14-room mansion in the colored section of Los Angeles; an airplane; a Lincoln Zephyr and a two-tone Buick station wagon; a yacht; a wife, who has more sense than he, and a 12-year-old son; four servants; 13 horses, none of which has yet won a race; a Dalmatian; a night club and a cheap camera that he carries everywhere with him.

Unlike many successful people who spend their money for all kinds of gadgets they never intend to use, Rochester thoroughly enjoys everything he possesses, even his nags. He can already fly his plane (with a pilot sitting beside him) and expects to solo this fall; a good fisherman, he spends many a happy day on his yacht with some of his friends enjoying the sport of President and peasant; he rides to work in his station wagon, reserving his limousine for state occasions; at home he is forever tinkering with his wife's new movie camera, barbecuing ribs in his red brick pit or splashing around in his tile swimming pool. Unless he is doing something, he is the most dejected person extant, and if he can find nothing else to do, he runs his mouth, often to the anguish and disgust of his wife who has never succeeded in taming her funny spouse, even when company is around.

Until about four years ago, Rochester, who now ranks among the nation's leading comedians, was practically an unknown figure, familiar only to the habitués of barbecue and fried food joints on Central Avenue, the Harlem of Los Angeles, and to an assortment of small fry colored actors, hoofers and blues singers. When he had a job and a dime, his friends included practically everybody in sight; when he was broke and out of work, which was not unusual, they were virtually non-existent.

A happy-go-lucky cuss who made some kind of a living as a third-rate tap, flash, acrobatic and Russian dancer, he sprang to fame and fortune (Continued on page 82)

WHY I SAID YES

When Brenda and Bill eloped to Las Vegas, they arrived in the wee hours of July 13th; had to rouse a clerk out of bed to issue their license. Desert nights are so chilly, Brenda wore her silver fox jacket!

EVEN IN THE FACE OF WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE,

THE HOLDENS STILL LOOK AHEAD AND BELIEVE!

TO BILL HOLDEN . . .

BY DENIS NORD

In Ibsen's play "The Doll's House," a door slammed and a whole social structure crumbled. In Hollywood, in our day, a door slammed and two kids were well on the way toward loving each other.

It happened one night after a dinner party at a friend's house, when, with other guests, Brenda Marshall sat watching Bill Holden.

He had begun to talk about a book he had read called "Johnny Got His Gun." He was excited. He was enthusiastic. He wanted to share his feelings.

As he went on Brenda felt something drawing up and tightening inside of her. Finally she could not stand it any longer.

She flung back her head and her eyes blazed into his.

"I think you're silly," she flashed. "Going overboard about a book."

The room rocked and was strangely silent.

Bill looked at her. He looked at her as if he had never seen her before.

"Have you read it?" he asked.

Brenda stood up. No one moved and no one spoke. She stood very still, her eyes not leaving his face. Then she went out quickly, noiselessly. But the door slammed. And it slammed hard.

Outside in the darkness, Brenda told herself, "I hate Bill for that! I hate him. I hate the way he lets himself go. About a book. It's so childish."

She didn't know that underneath, deep down, so deep she couldn't even sound it out, was her own youth crying to his, her own fervor wanting release in something someone else might label silly. Brenda Marshall, born Ardis Ankerson, felt old. This child of cream-in-coffee skin, of singing blood that makes her voice a low melody, her eyes brown pools of flashing light, her every expression, every gesture an epitome of youth, dared to feel old.

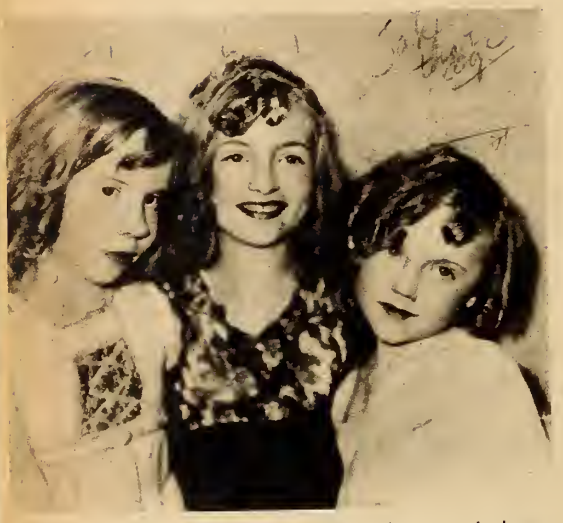
But there had been her marriage to Richard Gaines, actor. She met him when he was assistant at Madame Ouspenskaya's Dramatic College in New York where she was studying. He was twelve years older; serious, scholarly. He seemed to be all she herself wanted to be. She admired him as an actor, as an instructor, she admired him as a man. She married him believing that in marriage she would find complete happiness, and that Richard would help her to be more the kind of person she wanted to be.

If she felt old that night standing there in the darkness, it was because Ginger, her 2-year-old baby girl, was sleeping at home, and one life which she had felt promised so much had come to an end. If she resented Bill's unrestrained eagerness, it was because she had once believed with equal fervor in something so much greater than a book—and it had let her down.

When she thought how different his own life had been from hers, it disturbed her a little. She had always believed a person must stand on his own two feet alone. She saw the fuss his family made over him, and she felt a certain fear for him leap within her. Again something stirred in the depths she could not name. It was a longing for his way of life.

Born on the little island of Negros in the Philippines, Brenda's mother died when she was very young. There was a sister and a father, and Ardis had to learn to take care of herself. She learned that then, and well. When she came to this country at high school age, she saw herself through all those adjustments; she asked help of no one. When she knew she wanted to be an actress, she went to New York alone. She worked hard for what she brought to Hollywood when Hollywood sent for her. She had put in long, hard hours of heartbreaking labor. She admired anyone and everyone who had anything to do with acting. Looking at that handsome face of Bill's, she felt a drawing back, an inability to reconcile herself with what she had always thought was necessary to success.

They talked about it one night sitting in Bill's car on Point Lookout above Laurel Canyon. Before them the lights of Los Angeles glittered, a sea of sequins. Above, a soft blue sky begged for silence and offered dreams. But they rejected both. They sat turned around in the seat facing each other and talked not quietly, but violently, about their work. Suddenly Bill said, "I never want to look like an actor. I don't want to go about looking pale, underfed, sophisticated. That's one role I'll never play."



His words sent a wave of anger stabbing through her. How dare he talk like that? She had known actors who were pale, underfed, poorly dressed. But why? Because they sacrificed everything to their work.

Bill wasn't aware of the change that had come over her. He was smiling, remembering. "Know what I always wanted to be, Ardis?" he asked gently. "A chemist, more than anything else." (Continued on page 67)

Oh Susanna!

SWEET SIXTEEN, BUT SHE'S BEEN KISSED! HERE'S WHAT SUSY THINKS ABOUT THAT—AND LOTS MORE

BY CYNTHIA MILLER

"Sassy Susy," as this candid coloratura's been dubbed, has sung professionally since she was 11. Here she is at 10 (center) with her sisters.

Jackie Cooper (her co-star in "Glamour Boy") is one boy she doesn't consider a J. J. (Joe Jerk). She's heartbroken he's a Granville monopoly.

By her own process of soul-searching, Susanna Foster's reached her own conclusion about the most important thing in life—not money, not career, not even love in its specific meaning, but kindness.

"They tell you this story," she says, "that if you've got a voice or talent, you should give it to the world, make people happy. I think you can make 'em happier by being nice to them. I think it's above honesty even. I'd lie to be kind. But not to myself," she added promptly. "Lying's okay to save other people's feelings. But you've got to be honest with yourself, or else you're a phony."

Having heard tell of the rough side of Susanna's tongue, I asked her how come. She said: "I was young then. Now I'm beginning to use my head a little."

She's been publicized as a flip, amusing kid. She's so much more, that to call her flip and amusing is like calling a leaf the tree. Seventeen next December, she has the sense of twice her years. Part of it she comes by naturally; the rest she acquired through pressure of painful circumstance. It's said, of course, that a child should be forced into wisdom before her time. But you can't wax lachrymose over anything as spirited, sound and salty as Susanna.

Most striking is her gift, rare at any age and practically nonexistent at hers, of objective self-analysis. She's honest with herself all right, to the point of near-ruthlessness. She used to think she had to be equally honest with others. But excuse it, folks, she was young then. "If I had those years to live over again," says Susanna, "there's one thing I'd change—my superior way with other kids. I didn't mean to be. I just never thought of myself as young. In my own mind, I was always grown-up, so I'd try to teach them. Fine business, huh? I even catch myself doing it now once in a while with Betty. Betty Brewer, you know. She's my best friend. But I stop myself pronto. Betty's a human being herself and has to settle her own problems.

"That must have been why the kids always seemed to shut me out, though. I didn't realize then it was mostly my fault. It hurt like blazes when I was ten or eleven, and they wouldn't let me play baseball with them. But of course I wouldn't show it, so I stuck my nose in the air and a chip on my shoulder and decided the world was against me.

"I carried that chip right out to Hollywood with me. I can't truthfully say it's gone yet, but it is shrinking. My first instinct is always this—" She doubled her fists. "Always thinking I'm going to get hit, so why not hit first? (Continued on page 94)

Susy's real name is Susanna De Lee Flanders Larson. She's blue-eyed and what she calls "Swedish blonde." Hates orchids; prefers little flowers. She puts perfume on her nose so she can sniff it all day.

WHEN A SCHOOLMARM FROM BOSTON FALLS FOR A

BY HENRY P. MALMGREEN

CANDY: "I see there's no use trying to fool a bunch of smart folks like you. . . ."
MAN WITH GUN: "Peel off them pants!"

ELIZABETH: "I don't think he can be such an old friend, my dear. Why, you hardly know anything about him."
GOLD DUST: "If I told what I know, he'd be in jail."

BRAZOS: "If nobody thinks his feet are too close to the ground, I'm putting him in jail."
CANDY: "So I can be shot while escaping?"

STORY

Being run out of one western mining town after another was dangerous and unprofitable, decided big, handsome Candy Johnson. He and his side-kick Sniper had just missed a tar-and-feathering by a hairsbreadth, and Candy figured there were safer, surer ways for a smart con man to put himself on velvet.

Yellow Creek, wide open and roaring, looked like the spot. It was. Plenty of gold and suckers—all under Brazos' thumb. But Candy fixed that. He challenged Brazos to a "suicide" duel, broke his nerve, demanded and got $5,000 as a stake for the venture that began to take shape in his card-sharpened mind.

Part of the plan was to buy the allegiance of old Bourbon-soaked Judge Cotton, once a con man himself, now masquerading as a Justice of the Peace. Candy figured he could use the Judge, but he had another more important reason for befriending the doddering old man. Elizabeth—the Judge's lovely, Boston-bred daughter, who had come West after 20 years to join her father—knew nothing of his illicit past. Candy had fallen for her the first time he had laid eyes on her. And Elizabeth was more than interested in the burly, fast-talking gambler—so different from the genteel men she had known in New England.

Candy, as usual, worked fast. As a sop to the town's respectable element, he kicked in enough to build a mission. Then as a challenge to Brazos' crooked stranglehold on Yellow Creek, he threw (Continued on page 99)

GAMBLER FROM YELLOW CREEK—WATCH OUT!

CANDY (softly): "You can throw in your hand if you want to . . . only it'll cost you $5,000."
BRAZOS (through his teeth): "It's a bet."

CANDY: "You sure went to a lot of trouble last night to make it Mr. and Mrs."
ELIZABETH: "You were quite agreeable—after the third drink."

CANDY: "Well, you've got a reason for taking the pledge now. You've got to act like a grandfather."
JUDGE: "Just what does a grandfather do first?"

GOLD DUST: "Won't you try to eat something? Sniper's got to talk to you."
SNIPER: "Candy . . . we're heading for trouble."

PRODUCTION

Out on sprawling Lot 3, M-G-M carpenters whipped up the town of Yellow Creek, largest set Hollywood's ever seen—three acres of late 90's streets and buildings, including a City Hall, a mansion, and the biggest tent ever built for pictures. Three hundred of "Honky Tonk's" 500 bearded and booted extras crowd into this canvas colossus for one scene. It houses Clark Gable's roaring Square Deal Saloon and the largest collection of gambling devices ever assembled in one spot: 60 slot machines, seven roulette layouts, seven crap tables, faro, chuck-a-luck and wheels of fortune. All this canny Metro bought up when the Mexican Government expropriated the $5,000,000 Casino at Agua Caliente about three years ago. This was once a favorite Hollywood haunt and is now a military school for boys.

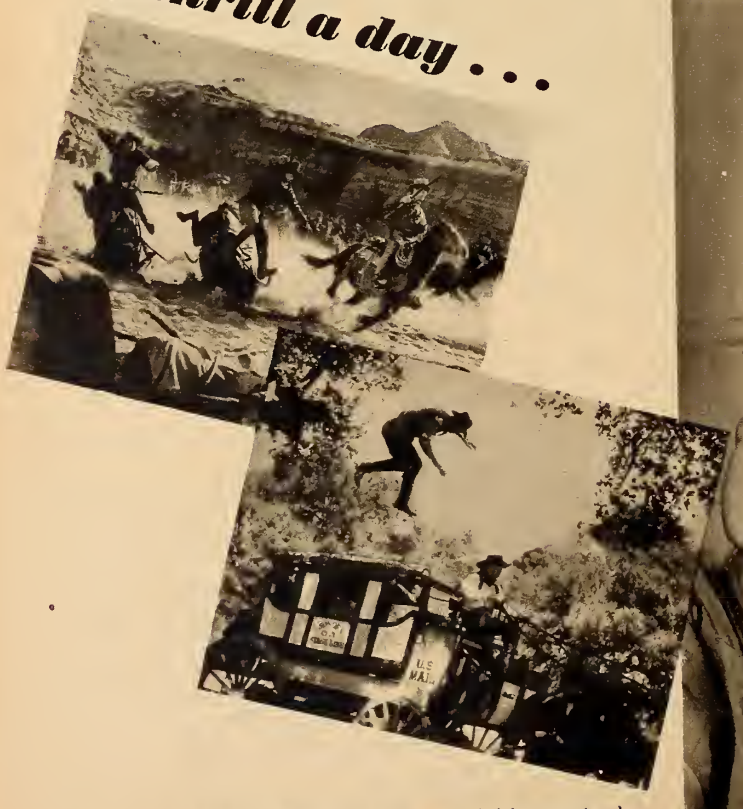
Production headaches: One scene called for a cook to fry steaks for hungry miners. Economically, the studio tried faking it, but the sizzle didn't look real. So off went the supply department for 35 or 40 juicy tenderloins, and all day the extras happily gorged themselves . . . Gambler Gable's three assistants are lady barbers. And even in Hollywood the combination of tonsorial and thespian art is non-existent. So Metro picked out three stock girls, gave them a short, intensive course in hair-cutting and shaving under Studio Barber Jimmy Adams.

Biggest job of Costume Designer Adrian was to keep billowing gowns of the period (Continued on page 99)

SCREEN SPECIALISTS

BY JEANNE KARR

Next time you see a horseman go crashing over a cliff in the movies, just give yourself up to the thrill. It's not done with mirrors but with flesh and blood men like Yakima Canutt. An all-round stunter, of whom there are few, Yak dives from high places, overturns speeding cars, skids, crashes, jumps from moving trains to horses, drives exploding wagons, takes three complete rolls with an army tank. At forty-five, he's better than he was in his twenties. Experience has given him such mastery over split-second timing that to the layman his exploits smack of wizardry.



Actually, they're worked out as meticulously as a blueprint. Yak puts his plan down on paper, mulls over it, marks every point at which something may go wrong, figures the way out if it should go wrong, then— "There's only one thing left to do, and you do it," he grins. He admits to having swallowed his Adam's apple once or twice, notably while putting a horse off a bluff with chute and slide for "Last of the Mohicans." Generally speaking, there's no sense of fear. Stunting's his business. He treats it as such.

The insurance companies don't. They charge him higher rates. Neither does his wife. When they married ten years ago, he extracted an agreement that there was to be no feminine weakness about his work. She stuck to it till he met with his only serious accident in "Boom Town." A horse somersaulted and landed on top of him, forcing the saddle-horn into his intestines and sending him to the hospital for three months. The horse came out unscathed. Yak's never had an animal hurt. When he uses them, he insists on the presence of a humane society officer. He can pay for his groceries to the tune of $15,000 to $18,000 a year. Besides stunting himself, he creates and supervises thrill stuff for directors and producers, works for all the studios and specializes in Westerns for Republic Pictures.

Born on a ranch at Colfax, Washington, he started breaking horses without his father's knowledge at eleven. At fifteen, he offered to ride a horse which had thrown several notables. The owners told him he'd have to get his father's consent. Dad gave in reluctantly after watching his son's performance. He wasn't Yak then, but Enos Edward. The name came later, after he'd started following the rodeos. He'd been celebrating with a couple of lads from Yakima, who got bucked off. "I'll build up the name for you, boys," said he but, being a little drunker than he thought, got bucked off too. The photographer caught a swell picture of the spill, which was used for advertising. So Yakima stuck. At twenty-one, he became world's champ. Defeated six years later, he quit and betook himself to Hollywood.

It scares Yak to realize that another two years will bring Edward, his elder son, to the age at which his father started riding bucking horses. He says his kids are going to college, if he has to take a club to them. By the time they're out, he hopes they'll be smart enough to steer clear of stunting.

HERE'S HOW TO PROTECT THOSE PRECIOUS ORBS OF YOURS

EYE CUES

Eyes are far and away the most important single feature in a girl's face. Their size, shape and color are pretty well settled by heredity, though their expression is decided largely by what you make of your own personality. On the other hand, their depth, clarity and strength depend a great deal upon the care you give your eyes.

Skillful use of eye make-up is extremely important; so much so that the following four pages are devoted entirely to the art of its application. But if you don't first protect that one and only pair of peepers—all the make-up in kingdom come will not make your eyes the things of beauty that they should be.

Strained, neglected eyes just can't possibly look like fathomless pools—or even like normally intelligent, efficient organs of sight. For eyes reflect the status quo of mind and body as well as spirit—and once they're worn out, they can't readily be replaced—so treat yours with proper respect all of the time.

An eye is a delicate, complex, intricate organ, operated by six muscles and divided into two chambers: the front containing a chrystalline lens, the second holding the iris or pupil. Rays of light enter your eyes and produce a chemical change on the retina in exactly the same way that light affects a sensitized camera plate or film. In fact, your eyes actually are marvelous cameras which are constantly taking pictures and relaying them to your brain via the optic nerve.

Under-nourishment, wrong food, a sluggish system, loss of sleep, strain, or any kind of worry show immediately in dull, expressionless, unglamorous eyes. And headaches that appear to come from other causes often are the result of tired, neglected eyes. The wrong kind of light, for example, will seriously affect the efficiency and beauty of your eyes. Glaring sun or electric lights, reflections from large, flat, glossy surfaces—all can cause severe eye strain. Dim or flickering lights are even more injurious. When you work, read or play games, be sure that the light comes from above and behind you. Hold books or the work you are doing fourteen to sixteen inches away and, whenever possible, hold them up in front of you—not down where you have to double up like a jackknife to see them.

Rest your eyes frequently. Look off to the most distant possible horizon or at any far off object. This not only rests but strengthens eye muscles. Blink your eyes often and shift them frequently, too. This rests and at the same time gives needed exercise. Avoid staring in a fixed gaze. This is not only rude and unlovely to look at, but actually injurious to eyes. Beautiful eyes are relaxed and full of motion. They are never stiff or stationary.

Consciously relax your eyes every night before going to sleep. Imagine you are looking into soft, lusterless black velvet or into deep black pools of water. During the day, close your eyes frequently (Continued on page 71)

Eyes Right

MAKE YOUR EYES LOVELIER TO GAZE INTO BY PLAYING UP THEIR BEAUTY WITH MASCARA, SHADOW AND BROW PENCIL

Your eyes may be merry and friendly, soulful and large or fringed with the longest of lashes, but you can always make them even lovelier with the right amount of make-up, expertly applied. It takes only a touch of mascara or an accent of shadow or brow pencil to make them appear larger, brighter, deeper—and very much more exciting and interesting.

In making up your eyes—and every girl really should bring out their beauty—you should strive for an absolutely natural effect. Keep in mind their structural relationship to the rest of your features and to their natural frames—your brows. For instance, if you have a round youthful face with correspondingly round eyes, you can lengthen them slightly with skillful make-up, but don't try to make them look long, narrow and exotic, for that would be out of keeping with the rest of your face, your expression and your personality. The chart on pages 50 and 51 will guide you in using make-up to give your eyes better proportion and will also suggest colors to emphasize their natural hue.

Brows need regular attention if they're to be flattering frames for your eyes—tweezing, brushing and some additional color. Natural brows are the most becoming, so keep yours fairly thick, but do pluck out those unattractive stragglers that clutter the space between brows and those which spoil natural arches. This is just a matter of good grooming. You can also pluck your brows to give your face better proportion with good results, but don't thin them down to a harsh, ugly hairline or make them into an unnatural shape that has no relation to your other features and only gives you a strained or constantly surprised

Keep your brows neat, like Diana Lewis of M-G-M does. Pluck the strays between the eyes and beneath the arches.

Darken your brows subtly with pencil or mascara, using a short, delicate stroke to color each little hair evenly.

After making up, brush your brows with a special lash conditioner cream to give them a healthy, lovely sheen.

expression which looks anything but intriguing.

Before you start tweezing, apply cream or a cloth wrung out in hot water to your brows to open up the pores so the hairs will come out quickly and painlessly. Then, with sterilized tweezers, pull out the strays with a deft, quick movement in the direction in which the hair grows. After plucking, touch your brows with alcohol, astringent or toilet water to close the pores and prevent irritation.

Almost all brows—except very black ones—need subtle darkening. You can use either a well-sharpened brow pencil or mascara and brush but do use light, short strokes to color each little hair naturally. Never make a continuous rigid line or bear down so hard with your pencil or brush that the brows look gummy or artificial. Keep them silken and neat by brushing them free of powder after every make-up job. You can buy a special brush for this purpose. And whether you need brow make-up or not, always smooth a little lash conditioner cream over brows before going out. This gives them a natural, attractive sheen.

Now, apply your eye shadow. For a long time, this was worn only by theatrical people, but today shadow is obtainable in so many subtle, natural-looking shades that it can be worn with good taste any time of the day. And no one can deny its effectiveness in bringing out the color of eyes and making them look larger and more expressive. You can apply eye shadow with either your finger or a very soft brush, but mix it first in the palm of your hand so that it will go on smoothly and delicately. It's a generally good rule to start shadow at the roots of the lashes and blend it upward until it fades into the natural tone of the skin, but if you want to change the apparent shape of your eyes, you can vary this method somewhat—according to the directions given in the chart. But, remember, shadow is always used on the lid above the eye—never below, or it will create a harsh, unattractive circle. If you do have natural circles beneath your eyes, you can do a lot to cover them up by using a foundation base and powder that matches your complexion, then blending your rouge lightly up over the circles.

Modern eye shadows are available in many intriguing colors—blue, gray-blue, blue-green, green, gray, mauve, violet, purple, brown—and their variations, so experiment until you find the ones that are most flattering to you. For daytime, the shades that most nearly match your eyes are most natural and becoming, but for evening, you can make your eyes alluring and interesting by using some of the more dramatic contrasting tones—purple, mauve, green, gold or silver. And if you are the sophisticated or exotic type, you may wear these shades in daytime if you apply them very, very delicately.

Mascara is the answer to the prayers of every girl whose lashes are sparse, short or too light for beauty, for it not only darkens but it also makes them look longer and more luxuriant. And, of course, it does much to enhance the beauty of already lovely eyes and lashes. Whether you use the cake, cream or liquid type, apply mascara with a clean brush, using just a little at a time, and stroke the lashes along their entire length, brushing the top ones upward to give them a slight curl and the lower ones downward. If you use the cake-type, your brush should first be moistened with water. Many beauties like to apply their mascara, as they do their nail polish—applying a light coat first and allowing it to "set," then covering it over with a deeper shade.

You have several shades to choose from to accent your hair, complexion and eye coloring—brown (both light and dark), black, also the more (Continued on page 96)

Begin your shadow at the lashline and blend it softly upward until it fades into your natural complexion tone.

Mascara should always be applied in a deft upward or downward movement following the growth of the eyelashes.

You can postpone aging lines by keeping the area around the eye well lubricated and massaged with a skin cream.

GOOD NEWS

Latest charity event was the picturesque Moon Festival for Chinese War Relief, which included a movie star parade. Gene Tierney rode with Ted North.

Abbott and Costello rumored going high-hat!

WHAT, NO INCENSE?

If it's interior decoration you're interested in, cast an optic in the direction of Mary Beth Hughes. Peach-skinned, fair-haired Mary Beth recently became the mistress of an 11-room manse in a beautiful Hollywood suburb. High spot of her little teepee is the shell pink and baby blue bedroom which Mary Beth personally planned and furnished. She calls it her "Movie Star Bedroom," and she's not kidding! The place does look like a Darryl Zanuck production with a bit of Madame DuBarry thrown in!. It contains an extra-sized bed—a mere 12 feet square—smothered in a pink satin coverlet and topped by a quilted headboard and canopy hung with six inches of blue satin!

It's the window draperies that steal the show, however. They're interwoven folds of blue and white silk that spiral from floor to ceiling like an old-fashioned barber pole!

"I know it's not exactly conservative," Mary Beth admits. "But what's the use of being a movie star if I can't even feel like one in my own bedroom!"

BEDROOM FARCE

Mary Beth isn't the only girl with a unique bedroom. Carole Landis does her slumbering in a room that looks like a corner of San Quentin! Its windows are completely barred, and a contraption beside the bed holds one button which bathes the house in lights and another which summons the entire police force!

Carole isn't very happy about the prison cell aspects of her boudoir and intends to have the Dick Tracy apparatus removed as quickly as possible. She says she's not nearly as timid as the lady who had them installed, the former tenant of the house—Miss Edna May Oliver!

CHARLIE'S WIVES

Some time ago Cecil B. De Mille ran into Mildred Harris, Charlie Chaplin's first wife, and promised the next time he made a picture he would find a part for her. And De Mille remembered. When he started the wheels turning on Paramount's "Reap the Wild Wind," he sent for Mildred Harris.

"Mildred," he said, "I haven't very much to offer. Just an extra's role. You'll get only $7.50 a day. You'll also speak one line, and on that day you'll get $25."

An act of kindness? Perhaps. For Mildred accepted the job. And when she accepted it, she knew the star of the film would be—Paulette Goddard.

At this writing Mildred Harris, Chaplin Wife No. 1, and Paulette Goddard, Chaplin Wife No. 3, have worked together for almost two months. But they have never met. Which is probably as it should be. What could they say to each other?

HEAD MAN

So you think you've got troubles? Well, consider the case of a well-known leading man who had a wonderful opportunity to bolster his career and bankroll by doing a series of personal appearances. The poor guy had to turn down the much-needed break because he's bald as an eagle and won't wear a toupee in public! He doesn't mind donning the gay deceiver on the set because the camera can always do a retake if it slips. But he does have a mortal fear that his neatly curled headpiece will topple to his toes before an audience and expose his beaming scalp to hundreds of fans who "just wouldn't understand."

Incidentally, it's rumored this same star has $10,000 waiting for the man who can coax a tuft of hair into growing on his barren ivory.

CROP CONTROL

If you can take a little gore with your gossip, just pull up a chair. We have a tale to tell about Fox-contractee Ted North, and a discovery Ted expects will net him a million. It's a hair wash composed of 50% worth of eucalyptus oil and 50% worth of an unknown ingredient—and it's guaranteed to grow hair on everyone from Donald Duck to Benito Mussolini.

Ted has the fervor of an artist for his product, so when he recently encountered a skeptic who gave him the old "I don't believe it—you gotta show me" routine, his dander was aroused. Determined to put his scalp sauce to the severest test of all, he grabbed the disbeliever by the hand and yanked him down to the city morgue. There, with the permission of the authorities, Ted rubbed the stuff into the bald head of an unclaimed corpse. The doubter was still doubtful when they left, but when the pair returned three days later, the oblivious cadaver was sporting wild and woolly locks . . . plus a Lionel Barrymore eyebrow produced by a drop of the liquid which had rolled out of place!

Well, that's the way we heard it.

Incidentally, if Ted will contact us, we'll be more than happy to

The festival—held in Chinatown—lasted 3 days, netted piles of money. Near the head of the parade were Paramount's favorite kids, Claudette Colbert and Jack Benny.

Perched on the back of their car and waving like mad were Ann Rutherford and her 3-nights-a-week beau, George Montgomery, currently the town's most dateable swain.

Marriage changes Durbin's personality!

slip him the name of the baldy referred to above. Strictly on the q. t., of course.

DIDJA KNOW

That Ann Sheridan is plagued by sinus trouble . . . That Joan Bennett had her hair cut short to end the Hedy Lamarr imitation talk . . . That Mike Brennan, Walter's son, will have no truck with Hollywood? He prefers being a $30-a-month ranch hand because it's more dependable . . . That Constance Bennett really believes in sweetening her coffee, never uses fewer than ten lumps to a cup . . . That May Robson will play "Juliet" to John Barrymore's "Romeo" in "Playmates" . . . That as "Benjamin Blake," Ty Power will expose his torso in a Lamour-style sarong . . . That strict dieting has mowed 22 pounds off Patricia Morison?

That European actors, Charles Boyer among them, can't get used to American high-waisted trousers and refuse to wear them . . . That Garbo will go torchy and warble to Melvyn Douglas in "The Twins" . . . That despite reconciliation reports, Gene Tierney's marriage still has her in the family doghouse? It's said her brother, visiting from the East, didn't even give her a jingle.

DOUGH GIRL

The magic name of Vanderbilt is always news. So is the magic name of Hollywood. The two combined should make headlines. Actually they do not. For 17-year-old Gloria Vanderbilt, now a movietown resident, is doing none of the things that make reporters turn handsprings with joy.

True, she Ciros and parties almost nightly on the arm of Bruce Cabot, Franchot Tone, George Montgomery or Pat DeCicco. True, too, she commits a misdemeanor every time she crosses a night-club threshold (California law holds her too young for such establishments). But that's where Gloria's frivolity stops. For she never hurls champagne bottles in restaurants, never threatens to elope with this playboy or that and never complains about the high cost of living of President Roosevelt.

It's been said most of Gloria's $25,000-a-year allowance has been dissipated in six months. If that's so, she must be buying defense bonds. Certainly she's not tossing it around this town. Her clothes are simple, and so are her plans. To one of our better known leading men, an old friend, she recently confided in true poor little rich girl fashion that she'd like to marry and have babies.

"I've never had a real home," she told him. "The sooner I get one, the happier I'll be."

INCOME FACTS

They do grow them practical out Texas way! It's just been brought to our attention that our favorite Lone Star Stater Ann Sheridan has never paid more than $75 a month for rent!

Annie pulls down one thousand simoleons each week over at the Messrs. Warner's plant, but that's not making her fritter her chips away on swimming pools and 17-room mansions. Or fancy clothes and expensive entertainment, either. No, sir. Not our Annie. She sinks her dough into real estate and annuities, and the last we heard, was laying out a roll for a gas station in Glendale!

DOUBLE TALK

We like the story Universal's white hope, Robert Paige, tells on himself. Seems Bob was bitten by the movie bug long before he was bitten by a movie contract. At the time he was trying to crash films, Bob was working as an Orson Welles of the airways—singing, announcing, writing and acting for a local radio station. But strain and strive as he would, not a single scout would give him a tumble. Till the day he conceived "David Carlyle."

Introducing himself to his listeners as "Your announcer, Robert Paige," Bob would go into a long rhapsodic spiel about the "young artist I am about to present, that brilliant singer, that answer to a producer's dream—David Carlyle." Then "Mr. Carlyle," none other than Bob himself, would deliver a song. When he had finished, Announcer Paige would return and again sing "Carlyle's" praises.

So superb was Bob's salesmanship, a movie executive who caught the program, finally sent for "Carlyle" and offered him a contract. Twisted in his own trap, Bob had to admit the deception. But luckily, the movie exec was a right guy. He laughed the whole thing off, drew up a new contract—and Robert Paige was the name that went on the dotted line.

KID STUFF

Gloria Jean thinks W. C. Fields is the world's finest gentleman. Fields always uses a mouth wash before doing a scene with her in "The Great Man." It kills his martini-scented breath . . . Allen

The parade-loving younger fry adored the Festival, especially Jane Withers and Fred Bartholomew. Janie's now in the throes of a serious romance with a cameraman!

Where there's smoke, there's inevitably Boyer. He smokes at least two packs a day. Irene Dunne calls him "Chuck" — and gets away with it!

Jenkins, the man with the lemon-drop face, is beaming like a cherub these days. His wife will make him a papa in February . . . Joan Carroll's toy bank holds $4.29. She earned the money herself. She used to give manicures backstage to the cast of "Panama Hattie" and charge a penny a finger. She says a handsome chorus boy is responsible for the odd figure. He only had nine fingers!

ABBOTT AND COSTELLO

It's probably as false as your Aunt Maude's teeth, but the rumor keeps drifting in that Abbott and Costello are not the sweet, amiable gents they were before success laid its crown on their comic heads. There are those who find the boys pretty curt of late and those who even go around muttering "High-hat."

Well, maybe A. and C. have been giving some people that impression. We haven't noticed it. And it's plain their critics haven't taken time out to consider what the team has been through lately —the unrelenting stream of pictures, exhausting personal appearance tours, the grueling radio shows. Certainly an occasional spurt of temper is forgivable under such circumstances.

Anyway, Universal isn't angry with them. The studio has just presented each of the boys with a shiny new trailer. Lou calls his the Casa Costello, and Bud's monikered his Abbott Manor.

And speaking of Abbott, he has another manner that interests the studio—a romantic one! To everyone's surprise, Bud is beginning to draw down an astonishing quantity of sentimental fan mail in the best Boyer tradition!

And does that make Costello jealous? He says not. "I guess I'm the intellectual type," sighs he.

THE OLD SPELL GAME

Marlene Dietrich is making a picture at Columbia called "Miss Madden is Willing." What we'd like to know is how Marlene finds time for movie work. Ever since Jean Gabin swam into her ken, the sultry Miss Dietrich's been almost too busy to eat. At practically any hour she can be seen walking with Jean and talking with Jean. In fact, our agents report she wields such an influence over the fascinating Frenchman, he's even permitted her to redecorate his house to suit her own tastes.

Marlene has quite a knack for brightening the dark corners where bachelors live. You will recall, she also made some rather drastic interior alterations in Erich Maria Remarque's home—before Greta Garbo came along and changed things back again!

There's one little detail in the Gabin home Marlene is not responsible for. That's the Dietrich photo gallery spread over the place. In two rooms alone, his living room and den, Jean has displayed seven framed portraits of his luscious girl friend. And loose on the piano are duplicates of each one framed. That's what we call friendship!

MARRIAGE AND MISS DURBIN

Love, as they say, is a wonderful thing. It makes old people young, and young people younger. And so it is in the case of Deanna Durbin.

Now that Deanna is well-advanced in matronhood, friends are becoming aware of a radical change in her demeanor. Gone is the air of maturity and excessive dignity with which Deanna awed the world. The new Mrs. Paul obviously has grown more youthful. She mingles and melts when she's in a crowd, is noticeably buoyant and more friendly. At the rate she's going, joshing intimates declare she'll soon be crawling around in didies!

On the subject of didies and those who wear them, Deanna herself has something to say. "No babies for four or five years. Vaughn and I want to have lots of fun while we're young. But you can put us down for 1946. We do want a family."

STRICTLY BUSINESS

Remember, not so long ago when an Earl Carroll bartender asked John Barrymore if he knew what a zombie was, and Barrymore replied: "I should—I was married to one!" That same evening, John made a few unfortunate and ungentlemanly remarks to a young lady at a nearby table and, in the ensuing brawl with the young lady's escort, was tossed out of Carroll's on his ear.

John has never gone back to the restaurant. Which is too bad for it was his favorite hangout, and he's been like a lamb without its baa ever since.

But John can take heart again. He may soon find another night spot ready to welcome him with open arms. None other than Elaine Barrie, John's former wife and the lady so ungallantly referred to above, is planning to open a snazzy club in the San Fernando Valley.

Elaine is a smart girl. She knows no club can exist without publicity. And she knows publicity follows Barrymore. It's our guess Elaine will forgive and forget and possibly even stage a tender reconciliation with her Puckish ex-mate.

We can just see it now. Soft lights. Sweet music. An intimate scene between a man and his woman . . . with all newspapermen invited!

A MAN WITH A PAST

It's a tough life studio press agents lead. As though it weren't hard enough making dumb dames appear smart, they now have to make smart kids appear dumb!

Over at M-G-M is an example of what we mean. The studio recently contracted a cute little five-year-old named Richard Hall. But Richard is more than cute. He is also a genius.

And is Metro proud of owning the kind of youngster who would make Einstein hide in his own hair? They are not. Metro believes the public finds child prodigies repulsive! So, instead of blowing their horns about Dicky—who, incidentally, was discovered by Tallulah Bankhead—studio publicity men have been instructed to keep his past hushed up.

However, we are not M-G-M press agents. We are going to risk everything and tell all. Here goes:

Richard Hall learned to read at the age of one. He peruses the newspapers daily, foreign news included. He has played the piano since he was two. He composes original music—and it's good. He is currently engaged in doing a smash job in "Shadow of Thin Man." He is said to be giving Bill Powell an inferiority complex.

Are you repulsed? We hope not. In our opinion, Dicky is kind of nice. He just got off on the wrong foot.

WE'RE CONVINCED!

As long as Hollywood feels duty bound to produce an annual crop of Cinderellas, we pray they will continue to pick them as sweet and deserving as Joan Leslie. Joan is the original Miracle Kid, but her indifference to the wonders that have befallen her is so complete, it's weird!

We know. We talked to her just before she set off on a recent trip to New York. She was going, she told us, to see the shows and meet the press. She went on to say she would reside at the ultra-deluxe Ritz Towers Hotel, occupy a plushy suite and wear exquisite clothes while being fêted by scores of celebrities. Which is quite something for a young lady who, the last time she visited the Big Town, lived in a tent outside the city limits!

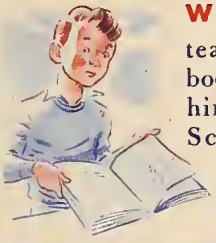
She was thrilled, of course. But in such a wholesome, Christmasy sort of way, our suspicions were soon aroused.

"Joan," we said, watching carefully for any grande dame gesture. "You're going to entertain a great many people. Have you anything in mind by way of preparing for these meetings?"

Warners' wonder child gulped. "Gosh, yes," she said. "I must remember to take the bands off my teeth!"

WASTE MATTER

Bette Davis has an itch. This time it's to co-star with Franchot Tone. She thinks the soulful-eyed, cynical-smiled Tone is the greatest actor ever to hit Hollywood, not excluding Muni and Tracy. She's even threatening to turn the studio upside down in order to get him for a leading man!



Bette's only gripe against Franchot is that up till now he's been wasting himself. That isn't exactly news to Mr. Tone. Lots of women have inferred that. But this is the first time on record that a female has meant as an actor—and not as a potential husband!

MODESTY IN MONKEYDOM

When the Hays office banned the "sweater set," woolen manufacturers jumped to the defense of the victims, beating their breasts and shouting for justice. When heavy drinking and swearing scenes were ordered curbed, beer mug makers and rugged individualists leaped screaming to the fore and wrote their congressmen. In fact, every time the Hays office has issued an edict, someone has risen in anger and denounced it. That is—every time but one.

We learned about the exception to the rule just the other day from a quiet little man named Jake. Jake is the keeper of a chimpanzee called Muk, and we came upon the pair in a Paramount alleyway outside the sound stage where Dorothy Lamour is at present saronging in a picture entitled "Malaya."

Now, there is nothing unusual about a monkey on a studio lot, but what Jake was doing to this one was slightly out of the ordinary. For Muk, an extremely unappetizing-looking dish, was perched atop a beer barrel on all fours—with his rump pointed squarely into Jake's face. And Jake, poor fellow, was slowly and sadly blackening that rump with liquid shoe polish!

When we had recovered from a double take that almost broke our neck, we asked Jake how come.

"It's the Hays office," he told us, gently working his way around a curve.

"The ape family don't have much hair on this part of their anatomy, and the Hays Office says it's indecent for the pink skin to show through on the screen. So we paint 'em," he said, demonstrating with a second coat. "Paint 'em every hour because the chimps jump around so much, it wears off. Silly, ain't it?" We thought we detected a note of embarrassment.

"Uh, huh," we murmured, and we walked away. We felt he'd rather be alone.

to the swamp with some panther traps. Dana promises, sets off for town with "Trouble," who has reappeared.

He moves into a shack near where Anne lives and proceeds to fall in love with her, completely neglecting his former sweetheart, Virginia Gilmore. Dana returns to Brennan with the traps and learns the real story of the murder for which Walter's to hang. The whole thing was framed, and the actual slayer is Guinn Williams.

Back in town again, Dana attends a meeting called by the sheriff, during which Virginia—jilted and bitter—challenges him to tell whom he visits in the swamp and suggests that perhaps it's Brennan.

The last reels of the film show a thrilling fight in the swamp between Andrews and Brennan and Guinn Williams and his brother, Ward Bond. "Trouble" appears at the psychological moment, and all ends well—with wedding bells for Anne and Dana in the offing.—TCF.

THE SMILING GHOST

Rich and lovely Alexis Smith carries the jinx label "Kiss of Death Girl" because all but one of her suitors have died violently. The sole survivor, David Bruce, is in an iron lung. To lift the hoodoo, Alexis' aunt, Helen Westley, hires Wayne Morris for $1,000 and expenses, to court her for a month. Through a mess of ghostly adventures, he wins through but ends up, not in Alexis' arms, but in those of Brenda Marshall, a tenacious girl reporter. The villain? See the picture and find out.—W. B.

NINE LIVES ARE NOT ENOUGH

Ronald Reagan, flip-tongued reporter, muffs a chance to solve the case of Edward Abbott, missing millionaire, when Howard da Silva, his city editor, demotes him to a patrol car shift for pulling a half-cocked scoop on a local public enemy. But he stumbles into the case anyway with the help of Police Sergeant Jimmy Gleason, finds Abbott's dead body, and teams up with the latter's daughter, Joan Perry, to prove it was murder, not suicide. He does, of course, but not before there's plenty of shooting, police car chasing, and a couple of juicy plot twists. But Ronald winds up with Joan as wife, and the job of city editor in his own pocket.—W. B.

Joan Davis, press agent for a night club, had her hands full. Marquita Madero and Carmen Morales, the South American dancing team she had ordered, vanished right after their plane arrival. Afraid to face Don Beddoe, her boss, she coaxes Jinx Falkenburg and Joan Woodbury, two models, to impersonate the dancers. A complication arises when Fortunio Bonanova arrives, announces himself as their brother and accompanist. The girls are a hit, but the two real dancers arrive on the next night, stage a hair-pulling match until immigration authorities show up to arrest them for illegal entry. When Joan Davis confesses all to Don, they discover that Fortunio had plotted to keep the real dancers from keeping their American engagement. Since Joan and Jinx are already a hit, she further admits all to the night club patrons, and all ends happily.—Col.

YOU'LL NEVER GET RICH

Bob Benchley, New York stage producer, incautiously gifts Rita Hayworth, one of his chorines, with a diamond bracelet. To escape the wrath of his wife, Frieda Inescourt, he cooks up a romance between Rita and Fred Astaire, his brilliant dance director. Being announced as engaged in the newspapers is too much for Fred and Rita, however. She leaves the show. He fakes his weight to get into the army, finds that John Hubbard, Rita's childhood sweetheart is his captain. When Rita comes to visit John, Fred begins to fall for her. Swiping a captain's uniform, he goes A.W.O.L., calls on her, finds John and several other real captains there. John, amused, protects him from exposure. Meanwhile Bob Benchley, desperate without Fred, decides to bring his show to camp for Fred to direct. Wily Fred, now madly in love with Sheila, devises a wedding scene for the show, brings in a real justice of the peace. As a climax, they're really married, just before Fred's dragged off to the guardhouse.—Col.

THE BLONDE FROM SINGAPORE

Leif Erikson's adventures with blonde and beautiful Florence Rice, shady pearl divers, a Sultana and her unpleasant son, begin when he's dismissed from the RAF in Singapore for stunting too often. Leif's difficulties crop up in trying to keep and sell a haul of pearls he's gathered honestly. Chief obstacles are Florence, the Sultana, and the British High Commissioner. Though a kidnapping snarl requires a good deal of exciting footage to straighten out, Leif finally gets his jewels, sells them, and wins back his RAF commission.—Col.

NEW YORK TOWN

Here's a movie that shows you a cross-section of the Big Town and fleeting glimpses into the lives of about a dozen people. There's an unhappy young married couple, a violinist, a mother and father and their recently-acquired quadruplets. Most important characters are Fred MacMurray—a wise-cracking sidewalk photographer who hails from Indiana—and Mary Martin—a dead-broke heartbreaker from Vermont. They meet when Fred snaps Mary's picture and gets her to fill in her name on one of his cards. He discovers her plight and offers to let her live at the apartment he shares with Akim Tamiroff, impoverished European painter. When she ascertains that the proposition is strictly on the up and up, she accepts, and earns her board by selling portraits that Akim paints from Fred's photos. In this way, Fred tells Mary, she'll meet some rich guy whom she can hook. She does meet the r. g., but meanwhile she falls in love with Fred and vice versa. After innumerable misunderstandings, they finally get together.—Par.

FATHER TAKES A WIFE

Adolphe Menjou, light-hearted multi-millionaire ship magnate, chided by stuffy Son John Howard for neglecting business, kicks over the traces completely and marries Gloria Swanson, first lady of the theater. John's wife also disapproves, but the honeymooners go off blissfully on one of Adolphe's boats, pick up Desi Arnaz, famous singer, sole survivor of a shipwreck. At home, Gloria irritates Adolphe by boosting the young musician. They quarrel and separate. To patch things up, John carries off Desi to his home, but here the same thing happens. When things look blackest Aunt Julie (Helen Broderick) packs Desi off on a year's tour, with Adolphe and John footing the bill. Their gloom really explodes at the news that they're both expectant fathers.—RKO.

MOONLIGHT IN HAWAII

A flop on the radio, Johnny Downs and his quartet, the Merry Macs, escort wealthy Marjorie Gateson and her three nieces, Mary Lou Cook, Elaine Morey, and Sunnie O'Dea to Hawaii. At a Honolulu hotel, Johnny tangles with Jane Frazee, a guest, then he and his boys win a chance on the air from the hotel's wacky ork leader, Mischa Auer. Jane and Johnny make up, plot to get Leon Errol, her rich pineapplecanning father as radio sponsor. Latter is feuding with Richard Carle, who grows the pineapples. Both, to raise money, court Marjorie Gateson. Though she finally marries Mischa instead, all three become amicable radio sponsors for Johnny and the boys. —Univ.

GREAT GUNS

Gardener and butler in the home of rich young Dick Nelson, Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy join the army to protect him when he's drafted. Sadly enough, Daniel falls for Sheila Ryan, who runs a Post photo shop and is sweetie of a tough sergeant. Believing Daniel's heart to be weak, his two protectors do everything they can to break up the romance —with the sergeant's cheerful cooperation—but Daniel wins through to a corporal's chevrons and a firm half-nelson on Sheila's heart.—TCF.

THE FEMININE TOUCH

College professor Don Ameche swears up and down that he's immune to jealousy, proves it by remaining amused when a star tackle falls in love with his wife, Roz Russell. To further his point, he writes a learned treatise, "Jealousy in All Its Aspects and Universal Applications." In marketing the book he becomes on more intimate terms with the green-eyed monster, learns there's much he's left unexplored on the subject, feels actual pangs more than once. Rumpus-raisers are publisher Van Heflin who falls for Roz, and Kay Francis, who pursues Don. Even though Don's impregnable cocksureness is pierced, everybody's blissful in the end.—M-G-M.

MARRIED BACHELOR

Robert Young's lack of responsibility almost breaks up his idyllic marriage to Ruth Hussey. After a period of prolonged idleness, he turns bookie, gets into debt and is forced to pose as the bachelor-author of a book he never wrote. The publisher, Lee Bowman, becomes infatuated with Ruth, who's in on Bob's hoax and takes it as a big joke. That is, until he begins to take his fake personality too seriously, when she threatens to leave him. At that point he has to do some pretty fast stepping to win her back via a nation-wide broadcast confession. —M-G-M.

WHY I SAID YES TO BILL HOLDEN

The anger went out of her. She saw Bill in that role in real life, white-coated and earnest in a gleaming jar-filled laboratory. She knew then just where Bill had made his final compromise. She looked at him and opened her lips to speak. She found to her surprise words wouldn't come. His face was a blur.

That should have told her, but it didn't. Young stars in Hollywood have so much to think of besides love. The studios would just as soon they wouldn't think too much about it. Besides, there was the divorce decree to be had. That meant for a year she could not marry. But time meant nothing then. She had no thought of marriage. Oh, there were days of course. . . . For instance that day she went with Bill aboard the boat of a friend of his.

The blue Pacific glittered in the bright sun that day. Brenda sat on top of the cabin, Bill on deck, hands clasped behind his head lazily looking up at her. Her hair was very long then, rippling to her waist, and the breeze played through it. As Bill looked at her his eyes narrowed a little against the sun and against something else he must have felt within.

"YOU know you have beautiful hair," he said. There was such reverence in his voice, laughter shook her; but it stopped before it reached her lips. Was it the sun, the salt air . . . the wind . . . or what? She felt suddenly very happy.

Bill grinned. "I'm in love with your hair," he said.

She looked down at him. She cocked her head on one side and studied him. The expression on her face suggested she was thinking, what is this?

It took near-tragedy to show Bill Holden what he really felt about her.

Bill loved horses. He begged her to ride with him, and she went. At first she was scared to death.

Then, during the month that followed, she and Bill rode every chance they got. They rode out from the stables into the brush-covered hills that separate the Valley from Hollywood proper. They rode Western. No fancy clothes or bridle paths for them.

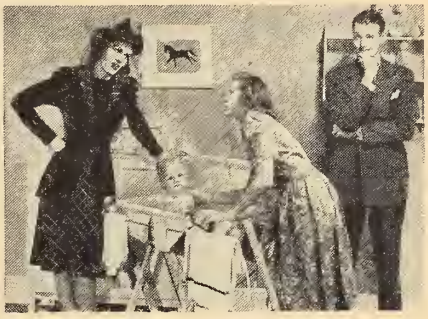
Bill was enthusiastic about the way the Pony Express riders swung themselves into the saddle while the horse was moving, and he was practising it one day. Brenda, watching him, thought she might try it, too. She put her foot in the stirrup, gripped the reins and saddle horn with her right hand. The horse started. Brenda tried to pull herself up into the saddle with the horse in motion. She felt her body suddenly a tremendous weight. She heard Bill shout to her, but the clatter and thud of hoofs as he galloped up drowned out his words. She tried once more, but couldn't make it. Her hand slipped, she fell on her back and lay still. Her eyes flew wide open and beyond that vague, stunned feeling of going out, she saw Bill approaching.

That was the last she knew, except for one brief moment when her eyes fluttered open, and she saw Bill's white face, heard him say huskily, "Don't move, Ardis. For God's sake, don't move."

He didn't have to warn her. She was already slipping back into unconsciousness.

Bill summoned help, and they got her to the hospital.

It was no less than a miracle that she



"I won't have your sister interfering with our baby!"

1. My sister-in-law lives near by. And I often wish she didn't. She's really swell and we're proud of her because she's such a successful career woman. But gosh, why do women who have no children always think they're child authorities?

2. Last week, I'd just told Bill off about her interfering, when in she walked. I was bathing the baby. She looked at the things I keep in the bathinette pockets and said (for about the twentieth time this month!), "Lucy Bender—how you spoil this baby!"

3. "Look at all this stuff!" she went on. "Special diapers, special rubbing oil, special powder, and even—" "Yes," I interrupted, "even a special laxative! Especially a special laxative! You bet my baby gets special care. I do exactly what the doctor tells me to do for her."

4. "The doctor says you can't treat a baby's delicate system like an adult's. And you've got to be particularly careful of what goes into her little stomach. That's why she gets a laxative made especially for infants and children. The doctor recommended Fletcher's Castoria."

5. "There isn't a harsh drug in it. Fletcher's Castoria is mild but effective. And safe. It works mostly in the lower bowel, so it isn't likely to gripe a child's tiny system. Tastes good, too. I wouldn't be without it—and when you have a baby you'll feel the same way!"

6. Well, she watched the baby take a spoonful of Fletcher's Castoria and when she saw the way baby enjoyed it, she said, "You know—maybe you've got something there!" And s'help me, she's asked instead of told me about my baby ever since! I hope it lasts.

escaped serious injury, the doctors said.

While she lay in the hospital bed, she watched Bill come and go, listened to his voice over the telephone at her bedside, received flowers and gifts from him. He was a new Bill, wearing his heart in his eyes.

She had to face it then and admit it. Here was Bill, coming to her, waiting on her, doing things for her. He was no different from those who came up the hard way now; his sweetness, his sympathy and understanding. It takes living, not coddling, to make people feel like that. Perhaps she had misjudged him.

I'm afraid I'm falling in love with him, she thought. But there are two careers to be considered. No, she told herself, it can't be, it mustn't be.

Before she left the hospital Bill was ordered by his studio on location in Arizona.

Then came the test. After Bill had gone, the world to Brenda became a vacuum. It was as if the sun had gone out of it. She left the hospital glad to be free of physical handicap, grateful for her recovery but wondering what she would do about this new problem—this spiritual hazard.

She returned to work and began a series of pictures for her studio. Bill telephoned every night from Arizona bemoaning the fact

Keep 'Em Smiling

—with Plenty of Swell-Tasting
WRIGLEY'S SPEARMINT GUM

Men just naturally go for this grand, long-lasting, two-fisted flavor of Wrigley's Spearmint Gum. Here's real, he-man appeal all right and no fooling. The lively, full-bodied, spearmint flavor takes right hold, freshening up your taste and, just that quick, makes your whole mouth feel cool and comfortable—helps sweeten the breath, too.

And this isn't all—for there's that swell, firm, springy "give and take" to Wrigley's Spearmint Gum which gives a fellow such a lot of extra fun. And the chewing helps keep teeth bright and attractive—also aids digestion.

So be popular with "the boy friends"—keep 'em smiling with plenty of swell-tasting Wrigley's Spearmint Gum.

that he could not fly back to see her. His voice coming over the wire night after night made her wonder: Was this thing she was beginning to believe in true, or was it only something that healed over quickly and was already gone, like her body recovering from the fall. . . .

There was only one way to find out. If he couldn't come to her, she would go to him. So Brenda flew to Arizona.

But again work, the careers into which both of them put themselves so wholly, made the hours they spent together unfit for complete relaxation, for more complete understanding. Bill was working hard, he was tired. She had boarded the plane when she should have gone home and rested. The trip told her nothing.

WHEN Brenda returned to Hollywood, she was desperately tired. Her trip had caused gossip. Both she and Bill were asked on every side if they had set the date. Bill looked uncomfortable when anyone asked him. Brenda wearily denied there was anything to the rumor.

She knew a lot could happen before she was free. She knew nothing could persuade her to go to Mexico to be married to shave the time. She decided maybe it was just as well that they didn't talk about it or think too much about it.

When Bill came back from Arizona, he took her with him every Sunday to the rifle range in the Valley where he loved to shoot. He bought her three guns in rapid succession, a .22 rifle, a .20 gauge shotgun and a .22 pistol which he told her always to keep close by for her own personal protection.

They rode again. They took her daughter Ginger places with them. Bill adores her. Brenda, watching them romp together, saw how alike they are; Ginger's blue eyes, that extra-special appealing cleft in her chin.

Brenda's business agent found a ranch in the Valley which he felt would be a good investment as speculation. She asked Bill to take a look at it, and when Bill saw it, he liked it and said he would like to put some of his own money in it if she were willing. They became enthusiastic about this joint investment. Bill had his own small place in the Valley. Brenda had hers. Each one would have liked to have claimed the larger place as home, but upkeep made it a luxury neither one could afford. They had to be content to stand at a distance and look at it through a business agent's eyes.

Then Bill's studio sent him to Texas to make "I Wanted Wings."

When he came back from Texas, he called to see her. "Come out to the car," he said. "I've got something for you."

She went out thinking it was flowers, some special gift. On the way he caught up her hand and put something in it, pressing her fingers around it. A very small box containing a diamond ring!

She wore the ring on a ribbon about her neck. They told no one.

On June 17th her divorce was final, and just before midnight on July 12th they boarded a chartered plane for Las Vegas. The Brian Donlevys went with them.

But because it was Brenda's marriage, it still had its element of the unexpected. The pilot made a forced landing in a sand bank three quarters of a mile from the airport which had been torn up for repairs. Through sand knee-deep the wedding party plodded. Some one was trying to balance the box of orchids. Brian kept asking Bill if he was sure he had brought the ring. Brenda was smiling to herself. Bill plodded along at her side, step by step. She looked at him then, and she found her answer. Come easy, come hard, it made no difference to Bill. It was life. He could take it in his stride.

They had made arrangements ahead, and though they were hours late and Brenda's white linen suit was crushed and the orchids a bit the worse for the juggling, they got the license. The preacher had had faith enough in God and man to wait up, and there, he was dressed in black in the bridal suite at the El Rancho Vegas, the only place in town available at that hour.

AT THE last minute they asked the pilot of the plane that had brought them to give the bride away.

So they were married. The plodding through the sand, all the steps that had brought them through the months to where they stood then, became suddenly sweet, sacred and meaningful.

Next morning they had a champagne breakfast and flew over Boulder Dam. Now Brenda is in Hollywood making a picture, and Bill has gone on location to Carson City, Nevada. Before Bill left, Brenda had to go to Canada and couldn't see him off. But today, Brenda looks at you, her heart in her eyes, and says, "Our future? Oh, our dreams for the future are terrific! We want life at our own ranch—the one Bill and I invested our money in. We've decided to live there. Bill intends to acquire adjoining land and build stables, and we will have our own horses. Ginger adores it."

What is there to stop love like that?

One thing is certain, if it is possible in heaven or on earth, those two kids are the ones who will make it come true.

MOVIE SCOREBOARD

200 pictures rated this month

Turn to our valuable Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. The "general rating" is the average rating of our critic and newspaper critics all over the country. 4★ means very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. C denotes that the picture is recommended for children as well as adults. Asterisk shows that only Modern Screen rating is given on films not yet reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

if for only a second or two at a time. Relax them now and then by cupping your hands over each one to shut out all the light. After a hard day's work or before getting dressed for an extra-special date, wring out a square of cotton in ice cold skin freshener or a special eye lotion. Place one over each closed eye and relax for ten or fifteen minutes. Or use some of those handy little specially-prepared eye pads that come in jars ready for use. You'll feel rested and refreshed all over after using them. A rich emollient cream massaged with a rotary motion into all the delicate skin surrounding the eyes is another beauty trick which smoothes out wrinkles and relaxes tired nerves.

Of course, outdoor exercise, especially games which require your eyes to follow some small object like a golf, tennis or ping-pong ball is excellent for eyes.

Don't forget to eat for eye beauty also. Butter, cream, eggs, fresh vegetables and fruits are full of the essential Vitamin A.

Wear good, dark ground-lensed glasses when you must spend much time out in the glare of sun or snow or water. There are such good-looking dark glasses everywhere these days that they are as ornamental as they are beneficial.

EYES should be washed out night and morning with salt water, boric acid solution or one of the excellent specially-prepared eye washes. These relax, stimulate and strengthen as well as cleanse out dirt and accumulated secretions.

Remember that the smaller the area on which you fix your gaze, the easier a time your eyes will have. Don't try to see everything at once. Focus your eyes on one object at a time, then move and shift them often. Roll your eyes to right and left, then all around slowly every time you have a few spare moments by yourself. Look up as far as you can, then down. Open your eyes wide, then close them tightly. Alternate these little exercises and repeat them frequently.

And if you ever find yourself with a foreign body—a speck of dirt, cinder, etc. —in one of your eyes, here are a few helpful tips to follow. First, do not rub it in. Hold both eyes wide open as far as possible, without blinking, until the tears begin to flow. If this won't work, take the small corner of a clean, dry kerchief or tissue and try to dislodge the offending object. Hold the lid away from your eyeball by grasping the lashes gently but firmly. Don't wrap your kerchief around any hard object such as a pencil, match or toothpick. You're likely to damage your eye permanently by just such a trick. If all these resources fail, hie yourself to the nearest drug store or doctor for more expert ministrations.

There—we've outlined the basic care to strengthen and protect those orbs of yours. Now you can safely concentrate on make-up. Follow the tips in "Eyes Right" and in the chart following. You'll go out and slay the stag line.

No eyes are truly lovely unless they are clear, bright and healthy-looking, so whenever yours feel tired and strained or are inflamed, soothe them with Eye-Gene lotion. You need just a drop in each eye and they appear clear and refreshed in seconds. Use it as frequently as you like, although twice a day is the usual routine. Eye-Gene is stainless so you don't need to worry about soiling hankies or clothes.

What a Baby dreams about..

"Look here—you dream-angel!" Baby said.
"You know I ought to be home in bed.
Why, what if my parents could see me now!
Say—where are you taking me anyhow?"

"Oh dear, what's wrong with him? Can't we help?
It's awful to see an angel yelp!
By Jove! I see! It's a clear-cut case
Of wing-chafe. Look at this tender place!"

"Good thing my Johnson's was here at hand.
For chafes and prickles that powder's grand!
It's soft and silky, and what it's got Makes angels of babies who are not!"

P.S. If you've got a baby who's prickly or hot,
Try Johnson's! It doesn't cost a lot!

HALLOWE'EN PARTY BY MICKEY ROONEY

Courtesy of Dennison Manufacturing Co.

BY HELEN HOLMES

All Hallow's Eve, that night of strange supernatural happenings when you may catch a glimpse of a witch flitting past the moon on her broomstick or dimly see a ghost lurking in the shadows, is celebrated the world over by traditional rites and festivities. On such a night, with its extraordinary possibilities for games and stunts, you may be sure that Hollywood's most popular young people, Mickey Rooney, Judy Garland and Ann Rutherford, are planning a grand Hallowe'en party.

You can imagine Mickey's exuberance thinking up weird stunts for his guests and arranging the settings for the old time Hallowe'en games. In the rumpus room of his home he's planning to set up tubs of water for apple ducking and to hang apples from the ceiling by strings so that everyone can vie for the biggest bite.

Ann and Judy are helping Mickey's mother with the party. They are planning to set up a large table in the kitchen, cover it with a crêpe paper tablecloth and load it with all kinds of Hallowe'en party foods. Each person is to be provided with a tray and may select what he or she wishes and take it to small tables set up in the living room and dining room. Ann just adores making party favors herself, so she is decorating these tables with easy-to-make but clever little Hallowe'en figures and fun makers.

If you wish to make Ann's favors, mail the coupon which we are printing at the end of this article. And to help you further, at the top of the page there are little pen and ink drawings to show you just what they will look like.

And now for what still remains the best part of the party, even on Hallowe'en. Mickey wants doughnuts and fresh country cider, his mother thinks that sandwiches and coffee would be nice, and the girls want to try the Hallowe'en cake for which we are giving the recipe.

HALLOWE'EN CAKE

1¼ cups scalded milk
⅓ cup sugar
⅔ cup shortening

1 teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup sugar
3 eggs, unbeaten
1¼ teaspoons soda
2 cups sifted flour

Mix and sift cocoa with ⅓ cup sugar. Add scalded milk gradually and stir until smooth. Cool. Blend shortening, salt and vanilla. Add 1 cup sugar gradually and cream well. Add eggs, singly, beating well after each addition. Sift soda with flour 3 times. Add flour to creamed mixture, alternately with cocoa mixture, mixing after each addition until smooth. Bake in three 9-inch greased layer pans in moderate oven (350° F.) 25 minutes. To substitute chocolate for cocoa, use 4 ounces chocolate. Cream 1⅓ cups sugar with shortening, salt and vanilla. Beat in eggs, singly: add melted chocolate and blend. Add sifted dry ingredients, alternately with milk.

HALLOWE'EN FROSTING

4 tablespoons butter
¼ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon grated orange rind
4 cups sifted confectioners' sugar
5 tablespoons orange juice (about)
7 chocolate creams

Blend butter, salt and orange rind. Add ½ cup sugar gradually, creaming well. Add remaining sugar, alternately with orange juice, beating until smooth. Add just enough orange juice to make a nice spreading consistency. Tint with orange coloring. Spread frosting between layers and on top of cake, reserving a little for making candy faces. Arrange chocolate candies around rim and in center of cake, pressing gently into frosting. On each candy make eyes, nose and mouth, using a toothpick dipped in frosting.

LOG OF A SAILOR

Horgan of the Associated Press was especially interested. "You're wasting time, kid. I know Director Ned Griffith. Want me to write him a letter?" It developed into a running gag.

Horgan covered Hayden's first real command. He took a 96-foot brig from Gloucester to Tahiti and had the time of his life. The crew were all amateurs, all friends of his, all working for a dollar a month and the hell of it. The owner gave him a free hand to buy what he needed and put in where he had to. It was more like a cruise than work, and it gave Stirling the idea of running a schooner commercially between Honolulu and Tahiti. After two delectable months on the island, he returned to raise money for his project.

It was rough going, but eventually he found a man with money and a synthetic yen for the sea. They formed a corporation to be known as The Viking Cruisers and made a down payment on the "Aldebaran," a 163-foot beauty built for the Kaiser in 1902—"the third biggest two-master in existence," says Hayden, a nostalgic light in his eye. Picking her up at Panama on December 10, 1939—another milestone—they rode into a real Cape Hatteras buster the day before Christmas, took a stiff shellacking and limped into Charleston with an exenthusiast aboard. "He wasn't a real sailor," says Stirling with moderation. "He quit. I borrowed enough to pay off the crew and went to New York to raise more money."

HE HAD thirty-five dollars. A sailing friend named O'Toole had thirty. They pooled resources and paid four dollars weekly for a furnished room which was kept habitable by liberal sprinklings of roach powder. Nobody wanted to invest in a commercial schooner. But Tom Horgan still wanted to send Hayden's photograph to Ned Griffith.

Stirling agreed. "Maybe if they took me on for a while, I could get enough out of it to buy the schooner." Their immediate problem was getting enough to put into their stomachs. A windfall helped. Velvet Tobacco paid Hayden, the mariner, a hundred and fifty dollars for a testimonial. They lived on that for a long time. Of course they could always have gone to sea. But Stirling had nailed his heart to the dream of his own ship. Sailing other men's ships would bring it no closer.

Mr. Griffith was New York bound and would see Hayden on arrival. They met one Sunday afternoon. Paramount has Griffith to thank for Hayden. He was sold from the time he laid eyes on him. He talked the studio into making a test, picked the material for it and coached the novice. According to Stirling, he must have talked them into a contract, too. "Because only a blind man would have signed me on the strength of the test. It smelled to high heaven."

He did a love scene from "Café Society" and a fight scene from "Anna Christie." He shook as with ague and had to keep rocking his legs to hold himself upright. The minute he stopped, his knees started beating an obligato to his terror. Worse than any storm he'd ever faced, the ordeal lasted through the day, and not till he'd had a few on the house at nightfall was he able to drag himself home to O'Toole and the roaches.

A few weeks later the contract came along. Baffled and broke, Hayden borrowed two hundred dollars to get to California, which was three thousand miles closer to Tahiti anyway. He sent for his mother, a superlative housekeeper, and thereafter he ate well.

With Griffith's return, things started humming. He insisted on Hayden as his second male lead in "Virginia." First they told him he was crazy. Then they shrugged. "It's your own neck you're sticking out." So Stirling went with the rest of the cast to Virginia where most of the picture was shot. As luck arranged it, his first scene had him on horseback. Once signed for the part, he'd been treated to an intensive course in riding. But he still had his doubts as to what made a horse stop and go. Sweat poured down his back. "Sweat's not a good word, is it?" he inquired gravely. "But I don't know any other." His shirts flapped like white gulls under huge drying fans, for he had to change between every two takes. That scene marked the climax of his panic. Having mastered four legs before the cameras, he found it comparatively simple to continue on two.

What happened as a result of "Virginia" startled and gratified the studio. It startled Hayden and confounded him. Bound by a seven-year contract, he admits the impracticability of navigating a line to Tahiti on the side. He admits there's nothing he can do at the moment but ride with the current.

"How about a small boat?" somebody asked him.

"That," he replied, "would be like getting a trailer."

He's saving his money so he can buy the schooner if his career should droop—an unlikely contingency. Should it continue to flourish, he'll still buy the schooner and put her in shape for future use. By preference, Hayden shuts his mouth over his plans. You can extort a reluctant word or two, but the pattern is better divined by indirection.

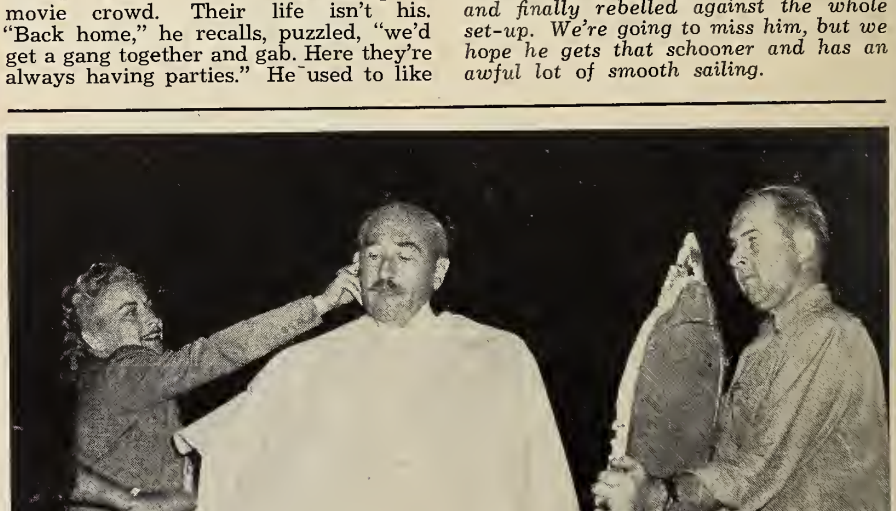
You discover, for instance, that he doesn't ride or golf or play tennis. He's not interested in music. He reads a lot, but only about the water. "The trouble with going to sea," he says, "is that you get pretty much one-track." His use of the word "trouble" is merely a convention.

He's made no close friends among the movie crowd. Their life isn't his. "Back home," he recalls, puzzled, "we'd get a gang together and gab. Here they're always having parties." He used to like dancing but not to the crazy music they play now. As for liquor, he drinks when there's an occasion but doesn't consider it the indispensable adjunct to a good time. He quit smoking because he couldn't smoke normally. It was either three packs a day or nothing.

HE landed in Hollywood with one suit and has since expanded his wardrobe to include another, for which he paid forty-five dollars, and a thirty-dollar coat. He was wearing a pair of duck pants the day I saw him, an open shirt with sleeves rolled all the way back to the armpits, no socks and a pair of weary tennis shoes. "This isn't costume," he informed me.

He and his mother still live in their first small house. Mrs. Hayden enjoys the climate, the few friends she's made keeping house for her son. Asked how she spent her time, he was for a moment taken aback. "I don't know. How do women spend their time? At the Farmers' Market from all I can gather. She cooks for me," he added, brightening.

When it came to the delicate question of women, Hayden stiffened. "The papers," he said with a certain grimness, "can probably tell you more than I can. They hook you up with anyone who suits their fancy." Then his natural good humor rose to the surface. "I don't mean to be a sorehead. I know girl stuff's important. If I read a story, that's probably what I'd want to read about. Well, there is a girl, but she's not in the business, and the papers don't know anything about her, and they're not going to. I'm sorry. I just can't get myself to talk about it—"



Which seemed fair enough, and we settled for that.

In his second picture, "Bahama Passage," he plays opposite Madeleine Carroll again. She's the star. He's featured. Or as he put it, "I take up the slack. What's a star, anyway?" he wanted to know. "What do you get out of being a star that you don't when you're not?"

"More money, for one thing—"

"Now you're talking," he chuckled. "More money, more schooner."

EDITOR'S NOTE: As we go to press, Stirling has given Hollywood the go-by. He hated the gay life, the lack of privacy and finally rebelled against the whole set-up. We're going to miss him, but we hope he gets that schooner and has an awful lot of smooth sailing.

MY DAUGHTER JUDY

director on a Metro picture, she sniffed at it. "Why bother?" said Sue. "I'm going to be married soon."

Mrs. Gilmore's theory is that every girl should be trained to earn her own living. "Some day you may have to take care of yourself and a child. Even of your husband, Sue, who knows? These things happen. If you were going to marry a millionaire, I'd still think you had no right to turn down a job." Having said her say, she waited for a day or two. Sue made no move. "Very well," said her mother, "then no allowance, Sue. Obviously, you don't need money very badly, if it's not worth making an effort for."

"Mother, you wouldn't be so mean!"

"From my point of view, it's not meanness, it's common sense."

Sue sighed, took the job, loved it and is now busy trying to find herself another.

Judy was fifteen when she started using lipstick. That was all right with Mrs. Gilmore, who considers make-up a matter of taste and judgment. She thinks that girls of fifteen or sixteen, whose lips are pale, look more attractive with lip rouge—providing they choose the right color and don't smear it on. Judy worried about it more than her mother in those days. At her own plea, she'd been transferred to the school attended by her best friend. The principal was anti-lipstick, so Judy would retire every so often to wipe hers off on her petticoat.

SHE still uses only lipstick—no rouge, no mascara, no eyebrow pencil. Mrs. Gilmore thanks fortune that she likes herself better natural and keeps her hands off. It's Judy who does the interfering. "I don't like the way mother does her mouth," she said to her studio make-up man one day. "Will you fix it for her, Bill?"

"Now wait a minute, Judy. On a person as old as I am—"

This is the point at which Judy always cuts her mother off. "Let Bill do it, mother," she said firmly. Bill did it under Judy's supervision, and Mrs. Gilmore had to hand it to them for a nice job.

"But Bill uses a brush, and I use my finger. I'll never be able to do it this way."

"Bill," said Judy, "is nice. Bill will make you a form. Then all you have to do is go round inside it."

Far from brushing off Judy's advice, Mrs. Gilmore seeks it, especially with regard to clothes. "I'm not terribly clothes-conscious, and I hate shopping. What I wear doesn't make a great deal of difference to me, but I'm Judy's mother, and I know it's important to her that I look nice. Anyway, I think the modern girl has more style sense than her mother. By and large, our tastes coincide, which does simplify things. We both like plain clothes on me—no bows, no ruffles. We agree that my most becoming dress is a certain black crêpe with accordion pleated sleeves. Where we chiefly disagree is on color. Judy keeps fussing at me to wear bright colors, which I don't care for because I'm too short. I daren't say too old, or she's on my neck. 'What's the matter with you, mother? You're not an old lady.' Just the same, I avoid the kind of thing that starts people wondering, 'What's she trying to do, look as young as Judy?'"

By the same token, she likes mother-daughter clothes on young mothers only

HOW A WIFE OVERCAME THE "ONE NEGLECT" THAT OFTEN WRECKS ROMANCE

1. I couldn't understand it when Paul's love began to cool. We'd been so gloriously happy at first. Then, he began treating me as if . . . as if there were a physical barrier between us.

2. Finally I went to our family doctor and explained the whole situation frankly. "Your marriage problem is quite a common one," he told me. "Psychiatrists say the cause is often the wife's neglect—or ignorance—of feminine hygiene. That's one fault a husband may find it hard to mention—or forgive."

3. "In cases like yours," the doctor went on, "I recommend Lysol for intimate personal care. Lysol solution does more than cleanse and deodorize. It kills millions of germs on instant contact, without harm to sensitive tissue. Lysol spreads easily into crevices, so virtually searches out germs."

4. You can bet I bought a bottle of Lysol right away. I find it gentle and soothing, easy to use. Economical, too. No wonder so many modern wives use Lysol for feminine hygiene. And . . . as for Paul and me . . . we're closer than ever before.

FOR FEMININE HYGIENE Lysol Disinfectant

Lysol is NON-CAUSTIC—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. EFFECTIVE—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). SPREADING—Lysol solutions spread and virtually search out germs in deep crevices. ECONOMICAL—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. CLEANLY ODOR—disappears after use. LASTING—Lysol keeps full strength indefinitely no matter how often it is uncorked.

Mary's no longer contrary

Of course Mary's garden was beautiful—all silver bells and cockle shells—and pretty maidens in a row. But she still was glum and contrary.

You see Mary liked to chew gum. But she never could find one that was just right.

One day her dentist suggested she try Dentyne. He told her Dentyne's pleasant firmness would be good for her teeth.

So Mary got a handy, flat, flavor-tite package of Dentyne — and promptly tried one of the six individually wrapped sticks. When she tasted that temptingly different, uniquely warm and delicious Dentyne flavor she stopped being contrary in exactly one-tenth of a second. "This is my chewing gum," cried Mary. "I'll never chew anything else."

And now Mary sings as she gardens.

Moral: You, too, will feel like singing when you taste Dentyne. Get a package today.

"When Jimmy, who's twenty-three, rigs up herself and the baby in twin dresses, they both look adorable. On Judy and me, it would be absurd."

At sixteen, Judy pined to be twenty-five and wear slinky dresses. What she wore was the schoolgirl's uniform—pleated skirts and bright sweaters bought by her mother. Occasionally, to satisfy what she looked on as a normal yearning, Mrs. Gilmore would pick up a slightly more sophisticated number and give Judy the thrill of wearing it where no one would see her. "By no one," she laughed, "I mean close friends. That way, Judy would get it out of her system and no harm done.

"When she was eighteen, I decided she ought to start shopping for herself. She went overboard a little at first, let the salespeople talk her into buying exactly what she wanted—which was generally something about ten years too old for her. Well, we kidded her out of that. I must say she's a reasonable child and never did more than sigh when the stuff went back. As a matter of fact, the loveliest dress she ever owned was one she found herself before she was eighteen."

Judy had been invited to join the Hollywood immortals whose hand-and foot-prints adorn the forecourt of Grauman's Chinese. Her mother, leaving for a week-end, had told her to look around for a new dress. Up to then her top figure had been thirty-five or forty dollars. On Sunday Judy phoned. "Mother, did I find the most beautiful dress! All white net and silver, and a huge silver bow in the back. Only one thing. It's pretty expensive—"

"Just what do you call pretty expensive?"

"Well, it's over seventy-five—"

"How much over?"

"It's a hundred and twenty-five."

Since this was an occasion, and since Mrs. Gilmore fell equally hard for the dress, she bought it. And thought ruefully a few nights later of the designer's warning. "This is a dress to stand up in, Judy. Don't sit in it."

AND there was my child, not sitting but kneeling on a dusty block of cement in a hundred and twenty-five dollars worth of silver and net."

Their sharpest cleavage came over a dinner frock that Judy ordered for a trip to New York last spring. "It can't be," her mother moaned as Judy held it up—long, black and severe, with long tight sleeves and a slinky bustle.

"Why, mother, it's beautiful—"

"For Theda Bara in the old days, maybe. Not for you. You can't wear it, Judy. And from now on, you take Sue or me shopping with you."

Speechless with woe, Judy packed and left the dress out. Mrs. Gilmore's heart failed her. "Well, you might as well put the thing in. Maybe it'll look different on. The point being," she added, "that it did. She looked stunning in it—a little older than she should, but stunning just the same. After which I decided to mind my own business."

Judy's no longer in a hurry to grow older. Since her marriage, in fact, she's had a complete change of heart. Distressed over the separation of two young friends, she asked her mother why she thought it had happened.

"Partly it may have been having the baby too soon. They weren't ready for it. A baby does separate young people in the superficial sense, Judy. They can't do the same things together, and that's maybe how it started. There's nothing more wonderful than having a child, but I hope you and Dave will wait a few years. By that time you'll be sure you belong together, and until you're sure, it's not fair to the baby."

Earnestly Judy agreed. "Anyway," she mused, "I want to be the baby myself for a while."

In Hollywood, the term "movie mother" carries certain implications, all disagreeable. Mrs. Gilmore is the mother of a movie star, not a movie mother. She figures that expert directors and wardrobe women know their business better than she does and leaves Judy, the movie star, to them. Her concern is with Judy, her daughter. She brings her lunch to the dressing room so that, instead of waiting in the crowded commissary, Judy can lie down and rest for half an hour. She takes care of her clothes. Judy has no personal maid. The kind of snobbery which puts on a front for the world is absent from the make-up of both mother and daughter. Carrying a dress from the wardrobe department to the set, Mrs. Gilmore bumped into one of the hairdressers. "That's bad," said the girl.

YES, isn't it awful how hard I work?"

"I'm not kidding, Mrs. Gilmore. It doesn't look good for you to be doing that. Judy should have her own maid—"

"Now wait a minute—" (Mrs. Gilmore's phrase when she finds herself in opposition) "I've been carrying Judy's dresses since she was a baby, and I hope to do it a great many years more."

By temperament and training, Judy shares her mother's level-headedness. One problem Mrs. Gilmore has not been obliged to face is any tendency on her daughter's part to go Hollywood. Far from being cocky, Judy harbors a healthy inferiority complex. "Not good, but loud" is her commentary on her own singing. As for acting—"If there are two people I wouldn't give two cents to see, they're (a glamour girl whom we'll keep nameless) and Judy Garland. I get so tired," she wails, "of watching myself going bright and sparkly all over the place." This is no act put on to extract praise. So humble is Judy about her talents that, despite her success, she refused until recently to sing for Dave. "He knows so much more about music than I do."

On the all-important subject of dating, Mrs. Gilmore's views are definite without being dogmatic. "I never forced the chaperone business. Either you trust your daughter or you don't. If you do, watching is an insult. If you don't, watching does no good. When Judy was fourteen or fifteen and traveled with her gang, I'd go along on beach picnics as a matter of course, if only to take care of the food. At home I tried not to intrude on them. I'd come in, say hello and make myself scarce unless I was specially invited to join them or they joined me—as they frequently did.

"Judy's always been thoughtful of me. When she began dating, I always knew where she was going and how late she'd be. It wasn't a question of keeping tabs on her but, after all, accidents do happen, and mothers are a notoriously nervous tribe. If she and her friends decided to eat after the theater, she'd phone me. In fact, they sometimes overdid it. I'll never forget one night when she went to a show with Jackie Cooper. As a rule, I go to bed late, but I hadn't been feeling well that day and was sound asleep by eleven. The phone woke me. 'Hello, mom. This is Jack. Judy and I just got out of the show, and we're going to a drive-in. We'll be home very soon.' I drifted back to sleep. The phone woke me again. 'Hello, mom. This is Jack. The drive-in was crowded, and they just took our order, we'll be home in half an hour.' Well, you can guess the rest. When that dratted phone rang for the third time, I knew what was coming. 'Hello, mom. This is Jack. We met some kids, but don't worry, we're leaving right now.' I wanted to tell him my splitting head was all that worried me at the moment, and maybe he'd better call the whole thing off. Naturally I didn't have the heart to say anything of the kind."

Judy doesn't drink. Give her enough orange juice and milk, and you can keep the rest. To Mrs. Gilmore, the principle involved in drinking is one of good taste. "As the girls reached eighteen, I allowed them a glass of sherry or a mild cocktail with guests, if they wanted it. Judy didn't. As for anything more than that, well—we've all seen people who drink too much. We'd talked about it at home, and we're all agreed that, while men are bad enough, there are few more disgusting sights in the world than a woman who's had too much to drink. It's just a bad habit that none of us wants to be associated with—like not cleaning your fingernails.

"I'm inclined to be old-fashioned about certain things. I think this business of being modern can be carried too far. Even after she was engaged to him, Judy wasn't allowed to go to Dave's house alone. One day she asked me to drive her over there to dinner—"

ON THE way over, Mrs. Gilmore said: "I won't make an issue of it this once, Jude. But you've got to explain to Dave that it mustn't happen again—"

Judy was hurt to the point of tears. "It sounds as if you didn't trust me, mother."

"You know I do. But one has to live according to certain conventions. Engaged or not, nice girls don't go to men's houses. It wasn't done when I was your age, and it's still not done as far as I'm concerned."

It was Dave's mother who greeted a red-eyed Judy in the living room. "Why didn't you tell me your mother was going to be here?" she reproached Dave. "Then mom wouldn't have scolded me for nothing."

He proved singularly unsympathetic. "She was perfectly right to scold you, and you should have known there'd be somebody here. Now go and phone her."

From the first Mrs. Gilmore liked Dave. "I'd always hoped Judy would choose an older man. She's more mature than her years, and I had the feeling she might not hit it off with a boy of her own age. As for Dave—from the day he came to me and said: 'You can be sure of one thing. If you ever feel that I'm hurting Judy or her career, I'll go away and get lost'—from that day I hoped he and Judy would marry.

"They'd planned it for September, you know, hoping they'd both have time off for a honeymoon then. When they found they wouldn't, there seemed no reason for waiting. I'd just arrived home from a week-end in Las Vegas when they told me they wanted to be married that night. So Mr. Gilmore and I flew back with them, saw them married and returned as happy as we'd left them.

"You'll understand how I feel about Dave when I tell you that if anything happens to this marriage, I believe it will be Judy's fault. He's so kind and gentle, he worships her so, and what's more, he understands her. She's younger and impulsive—too young to have the same kind of understanding. But I hope—I believe—he has enough for both."

She looked away for a moment. "What it amounts to is this. Her happiness comes first with him as it does with me. And what mother," she smiled, "could ask more of the man her girl marries?"

MY ONE-DAY MARRIAGE

someday. I was told that they had, as a matter-of-fact, given her the lead in a picture they were producing at that time, "Jamaica Inn."

I met Maureen. I talked to her a few minutes, the usual banalities. I wished her luck in her new enterprise, and I said, half joking, "Well, I'll see you in Hollywood some day, I suppose."

SHE shook my hand heartily. As though she really meant it. She nodded her head soberly. And she said, "Yes, of course, I'll see you in Hollywood very soon."

And I looked into her eyes. And that was the first time I took her seriously. Because I knew she meant it.

Less than a year later I met her for the second time, and it was indeed in Hollywood. And there was no longer any doubt in anyone's mind about her right to the privilege of playing leading roles. And she was a married woman—although none of us knew about this. It was a secret.

Why had she married? Whom had she married? I think I was the first Hollywood newspaper man to know—but I couldn't talk about it. Maureen has a cute way of handcuffing newspapermen. She simply looks at them quite candidly, quite as though she trusts them all implicitly—and tells them the truth.

"I wouldn't like to see this printed," she says, "but here are the facts."

And, of course, you're licked. You can't break faith with a girl like that.

The way I found out about her romance was rather amusing. It was on the RKO lot in Hollywood. Maureen had made the big jump. Her first movie was already in the theatres around the world, and she had been rushed to Hollywood to make another. Again, a very important assignment—"The Hunchback of Notre Dame." Imagine being handed the leading female role in a big picture like that with only one other film under your belt! Well, she was working away at it, and Director Dieterle called "Cut," and it was lunch time. Maureen and I went to the commissary to chat over lunch.

That's when she told me the story. It began by my teasing her. In the usual Hollywood manner, the publicity boys had gone to work on her. To help build her up, they sent out one item after another. Maureen O'Hara was seen at the Trocadero with Tom. She was seen at the race track with Dick. She was dancing at the Cocoanut Grove with Harry. She was tied up (in publicity notices) with practically every eligible young man in town.

And I happened to know that she was a simple little eighteen-year-old who did not smoke, drink or go to night clubs. Those places didn't appeal to her (they still don't, by the way), and she had never learned any of the attributes of sophistication.

So I teased her. I said, "Which of your many suitors are you going to marry?"

And she turned those startled hazel eyes on me and said, quite sincerely, "I can't marry anybody. I'm already married."

She made me promise to keep her secret—I fought against it a little but gave in—and then she told me about George Brown. He was a young man she had met at the studio in London. She could not remember exactly what he did. A technician of some sort, she thought. He was a nice lad, she said. Sweet. The dearest dark brown hair, and a sort of wistfulness about him. Well, she didn't know very much about him, as a matter of actual fact. She had seen him around the studio. And they had talked a bit. And they had gone to a cinema a few times.

Nothing important. Nothing serious. It was boy and girl stuff. Only she was not quite eighteen. And all sorts of strange and amazing things were happening to her. Barely a couple of years back she had been a little girl in Ireland, playing games, dreaming dreams. And now she was in London reading incredible things about herself, a movie star.

Then came the day when she was told she was going to America. It was the big moment. The big chance. The miracle. But it happened, suddenly, amazingly. The contract came, and the details were arranged, and she was told to pack and catch a boat—all within the space of a very few weeks, a very few days, actually.

And the boy who had never even kissed her asked her to marry him.

And she, because it was romantic and dramatic, said yes. And yielded her lips to him for the first time.

Telling me about it, her eyes welled with tears and she pushed away her fresh salad greens.

"I don't know why I did it," she said. "It just seemed so right, sort of. I mean to say—well, I was going off to America, a new country, a new world, and he would be left behind there in London. If we were married he could grieve for me, and I could grieve for him, and we could write letters to each other, and—well, that's about all there is to tell. We got married."

THEY got married. George Brown, twenty-two, a technical assistant at Gaumont-British, and Maureen O'Hara, seventeen, a star-to-be. They got married, and they kissed (that was the second time she kissed him), and she ran off to pack her trunk while he waited secretly nearby because it was important to them and their romantic dreams to keep this all very secret. And she got into a taxi to the station to board the boat train.

He didn't even go to Southampton with her. But at the station she impetuously pushed her friends and well-wishers aside and rushed over to him and kissed him once more. The third and last time their lips ever met. And her friends and relatives wondered for a moment who the strange young man might be but didn't get a chance to inquire, because then it was time for Maureen to say good-bye and make a mad dash for the train.

So that's the story. As simple as all that. A little girl trick. An impetuous, crazy gesture. A mad half hour.

I listened to her that day at RKO while she dawdled over her salad, not eating it, ("Why don't you eat your lunch, Maureen?" "Oh, I can't; I hate this stuff." "Well, why don't you get something else?" "I'm not supposed to; I'm on a diet; I've got to watch my weight.") and wondered. Could this possibly be true? Could there be anything as simple and direct in this world gone mad? I looked at her eyes, and I knew she was telling the truth. That's all there was to it.

"Why don't you get a divorce—or an annulment?" I asked her. "You never lived with this fellow; you were never, in fact, his wife, were you, Maureen?"

"No, I was never his wife, actually," she said with that same disquieting honesty. "But we were married. I should keep my vows, shouldn't I?"

"Would you?" I asked, "if you were in London now—if you were seeing him regularly?"

She thought this over silently for a moment.

"You know," she finally said in a hushed voice, picking the words slowly, as though they were as much a revelation to her as to me, "if I were still in London, I don't think I would ever have married him in the first place."

At about this time a bunch of other people came over to the table, other people from the company. There were introductions—general chatter; the mood was gone—the confidences over. I thought about it a number of times. Once I wanted to write a thesis on the subject of 'Absence Makes the Heart Grow Fonder,' using her experience as an indication that this is not necessarily true. Once I wanted to write a piece—well, there were any number of times, and it was never possible because of the thought of her looking at me hurt. I couldn't betray her confidence.

There is just one more thing to point out right here. We are not especially close friends, Maureen and I. We barely know each other in the way that Hollywood people do. It was just that I happened to be there when she felt like talking. The point being that she is still, as she was at nineteen, as she was at eighteen, so thoroughly simple and direct that it never occurs to her to wonder about other people. Will they respect her confidences? Can they be trusted to hold her secrets? Of course they can. She assumes this. And thereby it almost always becomes a fact.

And so that is the background. When I read in the paper the other day that she was in Cal-Neva establishing residence with the idea of getting a divorce, I drove up there immediately to talk it over with her. I wanted to know a lot of things. Why had she finally gotten around to clearing her marital status? What were her plans? What did the future hold? And so forth and so on.

Again I found her thoroughly straightforward, honest. She had decided about a year ago to get her divorce. But it had taken all this time because she had experienced a great deal of difficulty in locating her husband.

"Naturally," she explained. "I had to write him—explain it all to him and get a letter from him saying that he agreed, before I took any action. It wouldn't be fair otherwise."

The reason he was hard to find was that he is a member of the Royal Air Force, "somewhere in Britain." It takes a very long time for letters to go back and forth across the world under those conditions. But finally she reached him, and he agreed, and she went to see her lawyers.

But why, Maureen? Why, now, have you finally decided it is time?

Well, in the first place, she does not think it is fair to him—she says this quite naïvely.

"After all, he may fall in love with someone else; he may want to marry; why should he be tied down to a wife he never sees?"

"And you, Maureen?" I asked. "Are you, perhaps, in love with someone else?"

She ignored the question.

"Another reason is that I happen to have the time just now. There will be seven weeks between my last picture and my next, and I may not get that much time again for a year or more."

"I understand you've been seeing a good deal of Will Price recently. Is he the one?"

"This is my first vacation in years." She sighed and stretched elaborately. And there was a bit of the mavourneen in her eyes as she smiled mischievously. "I've answered all the questions you intend to ask me," she said. "Haven't I?"

But later that evening she relented. She told me about Will Price. He is a young assistant director. She thinks he has a very great talent. He directed most of the tests for "Gone With the Wind." He has been a dialog director in a lot of pictures. Maureen met him on her very first picture in America, "The Hunchback of Notre Dame." He was dialog director on that.

"What's he like, Maureen?"

"Well, he is about twenty-eight, and he is tall, and he—well, he's nice."

The word "nice" can mean so much!

I tried again to get a direct answer. "Do you intend to marry him, Maureen?" I asked.

She was very careful in her reply.

"I was impetuous, impulsive, once. I shall not repeat. I think that love is a very wonderful thing, and I think marriage is not something to be played with lightly, casually. And besides—" (the impish look in her eyes again) "—a married woman can't talk about future marriage plans, can she?"

She laughed. A full, hearty, cheery laugh. Then she got earnest again, sincere. There was that "you must believe me" look in her eyes again.

"Ask me that question again," she said, "In a few weeks. When I am a respectable divorcée."

YEAH MAN FRIDAY . . .

overnight through the mediums of Benny's Jell-o program and the movies. Anxious to have a colored comedian play the part of a Pullman porter in one of his Jell-o skits, Benny sent his agents out one day to beat the bushes of Central Avenue, and among the possibilities they rounded up was spindled-legged knock-kneed, garrulous Eddie Anderson. Eddie emerged victorious in the auditions, something he attributes to the fact that he always carries a full supply of goofer dust somewhere on his person; and Benny, because it struck him as being very funny, hung the monicker "Rochester" on him. "Whenever I think of the name Rochester and look at the guy who owns it, I have to laugh," Benny says.

ROCHESTER impressed his boss so much in his first appearance on the Jell-o program that he recalled him three or four times, finally taking him on regularly four years ago. A confirmed believer in the mundane and spiritual powers of goofer dust, Rochester, with an occult look in his eyes, said that he used up so much of his dust on Benny before he landed a permanent eating position with him that he had to send all the way down to Louisiana for a fresh supply. "Boy, it almost took all of the dust in Louisiana to convince Mr. Benny that I'm the greatest comedian in the world and that he'll always need me," Rochester says apologetically.

When Rochester was taken by his parents to San Francisco from his native Oakland, California, he was a talkative, carefree, half-fed, half-clothed, smart-alecky 10-year-old kid. Far from being fond of school, he jumped at the chance to quit it in his first year in high school to take a job as an errand boy to help support his family. Because he is a born clown, he was forever in hot water. Stage-struck since he was a shaver, he spent all of his spare time from running errands, hanging around stage doors and on street corners tapping, singing in his peculiar pipsqueaking voice and "cutting the fool" generally. His brother Connie and his pal "Stuff" Crouch, who is now his valet-secretary-receptacle-of-all-of-Rochester's-woes, invariably accompanied him on his clowning expeditions, often to the disgust of the good colored church people of the Golden Gate City, who enthusiastically predicted that all of them would wind up in hell. Folk who knew Rochester in Oakland and San Francisco say that he has always been a clown and that there's no hope for him now.

In 1923 he got his first break on the stage as a chorus boy in a colored vaudeville show in his home town, and he was a total flop. Because nobody paid any attention to him and his tomfoolery, he simply couldn't dance; and even today he becomes terribly depressed if he can't get his friends to listen to his endless flow of comical jive, feeling on such occasions that he hasn't a single pal.

More determined than ever to make good on the stage after his initial flop, Rochester and his brother formed the ambitious, if not too good, dance team of "Connie and Eddie." After many foodless days and other personal privations, performing before 10-cent crowds in whistle stops on the Coast and in the Midwest, the team finally worked its way up to the Pantages and Keith circuits. Their success was short lived, unfortunately, for not long after they had become accustomed to feeling the comfort of a dollar bill in their pockets, the bottom fell out of vaudeville and the seats out of their pants. Except for an occasional bit part in the movies and a week now and then in a greasy spoon cabaret, Rochester was hopelessly caught behind the thespianic eight ball until Benny rescued him and made him his shadow. "During those dark days pork chops were scarcer than hen's teeth and chickens roosted only in Heaven," he often reminisces.

In spite of the gold and glory he has acquired as Benny's man Friday and as a screen comedian, Rochester is the same guy he was when he used to walk down Central Avenue with a mile-wide smile on his map but not a biscuit in his stomach. Because he was born and bred in the North and most of his boyhood chums were white, he is unlike most Negro Dixie-born actors; he had to learn, for example, how to speak Southern Negro dialect which was about as foreign to him as to a white comedian born above the Mason-Dixon line. More adept at reading lines than the average actor, however, Rochester can now speak with as much of a Southern drawl as an inhabitant of any Mississippi town. Benny, who says that Rochester can pick up a cold script and read it as it should be read, contends that he is the best reader of lines he's ever known.

A man who loves to live on a 24-hour-a-day schedule, Rochester thoroughly enjoys the real life role of a successful radio-screen artist with an estimated income of $75,000 a year. Effecting the purposefully informal but gaudy attire of the traditional Hollywoodian, he owns some 30 pairs of odd pants-coat get-ups, plus a plethora of more conservative suits, which, like his Lincoln Zephyr, he reserves for special occasions. An imaginative as well as an ambitious fellow, his secret ambition is to become a big shot movie director some day; and now he often dresses like one, thinking of himself when so bedecked as an Alfred Hitchcock or a Rouben Mamoulian.

SINCE he stands only five feet six and one-half inches in his socks, but weighs a hefty 175 pounds, Rochester's tailor hides many of his anatomical sins by building him up at certain sections and down at others. Although his tailor's sartorial measures are somewhat successful in that they hide some of Rochester's most unseemly points from the human eye, he still reminds some people of something of a cross between an oversize fighting cock and a chocolate-brown teddy bear. His dimpled moonface is fortunately perennially wreathed in smiles, and when he is happy, which is most of the time, he is liable to break into a tap, flash, acrobatic or even a Russian dance out of the sheer joy of living.

Currently going in for aviation in a big way, he can hardly wait until he qualifies for a student's license this fall before he begins his new picture with Benny at the Paramount Studio. "Flying," he says, "is much easier than driving a car. I don't have to look out for the other guy, and I'm much closer to Heaven up there in the sky."

An ardent, but unlucky, race-horse bettor, Rochester still tries to beat the entire card whenever he finds time to go to a track. By employing his Louisiana dust for all it was worth one day last winter at Santa Anita, he succeeded in beating the first six races, running a two-dollar bill into $390. Unfortunately, however, his dust failed to function properly in the last race, for when he plunged his roll on a "good thing," it ran out of the money. Whenever one of his potential glue pots runs out of the money, a not unusual occurrence, Rochester shadow boxes at breakneck speed wherever he happens to be—on the set, in the studio, church or home. "I get my revenge for losing by socking the ozones," he says.

A man who will try anything once, Rochester recently bought himself a lightweight pugilist, who travels under the name of Billy Metcalfe, to go along with his 13 platers and other gadgets. Having sparred with his hopeful a few times, he is already boasting that Billy will surpass Henry Armstrong before somebody knocks his block off. Soon after he acquired Billy, he took him to a town not far from Los Angeles for his first fight, and Billy, wading into his opponent for all he was worth, kayoed him in the first round. Now Rochester can't get any more fights for his hopeful and says that he'll have to teach him to be a better actor or they'll both starve.

Listing among his friends the top Negro actors and actresses and some of the whites, Eddie (Rochester) Anderson is loved by thousands of members of both races: he has, Negroes aver, been a credit to his group as well as to his profession. Regardless of the company he is in, however, he is always the same clowning guy with a pipsqueaking voice and an insatiable curiosity. He asked Oscar Levant one day in Hollywood what he had to do to get on "one of those whiz programs." "You mean 'quiz' programs," Levant replied. "Whiz, quiz, what's the difference?" Rochester asked. "You quiz me the questions and ah whiz you the answers."

During the filming of "Buck Benny Rides Again," the troupe went on location to Arizona. Rochester, who always has ants in his pants, used to disappear for hours at a time, thereby making the director fighting mad. He tailed him one day to a dude ranch for colored people, where Rochester was learning roping and other cowboy stuff. An expert horseman, he refused to ride the broken-down critter provided for him for a parade in Chicago before the première of "Buck Benny Rides Again." Mounting the friskiest horse available, he nearly caused the Paramount studio executives to die of apoplexy. "My, my! Ah's been doing little things like that all mah life jes' for the exercise," Rochester boasted as he strutted around in his chaps and sombrero.

IN Mrs. Anderson, however, her clowning husband has his match. Whenever he comes around the house disrupting her domestic tranquillity, she shuts him up immediately; and on such occasions he comes in the front door, rushes out of the back and plunges into his swimming pool to cool off. "Me and the missus get along fine," he says, "but I have to do most of the getting."

Regardless of what Rochester says about his domestic accord, however, he and his wife are crazy about each other. Mrs. Anderson, who was a stenographer in a Los Angeles court before she married her "little oozie-boozie," had known him since both of them were youngsters. A woman who prefers to rear her son, manage her home and to make life as comfortable as she can for her busy-body husband, Mrs. Anderson is Rochester's number one guide and advisor. Wherever he is he always calls her up at night and tells her what he did that day.

During his pork chopless days, Rochester often dreamed of building a mansion for Mamie; and one of the happiest moments in his life was when he moved her into their new home, a show place of Los Angeles' colored section, last spring. While his home was being built, a Los Angeles columnist printed that it was going to be a replica of Jack Benny's. When he read it, Rochester hit the ceiling, complaining that he didn't want his people to think that he was going high hat. He explained that his house was just a small one, while Benny's was quite large. "Besides," he declared, "mah furniture couldn't possibly be like Jack's since I'm making all of mine."

Now only 35 years old, Rochester is looking forward to at least another decade in radio and screen. In his serious moments he often recalls the past when sledding was pretty tough. He is determined, however, to be prepared for a rainy day, and therefore, he saves some of his munificent earnings every month. He also gives part of his income away each year, from two-bit hand-outs to the down and outers on Central Avenue, to neat little sums to both white and colored charities. A person with a great deal of race pride, Rochester is always willing to do whatever he can for his own people; but whatever he does he makes certain to keep it off the record.

A regular guy, an excellent comedian, Rochester is a good example of what ability, determination and a sunny disposition can do. "And," he says, "won't Benny be burned up when I get my license as a first class aviator!"

THEY SNOOP TO CONQUER

of readers all over the country, too.

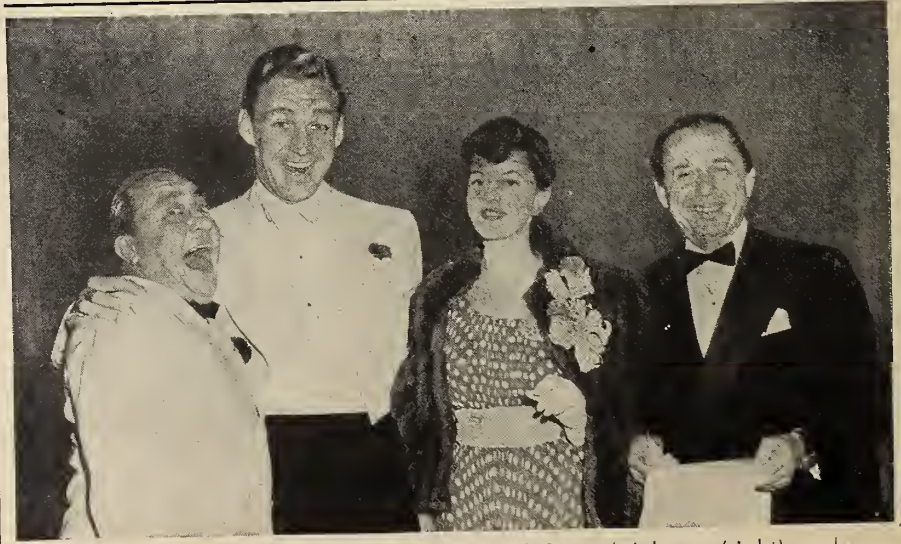
"My daily column," he said, "unlike any other, is a daily forum. I state the opinions of my readers more often than I do my own. About 50% of my column reflects reader sentiment. Ordinarily I receive 700 letters a week. When I'm on the air, I get from 3,000 to 5,000 letters a week. All voluntary letters. From these I form half my opinions—against double-features, against extravagance on the lots, against propaganda and war movies. Sometimes letters pour in boosting a Veronica Lake or a Lana Turner. Then, merely reflecting my mail, I boost them, too. Sometimes letters say Crosby is getting too fat or so-and-so is too stuck-up. I print this under my name, taking full responsibility myself, with the purpose of helping individuals concerned or the industry and not for the sake of pure sensationalism!

"Of course, in recent years I've softened. When I was younger, I wrote a rougher column. I remember once writing an open letter to Frances Drake, an imported English actress. She was having a dress fitting. An elderly woman fitting her accidentally stuck her with a pin. Miss Drake pushed the old woman over, bruising her, and in a childish rage, ripped two dresses. I bawled Miss Drake out in print. But I've mellowed. Today I don't think I'd even touch the story."

WE had an itch to ask Mr. Fidler if any of the more solid characters in filmdom had ever punched him in the nose.

"Not exactly," he said, "but almost. Some of the things I say have put me in physical danger. It's the price of truth. But while I've never actually been in a brawl, I've been on the verge."

However, sometimes when he is frank, Fidler pointed out the stars are appreciative. He cited Bing Crosby's case.



"Bing Crosby was making 'Mississippi,'" explained Fidler, "and the studio sent me a preview of his recordings. Crosby was a good friend of mine, and I enjoyed his work so I promptly placed the songs on a victrola. They were terrible. Bing's singing was sloppy. I felt positive if they came out in his picture they'd do him tremendous harm. So I sat down and wrote an open letter to Bing. I told him he was neglecting his fans, that they'd made him famous, and now he must continue giving them their money's worth. Of course Bing got angry. In his place I might have been angry, too. But fortunately, he got angry enough to record the songs over again. In a week I received a new batch of records. They were swell! And the picture, when it came out, was swell! And Bing, realizing I had only tried to do him a good turn, made up with me."

JIMMIE FIDLER also mentioned the case of Tony Martin. Fidler felt Martin was a good singer but that lately his delivery wasn't natural and that he was being too dramatic and overacting with his voice. So, in his daily column Fidler advised Tony Martin to be careful. Tony Martin took heed. It seemed someone had illy advised him to put more sex into his voice, and it had been spoiling his work. Now he listened to himself again and saw Fidler was correct.

"And to top it off," said Fidler, "last night I was in a nightspot, and Tony walked up and extended his hand. He wanted to thank me for bringing him back to his senses. And I knew one thing—that if a young man could take advice like that, he'd go far!"

Aside from his open letters, the Mississippi-bred columnist (who as recently as two years ago was making $3,500 a week) has acquired his greatest fame through news beats and scoops. His offices, in a private bungalow off Hollywood and Vine, are set up like a newspaper. The girl on the city desk is Ann Pareneau, who used to be with O. O. McIntyre. Also, Fidler hires four crack reporters to help dig gossip and pays nine studio contacts for inside tips. Today he is paying $890 a week to these human bloodhounds.

This thorough Fidler coverage has been responsible for scoop after scoop. Fidler was first with the item that Paulette Goddard was Mrs. Chaplin. He was first with the report of Dorothy Lamour's split with Herbie Kay. He beat all newspapers by two full days on Clark Gable's divorce from his second wife. He was ahead of everyone on the Joan Crawford-Franchot Tone rift but held it back until all New York papers had gone to press, then long-distanced his own Daily

Forrest Tucker, sandwiched between Olsen (left) and Johnson (right), makes up this quartette of smiles along with—no, not wifey, but Lorna Gray Mirror. It immediately became front-page news.

Fidler told us about several of his scoops.

"There was the time Al Jolson came in and informed me Ruby Keeler was leaving him. I locked Jolson in my office for five hours while I phoned all my key newspapers with the scoop. I didn't release him until I was sure my papers had the story first!

"I jumped all my colleagues on the Frances Langford-Jon Hall wedding. I suspected something was in the air, and every day phoned each of them for news. Then, one day I phoned Frances, and was told she was on a trip. I phoned Jon Hall, and was told he was also on a trip. Two and two meant marriage. I called all border police and got information the duo were seen driving through Needles. I finally got hold of them, told them I was printing the story. They denied it. But I knew I was right, and I told Jon, 'I'm announcing it on the air in ten minutes, and I'm giving you a chance to call Louella Parsons and tell her so she won't think you double-crossed her and gave me the story.' You see, Frances Langford worked on the Parsons radio show. Boy, that was some scoop!

"There was the Priscilla Lane affair. I had a hunch she was married, but couldn't prove it. One day, in the mail, I got a note scribbled in pencil. It told me to look at the latest divorce proceedings in San Bernardino. I sent one of my men down. Sure enough—there was the record of Priscilla Mullican—Miss Lane's real name, being divorced after a day or so of marriage. I had a clean scoop on her marriage and divorce!"

We learned a good deal about Jimmie Fidler, just by listening to him. He had been a silent actor in 1919. Later a press agent for Rudolph Valentino and Gloria Swanson. Today, at 41, he owns a huge home and swimming pool in the Valley, and owns also 11,000 shares of Warners stock and 4,000 shares or $35,000 worth of Twentieth Century-Fox stock. Today, he never visits studios, sits with his secretary for hours thinking up cute cracks for his column, is happy with a gorgeous wife, the former Bobbie Law.

Before leaving Jimmie Fidler, we listened to one last sincerity he had to offer:

"Certain people tried to call me pro-Nazi because I fought against propaganda pictures. A silly thing. I did that for Hollywood's own good, as Hollywood is now learning. I am not pro-Nazi. And I am not pro-British. I am fuliy, entirely and only pro-American. And on the day I can't be pro-American, on the day I can't speak my mind, can't speak what I consider truth, can't say what I wish to say, I will retire from the press and the radio!"

From fast-moving, sensational Jimmie Fidler, we turned to an entirely different flicker journalist in easy-going Sidney Skolsky, once known as "The Little Black Mouse of Broadway," whose very literate daily stint straddles America from the New York Post to the Hollywood Citizen-News.

Short, dark-haired, bespectacled Sidney Skolsky, addicted to scented handkerchiefs and nightly poker sessions with cameraman Jules Buck and fellow columnist Herb Stein, has devoted so much time to item-grubbing in his eight years in Hollywood that he hasn't had time to learn to drive a car!

Skolsky's chief claim to immortality—aside from the fact that he gives birth to the most readable column born of Hollywood trivia—is his almost psychic ability to create phrases and stunts that catch on. It was Skolsky who first used trade words like "preview" and "take" and injected them into everyday lingo. It was Skolsky who recently by repetition started the game of gin rummy across the nation and who, after viewing the buxom Miss Lana Turner in "They Won't Forget," decided they wouldn't and coined the label "Sweater Set" for those shapelies like Lana and Betty Grable who sidestepped sophisticated attire for the preppish almost skin-tight slipover sweaters.

He was also the first to name the annual Motion Picture Academy Award the "Oscar." Time Magazine even credited him with that coinage, which would place the matter beyond dispute.

"It happened the year Katharine Hepburn won the Award for 'Morning Glory' and Laughton won for 'King Henry VIII,'" Skolsky enlightened us. "Everyone kept writing and prattling about the gold statuette and the gleaming statuette and everyone invested the entire Award with too much dignity . . . So I decided to give the statuette a simpler name, and also one that would kid it good-naturedly. I thought of the most unlikely name, Oscar, and referred to it as such. The name caught on."

Realizing that Skolsky, unlike the run of columnists, rarely boasted about making sensational star discoveries, we were anxious to know his ideas on the ability of a columnist to help others.

"Of course," he admitted, "we can help people by plugging their names. But I try not to over-plug people. It makes your selections lose their value. When I have a good story and a really big opportunity to aid someone who needs it, I pitch. Do you recall the Open Letter I wrote to the Department of Immigration in Washington, D. C.? I asked them not to deport old Albert Basserman, an exile from Hitler. Some society picked my column up, reprinted it in pamphlet form and eventually it got to Washington, D. C. My column, among other things, contributed to keeping Basserman and his great talents among us. And, you know, I'd never met the fellow—but after that column, I received a wire and a letter from him.

AMERICA'S FINEST CIGARETTE

"Another case would be that of Gloria Swanson. A year or two ago I was plugging hard for her to return to the screen and for producers to give her a big break. Even my favorite astrologer, Blanca Holmes, thought she should and would return. And when Gloria did, I said she finally had to return and play herself because there was just no one to take her place!"

WE wondered if Skolsky had many friends among the movie colony. He said yes, some, but he didn't want to have too many.

"I try not to associate with movie stars too much socially," stated Skolsky. "It's bad for a columnist to know the subjects he writes about too well. In the end, it plays havoc with the column itself for two reasons—you can't be truthful in writing about your best friends; and also, you get to know them so well that you finally lose perspective.

"Sure, I have good friends among the girls like Alice Faye and Betty Grable. Take Betty. Not too long ago when she was utterly busted, when she was broke and discouraged, I, among others, took her aside and talked to her, and I spoke to big people like Buddy De Sylva about her. We've been real friends.

"My very best pal is Jim Cagney. One regular man. In the old days on Broadway when I was a press agent, before I got jobs handling the late Sam Harris and Earl Carroll, and Jim Cagney was an actor with an empty stomach, we used to trudge the streets together looking for work. We have years and hell in common."

The story of Sidney Skolsky's rise from a Park Avenue realty agent and Broadway press agent to one of the most popular columnists in the trade is really a saga that plays tag with fiction.

Before 1933 he was doing a snappy Broadway column for the New York Daily News. His co-workers were Ed Sullivan and John Chapman. At the time, Skolsky learned people were interested in Hollywood gossip, so he used to pick up reams of it second-hand at Lindy's over a cheese blintze and print it. At last, in 1933 when his annual vacation came up, he decided to visit that place he was always writing about but had never seen —Hollywood. He went for three weeks. But the day before Labor Day, Jean Harlow's husband, Paul Berne, killed himself. Skolsky was on the spot and on the story. The stories kept coming up and so did Skolsky. The three weeks stretched into one year. Then he returned to New York.

One afternoon J. M. Patterson, publisher of the Daily News, tapped Skolsky on the shoulder and said, "Get ready. You're going back to Hollywood for another year."

This time Skolsky stayed four years. Eventually a wire reached him. It seemed Ed Sullivan wanted a crack at Hollywood, and would Skolsky please return to his old Broadway stint.

Skolsky answered with this historic line:

"Sirs, Broadway columns are as passé as Broadway!"

He quit. Went over to Hearst. Lasted a very short time. One morning Louella Parsons, boss of the Hearst movie pages, came out with a front page scoop that Greta Garbo and Leopold Stokowski were getting married. And, a few pages back, Skolsky led off his column saying Garbo and Stokowski were not getting married.

"My Garbo contacts were infallible," Skolsky told us, "and I knew Louella was wrong. But she got very angry at me for my item contradicting her, and we didn't speak for a long time. Then one evening at Ciro's after a preview of 'Irene,' Louella Parsons asked me to dance with her. Now I couldn't dance a step, but it was a chance to bury the hatchet, so I grabbed Louella and we waltzed or did some version of the same. Everyone stopped dancing to watch us. It must have been a sight. I'm small. Louella towers over me. The next day the papers said, 'At Ciro's last night Parsons and Skolsky were the floor show!' But we've been pals ever since."

Meantime, Skolsky left Hearst for the New York Post, to which he has been hitched ever since.

Today Skolsky has his job down to a routine. He visits two studios a day, has dozens of friends among directors and writers and stars to collect hot tips and items for him. He writes his column at two in the morning when it is dark and quiet and he can't go anywhere. Sometimes he writes it in the emptied office of a major studio. He rarely gets kickbacks or time bombs from his column. Only one irate phone call in the last three months. He insists he is not interested in scoops but rather in presenting an accurate picture of pictures. He never gets excited about marriage stories, explaining, "What the devil, so if I miss a marriage, I'll wait with my column for the divorce!" He conducts his column like a vaudeville show, every day attempting to present a different and colorful act ranging from his "Gossipel Truth" on Mondays to his "Review of the Week" on Saturdays. His pet aversions are those visitors who come to Hollywood for a short time and then run home and yell that the town is as wild as it was in 1928.

TODAY, Skolsky has become a sort of animated Delphic Oracle of Hollywood. All visiting firemen like Kyle Crichton, Dick Watts, Alva Johnston, make a beeline for Skolsky before cornering customers for copy.

Before leaving him, we begged Skolsky to give us an oral lesson on "How To Conduct A Column." He obliged, to wit:

"I can only tell you how I run my column. I don't want to be a guide, a phony prophet or a Beatrice Fairfax. I just want to wander about Hollywood and put on paper what interests me with the hope that it will interest others. Then, too, I feel there should be more in a movie column than who's going with who. Movies are a fine and big thing, and the public should know more about them!

"In my column, too, I try to show the trend of the times. And when I find something definitely harming the movies, I take time off to don my verbal armor and crusade. You see, underneath it all, I have no gripes about Hollywood. I may sometimes pick on it, but please don't get me wrong—I love Hollywood.

"Yes, I love the movies, the people, the industry, and I love being a part of so giant and influential a parade. And so it hurts me, almost physically, to go into a movie house and see two clashing films on the same bill or hear stars' names maliciously gossiped about. Hollywood should and must mean more than that!"

After we left Sidney Skolsky, we mentioned that we had seen him to an

M-G-M gagman, Willkie Mahoney. And Mahoney said, "Listen, I'll tell you how to end your stint on Skolsky. You know, every so often he does a biography of a famous film star and calls it a Tintype. His last line always tells how the film star sleeps. He tells that Ginger Rogers sleeps in cotton nightgowns or Errol Flynn without drawers. I think you should end your Tintype of Sidney Skolsky by telling how he sleeps. Make it a gag. Just write—'Sidney Skolsky sleeps in the pocket of his pajamas!'"

And so, that is where we leave Skolsky and set out in search of Hedda Hopper!

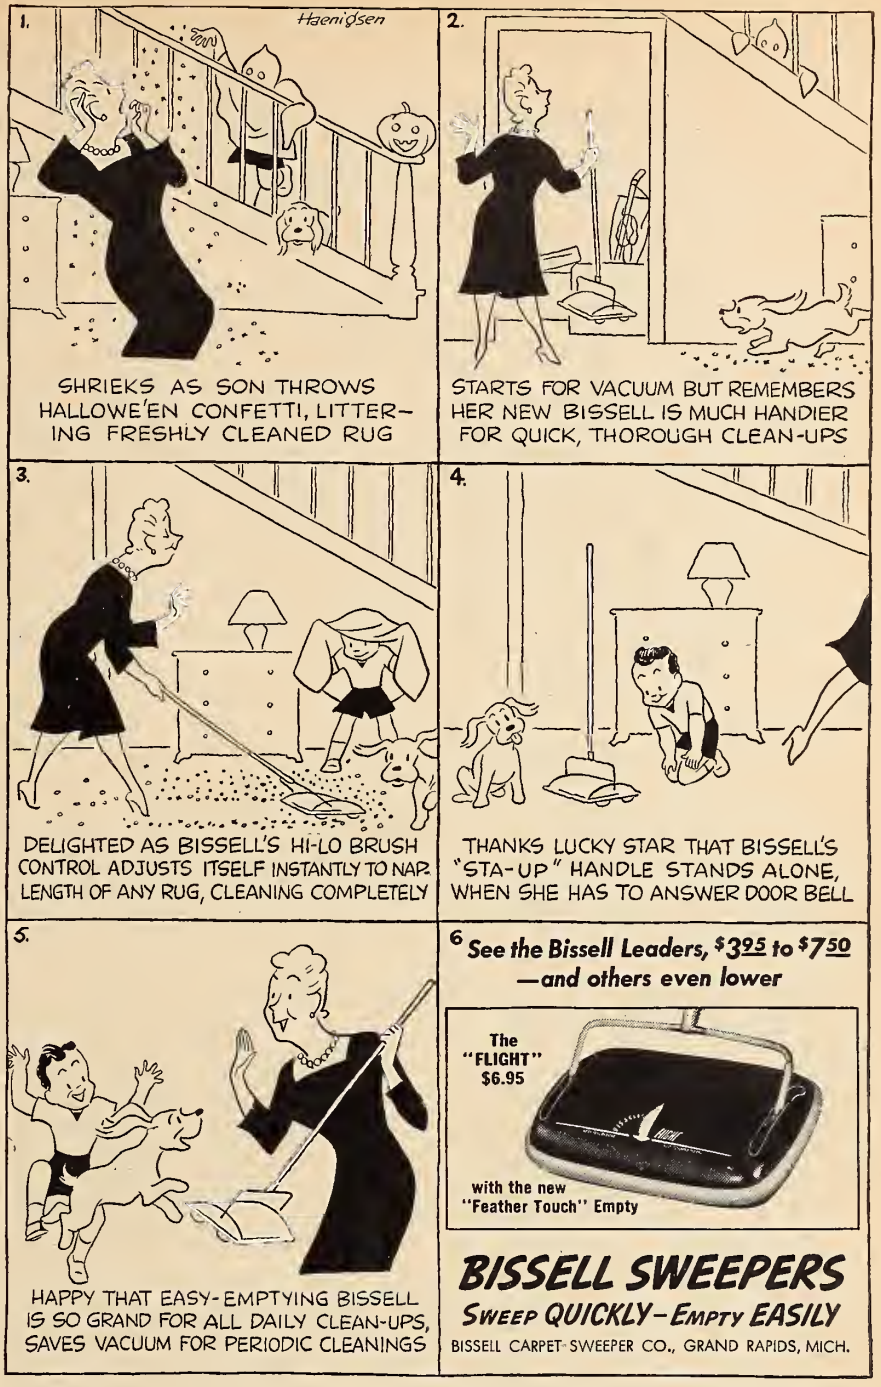
If brown-haired, handsome, 124-pound Hedda Hopper were a man, we might call her the Joe Louis of the columnists. She hits that hard!

The fifth wife of DeWolfe Hopper, who got the name Hedda from a numerologist, who acted in two pictures with Greta Garbo in the early days, is a human perpetual motion machine. Besides three radio programs a week, about eight pictures a year (currently Paramount's "Reap The Wild Wind")—Hedda Hopper also gets out a daily newspaper column that reads as if written by her fists.

Slangy, breezy, full of healthy prejudices and few inhibitions, Hedda Hopper has found time, also, to raise a six-foot-three actor son named Bill and scoop all Hollywood on James Roosevelt's divorce, getting Roosevelt out of bed to verify it!

Hedda Hopper revealed to us her outstanding trait. "I am very definite about the people I meet. And I don't make bones about those I don't like!"

The charming lady digressed:



IT'S a tough life. Day after day sizzling stories come in, stories I know I can't publish now. I know they're true, because I know the people involved. So what I do is write these stories down in a diary which I keep under lock and key. That diary is worth a fortune. And some day when it is opened—wow!

"I told you I was definite about people, and the ones I am most definite about are the English in Hollywood. They are constantly griping about the United States, and yet all they do for their embattled mother country is make long-distance patriotic speeches and salt all their big money away in homes, furniture and safe investments! Believe me, I give credit to Vivien Leigh and Laurence Olivier, to Dick Greene, David Niven, Leslie Howard and even old George Arliss for being where they should be—in England!

"And some of the English here, so damn tight! A man came to me directly from London. He needed $1,000 to build a small clubhouse for poor shopgirls who'd been bombed and blasted from their boarding houses. I took him to a rich American who said, 'Go to your English in Hollywood and get contributions. I'll make up whatever is left.' The London visitor went to three prominent English stars. They each contributed —one dollar! I was raging. I took him back to the American who promptly handed him a check for $1,000 cash!"

Hedda Hopper admitted, though that there was a good share of sweetness and light in movieland. And that when she could, she liked to help the stars.

"Sometimes," she said, "I am able to do much for the stars. You see, some nasty columnist with indigestion will slam a star with an untrue item. The star has no comeback, no way to answer. So the star phones me and I, knowing the personality involved and the truth, will the following morning deny the rumor and combat the dirty crack in my column. Remember, I like to keep my column open to members of my first profession.

"Actually, I'm sure I don't write a daily column for money. I feel I write it to help others, and that's so soap. It's the only way one can keep square with one's conscience. I'll give you an idea. Nils Asther returned to town. A good actor and handsome as ever. No one would touch him. I saw him at a preview, mobbed by fans. I talked to him. He confessed sadly that he couldn't get a job. I wrote about it. Somebody saw it and gave him a tumble. He's been working regularly ever since!

"Another case in point. Benny Rubin. A great Jewish comedian. Really great. But his ex-friends won't give him a break. He told me that in one week he had two movie offers and one stage offer. In an hour they all fell through! I'm going to plug him in my column with the prayer it'll get him a break one day soon. Which reminds me of Orson Welles. The dopes around town, pigmy minds, called Orson a lot of names. Yet Orson, just a youngster from New York, had sense enough to hire Benny Rubin for his radio shows whenever there was a spot!"

We wondered about Hedda Hopper's attitude toward the stars she worked with. She grinned cheerfully and tore in.

"The most cooperative star? Give me Clark Gable. He's so damn real. Listen, my step-son, Jack Hopper, a short, rolly fellow, a New York banker who knew nothing about movies, came to town. I took him on the rounds with me. We went to M-G-M. I introduced son Jack to Clark Gable. I had to leave for a short time. So Gable sat Jack down and man to man chatted with him for twenty minutes. When it was time to leave, Gable said goodbye to Jack as one says goodbye to a friend, and he meant it. Yet later in the day, I introduced Jack to other famous stars—they were polite, and whenever we left, they said goodbye to me, Hedda Hopper, but not to Jack, because all they were interested in was a plug or two in my column. But Gable didn't give a damn what I said about him. He's a man. You can have the others. But give me Gable anytime!"

Hedda Hopper also remarked that she liked Joan Crawford and Barbara Stanwyck. Both genuine and also cooperative. She mentioned Margaret Sullavan as being friendly. We protested. We mentioned once trying to get an interview for MODERN SCREEN, but la Sullavan was refusing to grant interviews. Hedda Hopper explained:

"You've got to understand Maggie Sullavan as I do. She's afraid to be interviewed. She's shy and only interested in her career, her husband, her kids, and she's afraid she'd be dull and make a bad impression during an interview. Maggie is swell. You should see her and her youngsters in their backyard, running around under the sun in G-strings, having the time of their lives! You only have to know her to appreciate the woman!"

We asked Hedda about the mechanics of her own work. She rattled off her schedule. At the office nine every morning. There she goes on the phone for last minute material. Then she dictates her column. Has never touched a typewriter in her life. Then a visit to a studio or two. "But," she said, "the real gossip doesn't come from studios but from cocktail parties, when the girls get tight and tell on each other in the powder room, then phone frantically the next morning to find out what they said and if they talked out of school!"

HEDDA HOPPER wanted to get one big item off her bosom.

"It's this," she said. "They speak about the caste system in India. What a laugh! It's much worse and more cruel in Hollywood, which is for some reason referred to as a democracy. Imagine a $5,000 a week actress even saying hello to a five dollar a day extra—even though the actress may have been an extra the year before. And the highest rung of the caste system is to marry a producer!"

One last thing from Hedda. Her infamous feud with Queen Louella Parsons. Was it fact or phony?

"I'm not feuding with Louella," insisted Hedda Hopper. "We get along fine. It was only natural the talkers would build up a feud. In fact, once before a big affair at the Cocoanut Grove, I took Louella aside and suggested we end the feud before it began. I suggested we get a writer to write a little play in which, at the Grove, we would call each other names from our tables and then rush onto the floor, about to tear hair, and suddenly kiss and make up, and that would end all the talk forever. Louella liked the idea. She suggested Edgar Allen Woolf write our little skit. I called him and he liked it, too. Well, two weeks before the Grove affair, Louella phoned me. 'Hedda,' she said, 'the doctor, my husband, says I don't feel well enough to go through with it.' That got me sore. I said, 'But how does he know how you'll feel in two weeks, Louella?' Anyway, we dropped the stunt and our chance to kill the feud talk. So it goes on. But I swear, we're the best of friends, Louella and I!"

And so, with that, we leave Hedda Hopper and her two fellow custodians of the keyholes, Jimmie Fidler and Sidney Skolsky. We have made history. And we may be famous. Because—we did it!—we actually gossiped about the gossips, we really told on the tattle-tales!

is, it almost didn't happen. He kicked around Hollywood for years before anyone said, "Here's a find." And it's highly likely that no one would ever have said it if Roy hadn't stuck his foot in a studio door that was closing against him.

But maybe we had better begin at the beginning.

Roy started life with the name of Leonard Slye. He was born November 5, 1912, in Cody, Wyoming—far enough West to make him an authentic Westerner, even if he didn't grow up on a ranch.

His father was, and is, a bootmaker. When Roy was 7, his dad decided that maybe he could do better by his growing family—there were three girls (Mary, Kathleen and Cleda) besides the boy—if they moved East. So East they went and lighted in a little hollow called Duck Run in the hills in the southern part of Ohio, 13 miles out of Portsmouth, where his dad worked in a big shoe factory.

"That's real hillbilly country, so I guess that makes me a real hillbilly," drawls Roy with a grin. "I didn't wear shoes till I was about grown. Nobody around there wore 'em—especially kids. The bottoms of my feet used to be like elephant hide. I'd run over stubble and not feel it.

WE LIVED on a little old run-down farm up at t'other end of the 'holler' where there was a house only about every mile or two. And right from the start I got my share of the chores. Dad would come home from Portsmouth every two weeks and see how we were makin' out. But most of the time I was the man of the house.

"I milked the cows and took care of the pigs and chickens, and when I got big enough to handle 'em, I hitched up the team of mules every spring and did the plowin'. I've planted plenty of corn in my time, and I've hoed plenty, too. In the wintertime I'd go up on the ridge and cut down trees and drag 'em out, and me and my sisters would saw 'em up for firewood. I used to ride a horse bareback down to the little red schoolhouse so that I could get home sooner. A little black mare—the fastest thing in that country; she'd been a sulky racer before we got her. I'd sure like to know if she's still alive and get her if she is and pension her off in some nice green pasture, because what I learned about ridin' horses I learned ridin' that mare."

Roy's boyhood heroes, so he claims, were Tom Mix, Buck Jones and Ken Maynard. "I didn't get much chance to go to shows," he says, "but I used to play like I did."

When he went into Portsmouth to go to high school, he developed his first real ambition. "It sounds funny maybe, but I wanted to be a dentist. I thought dentists made a lot of money. Why, they got a dollar or two dollars just for pullin' a tooth. But I gave up that idea the same time I gave up high school, which was right after the second year. And the reason I gave up school was that the quarter dad was givin' me every week just wouldn't stretch. I got a job in the shoe factory along with him.

"I kept at that about a year and saved about $90. Dad saved up some money, too. One day he said, 'Let's you and me drive out to California and see Mary.' That's my oldest sister. She had married and come out here to live. So dad and I set out in this old 1923 Dodge. Six miles the other side of Magdalena, N. M., we burned the bearings out, and we walked into town to a junk yard and got some more bearings, and they didn't fit, and we had to file 'em and cut 'em till they did. But we finally got to California and stayed about four months before we drove home again.

"We hadn't much more than got back when my brother-in-law's father decided to drive out, and I talked him into lettin' me ride out with him. And that time I stayed.

"My first summer in California, I went north to Kingsburg and picked peaches and met a lot of people that everybody else met a while later in 'The Grapes of Wrath.' When I came back down this way, I got a job drivin' a dump truck. I helped put in a long stretch of state highway up beyond Castaic. That was in 1930 or 1931."

And he still might be putting in state highways if, back in Duck Run, he hadn't taken part in the local outbursts of music.

"Mom used to play the mandolin, and dad had a guitar, and we all went in for a little hillbilly harmonizin'. Mom and dad played at all the square dances 'round about, and I'd go and watch, and when I was about twelve, I started callin' the dances. I called 'em before I ever danced 'em.

"On this road job I got mighty lonesome, so I saved up and got me a guitar. I picked out two or three chords on it, and when I went down to visit my sister, I'd sing and play at beach parties. There was a little radio station in Inglewood that had a midnight frolic every Saturday night. Anybody could get on it, so just for the heck of it, I got on it. They took my name and address, and a fellow came to see me and asked me how I'd like to be on the radio. There wasn't any pay attached to the offer, but he thought I ought to be able to have some fun. So I talked it over with four other fellows, and we organized into a harmonizin' outfit."

They called themselves "The International Cowboys"—just why, Roy can't remember. Not one of them was a cowboy. One of them was married and had a steady job, and the other four bunked at his house paying for room and board when able, which wasn't often. Jobs—even odd ones—were beginning to be scarce.

"We got starved out and busted up," Roy recounts. "But three of us started another gang, 'The Rocky Mountaineers.' We got on the air, but we still didn't get any pay. Along came an agent and said, 'Boys, I can make you some money.' He said he'd go out and arrange some bookings for us through Arizona and New Mexico. He got us bookings, all right, but most of the deals he made with theater managers were for us to get fifty per cent of anything over the average 'take.' Our first stop was Miami, Arizona, which turned out to be a ghost town; the copper mines were shut down. We had to hock a watch to get out of the auto court there."

(Incidentally, it was out of Miami that he was pursued by that girl in the "borrowed" car.)

"The next stop was Stafford, Arizona, where we made four dollars apiece. From there we went to Wilcox, Arizona, which was the home-town of one of the boys. It had a stovepipe theater with foldin' chairs. We decided we'd get rich sooner if we put on a dance, so we took out all the chairs and waxed the floor and advertised an old-fashioned square dance. We got a big turnout, too—but 'expenses' ate up most of the profits. The fellow who owned the car wanted to head for California while we still had enough money for gas, but I talked him into going on to Roswell, N. M., 200 or 300 miles away. We landed in Roswell with just fifty cents apiece and learned we had a week's layover to play another fifty-per-cent deal. We talked the local radio station into lettin' us go on the air every day to advertise our show, and we borrowed a rifle and went and shot cottontails for something to eat. That was another time when I lived like in 'The Grapes of Wrath.' When we did put on our show, we didn't make any money, but we hung around another week and put on a dance. We got a nice crowd and made $90. We had visions of becomin' millionaires. We went on to Lubbock, Texas, where we called ourselves 'The Texas Outlaws.' We sure were awful because we went flat-broke in a big hurry.

"When I got me and my one pair of pants back to California that time, I bumped into two fellows named Bob Nolan and Tim Spencer, and we formed a trio and called ourselves 'Sons of the Pioneers.' That was just when 'The Last Round-Up' came out. We made a nice arrangement of that, and we started gettin' plugs. That was the turnin' point."

They started out harmonizing, gratis, on Radio Station KFWB. But when the radio editor of the Los Angeles Examiner started listing them among his daily "best bets on your dial," KFWB decided they were worth hiring—and started paying them salaries. They added a fiddle player, Hugh Farr, and became the most popular cowboy outfit on the California air for more than two years. The movies became conscious of them, and they got quite a bit of picture work as a unit. They were the singing cowhands around the campfire in a long string of pictures, beginning with "The Old Homestead." They worked in Westerns starring Gene Autry, Dick Foran, Phil Regan, Charles Starrett and others. They worked at a variety of studios, all of which, except Republic, are now in a fine position to kick themselves for never sensing the movie possibilities of one Leonard Slye. Republic discovered him as follows:

"It's sure funny how the break happened," says Roy ruminatively. "I was in a little hat store over on Western Avenue one night when a fellow rushed in and said he wanted a cowboy hat for a screen test in the morning. He and I got to talkin', and I asked him where the test was goin' to be. 'Republic,' he said. So early the next morning I rode out there. At that time, the pedestrian entrance to the studio wasn't through the main gate; it was through the administration building. And the guy at the door wouldn't let me in. I made the mistake of admittin' I didn't have any appointment. I kept hangin' around the door hopin' I'd see somebody I knew from workin' in pictures there. Finally a party of four people went through the door. I was gettin' desperate by then.

Before the door could close after 'em, I stuck my foot in it and stepped through. Right inside I bumped into Sol Siegel, who was a Republic producer. He asked me if I wanted to see him. I said 'Yes,' and he led me to his office, and I asked him if he thought I could get a test.

"He leaned back in his chair and said, 'I've tested eighteen singin' cowboys, and somehow I never thought of you. Have you got your guitar with you?' I told him I could sure get it in a hurry and rushed out to the car and rushed back all out of breath. I couldn't sing for ten minutes. But when I found my voice again, I sat on his desk and sang him three numbers, and right then and there, without any test, he handed me a contract!"

THE reason why Republic at that particular moment was interested in finding another singing cowboy, despite the fact that they already had one in Gene Autry, was that Gene was threatening to go on strike for more salary. And if he carried out his threat, they wanted a substitute handy. For four months the new find sat around the studio doing nothing except one solo song number in a "Three Mesquiteers" picture and wondering if he liked the name Dick Weston which the studio had handed him. The studio decided the name could be improved and rechristened him Roy Rogers—just before Gene took his famous walk. The studio's immediate answer to Autry's stroll was to put "a great new find, named Roy Rogers" into the role intended for Autry in "Under Western Stars." The picture was voted the best Western of the year. The public—especially the female portion of it—immediately accepted Roy as a star. Now, as aforementioned, he's No. 3 among all Western stars with a long-term contract to do eight pictures a year.

The fact that Roy is frankly married and frankly the proud papa of a 14-months-old adopted daughter named Cheryl Darlene doesn't seem to dismay his feminine fans. They write asking for photos of him with the baby. Maybe he's their idea of what a husband and father ought to be like.

He met his wife "when I was practically starvin' to death"—in Roswell, N. M. "That week we were on the radio there; a woman called up and said if Len Slye woud sing a Swiss yodel song, she'd bake him a couple of lemon pies. Boy, did I yodel my lungs out! And sure enough a car came around to our motor court, and this woman piled out with two lemon pies. I guess she didn't have to look twice to detect the signs of hunger. She invited all three of us to a chicken dinner. In the back of the car there was a pretty girl—the woman's daughter—named Arlene Wilkins. And when we went over for that chicken dinner, Cupid took aim. Arlene and I corresponded steady after that, and we got to know each other better when she came to Los Angeles to business college the next year, and I went back to Roswell to visit the summer after that. We were married the next fall."

THEY live on an acre in the San Fernando Valley in a cozy six-room house that has all kinds of Western atmosphere.

Roy wears his trousers inside his boots to be different from Autry, who wears his outside. Again to be different from Gene (who, incidentally, is a good friend of his), he never wears jackets; only fancy shirts. His boots are made by his father, who still keeps his hand in at his old trade at a bench reserved for him in the back room of "Roy Rogers' Ranger Post," the complete Western outfitting shop that Roy opened a few months ago in Studio City.

Roy keeps fit by staying away from night clubs, going 'coon-hunting up around Calabasas, working out with his horses, swimming, improving his archery (he has been known to hunt with a bow-and-arrow—it's the Indian in him) and deep-sea fishing. He won the Southern California salt water fishing tournament last year with a catch of a 245-pound hammerhead shark. Another hobby of his is training homing pigeons. But his biggest achievement in the training line is his training of Trigger.

Trigger, raised by Roy from a colt, is a golden Palomino with white legs up to his knees, a blaze face and a white mane and tail. According to Roy: "You can trust him around children, he's that gentle. And he's mighty smart. I taught him a new routine for the Philadelphia Rodeo. The announcer builds up a word picture of a cowboy ridin' across the badlands on his horse—suddenly a shot rings out—I fall out of my saddle, wounded—Trigger stops, comes back, lies down beside me so that I can struggle onto his back—then he stands up and carries me off toward home. It brought down the house, showin' the love of a horse for his master. Now I'm workin' up a new finale. As I start to ride away, another shot rings out, and Trigger carries one leg up in the air as we go out of sight."

Up to now, most of Roy's pictures, including his newest, "Bad Man of Deadwood," have been laid in the Old West with Roy a two-gun cowboy. But from now on they're going to be more modern with more music and comedy. Roy will sing more, and his movie sidekick, Gabby Hayes, will clown more.

We watched Roy work the other afternoon on the Republic back lot. The script called for him to run up to the door of a farmhouse, look back over his shoulder to see if he was being followed, then stealthily enter the house. The director wasn't satisfied with the first take; there wasn't enough "business" in it. He recommended some dramatic touches for Roy to add. The director said: "I certainly have a time keeping you on the screen. Give some of these old-time leading men a scene like this, and they'd make it stretch for five hundred feet of film." Roy said, quick as a flash: "I tried that once, but it landed on the cuttin'-room floor, so I figured I was wastin' my time." In other words, he'll just be himself.

Well, that seems to be paying big dividends. Especially with the women.

OH SUSANNA!

For instance, when I went into "Glamour Boy," right away I didn't like Jackie Cooper—thought he was fresh—typical callow boy coming in with his pipe and his car and all these sharp-cracks. 'Hello, Frizzy,' says he. 'Oh, a comedian!' says I. 'A boy who talks like a man—'

"Well, I was wrong. Jack and Bonita were the first kids I ever met who brought me in with the crowd, just ignored my prickles, invited me down to the beachhouse with the rest of the gang. Of course, one of my troubles is I don't like parties. I like about six kids toasting marshmallows, but crowds scare me, and I hate to dance. I never go any place where I'd have to dance, makes me feel self-conscious.

THAT was another thing about Jack. I had to dance with him in "Glamor Boy." He took me off the set and showed me how not to stumble, how not to look stiff. Then—he's a good actor, and I'm not. He'd say: 'Foster, you smell in that scene,' and tell me why and how to improve it. Which I appreciated a darn sight more than if he'd said: 'Foster, you're swell,' and gone about his business, which doesn't include helping me."

"Foster, you're swell," doesn't go down easily with Susanna at any time. Praise to her face makes her squirm, and she brushes off compliments hastily with a wisecrack. "You wouldn't know how to get swellhead," an admirer told her.

"No," she cut in drily. "I'm only a female with a female's heart, and females never get swellhead, but my feet are killing me—"

"Suzy, you grow better-looking," said a friend who hadn't seen her for a while.

"Yeah," quoth Suzy. "Lamarr should start worrying right now."

Two years ago, after struggling through a long siege of incompatibility, her parents separated. Old enough to make her own choice, Suzy went to live with her father. Her mother has custody of the two younger girls. Her early maladjustment must have been due, at least in part, to the cleavage at home. But her father, a wise man, has helped her to keep her perspective clear. She realizes now that one swallow doesn't make a summer nor one mismated pair give the institution of marriage a black eye.

She and her father go to movies and the opera together, discuss everything under the sun from politics to boys. "There's just one thing about him that gets me so mad sometimes," says his daughter. "He's too easy-going, he lets people step on him. I'm easy-going, too, up to a point. But let that point be passed, and I scare myself. I don't see red, I go cold—absolutely icy." There's nothing about Suzy that gets her father mad. Though he does write her doggerel, peppered with careful insults. Like the following:

"Why don't you have more dignity? Don't be a social dud.
And please, oh, please, say, 'Father dear' instead of 'Hi there, Bud.'
Won't you quit buying shoes and shoes before they drive me woozy?
Instead of Suzy for a name we should have dubbed you Shoozy.
These are all minor matters, true—they wouldn't mean a thing—
Oh Suzy, I'd forgive them all—if you could only sing!"

She adores her sisters and talks about them like a grandmother. Kathleen's fifteen, Adelaide thirteen. "Only she's just at that age where she'd rather be called Vicki and runs around telling everyone she's fifteen, so they think I'm lying, and I have to pull out my birth certificate every ten minutes. She has a dozen boy friends and snubs them all, fixes her hair every two seconds, paints her toenails, has the prettiest legs I've ever seen on any human being, and knows it. Oh, a sub deb but definitely, right out of Cosmopolitan! Kathleen's quieter with a wonderful sense of humor and a grin that would slay you and the loveliest hair between gold and red. She's quite domestic, she'll probably marry some nice young struggling doctor at eighteen—anyway, I hope so. They're both more dependent than I am, though at that I'm sort of a cross between the two—in some ways idealistic like Kathleen, but like Vicki, I also realize the frailties of human nature."

This young psychologist was born in Chicago, spent her childhood in Minneapolis and sang practically from the cradle. At five she fell desperately in love with Jeanette MacDonald after seeing "The Love Parade" and drove the neighbors to thoughts of mayhem by caroling "Dream Lover" like a phonograph record that refused to run down. Still an ardent MacDonald fan, she saw "Naughty Marietta" forty-one times and is waiting for its seventh-run release.

MARY McCORMIC came to town when Susanna was ten. Suzy's account of what happened is elliptical. "Mother always had a lot of courage, and Miss McCormic's a darling, so she listened to me sing three songs written by me—I'll never live it down."

"Have her take piano and violin lessons," she advised Suzy's mother. "But no voice for a while yet, and I'd like to hear her a year from now." She took neither voice, piano nor violin lessons. Black '29 had come and gone, taking most of her father's bond business with it. But Carl Johnson, orchestra leader at the Palace, heard her sing, coached her for a couple of weeks and put her on the bill. Out she came on pipestem legs under blue taffeta and rendered—that's the word—the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet," with two tangible results—ten dollars and the admiration of Merle Potter, drama critic, who had Suzy make a record which he shipped to Metro.

It took the Metro talent scout a year to float it, and he timed his arrival to coincide with a phone call from Mary McCormic in Chicago, who offered to pay Suzy's way to that town so she could sing for the vice-president of Warners'. Torn between gratitude to Mary and excitement over the contract stuck under their noses by M-G-M, they finally plumped for the bird in the hand. Suzy and her mother set sail for Hollywood. Six months later her father and the younger girls joined them.

Ida Koverman, Louis B. Mayer's right hand, met the new songbird at the train. She'd been told to expect a child of twelve and had to look twice at the vision that minced down the platform, high-toned as anything in stilt heels and a black fox wreathed round her gray tailored suit. Next day Suzy was led downtown by the ear and togged out in sports clothes, flat heels and a hat with streamers.

"I was ornery, green as anything," didn't know anything about being diplomatic. I'm not making alibis for myself. They called me to the office one horrible day months later, and said, 'Suzy, you have a bad singing voice, your high notes are thin. You're a good little actress, but we have enough actresses, we can't use you.' It was almost funny, though it took me a while to laugh. I was a punk actress. But I felt I could be a good singer if I got the chance. I'd begged them to let me take lessons. My voice was what I lived for.

WELL—I can generally talk back pretty well. But I knew if I opened my mouth, I'd bawl. Twice in my life I've felt like crying, and that was one of them. So by a pretty heroic effort I kept all the snappy comebacks in my throat till he got through talking, then I walked out. When I got home, I was over the sob-stuff—reached the 'heck-I'll-show-'em' stage.

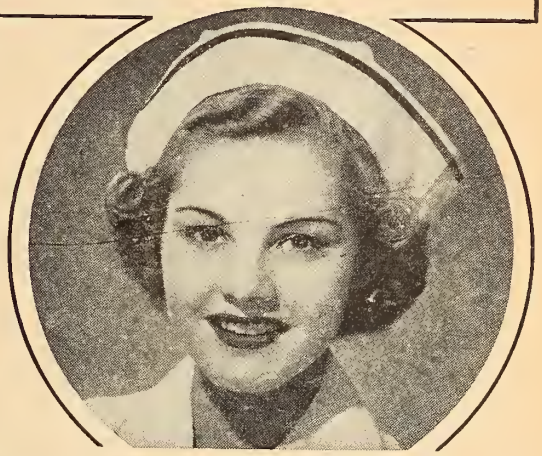
"The next move was mother's. Energetic as she is, she steered me to Milo Marchetti's agency, and he signed me. I wanted to hug him when he said: 'What you need is voice lessons.' And I'll never be thankful enough that he took me to Gilda Marchetti, his sister. She's the only teacher I ever had or hope to have. She knows her job, that's all—instead of saying: 'I've taught so-and-so and so-and-so, so please pay me ten dollars a minute.'"

Time passed, and she auditioned for "The Starmaker." Linda Ware got the job, but Leroy Prinz, the dance director, followed Suzy out. "I'm going to call you," he promised. "Thanks," she said sweetly and laughed up her sleeve. She'd heard that one before. Three months later Marchetti told her that Prinz had called, and that she was to try out for Andrew Stone's "Victor Herbert."

Mr. Stone differed with Metro. He thought she was a fine singer and a lousy actress, but he took a two-week option on her, pending William LeBaron's return from the east. Mr. LeBaron raised cain. "What the hell goes on here, signing fourteen-year-old singers? Why not do a Durbin with Lamour and really panic 'em?" He backtracked, though, after hearing Suzy sing. Or as she puts it, "Mr. Stone was left holding the bag. My heart went out to him. This gawk with hair like a Shetland pony's, screeching 'Muh-thuh!' at Mary Martin all over the place.'"

The general verdict approved the gawk and her singing. Paramount handed her a long-term contract, handsomely substituting yearly for six-month options. Then came "Magic in Music" now "Glamour Boy." "And please, no predictions," begs Suzy. "Let come what comes."

Music is the god of her idolatry. She'd rather sing than eat and thinks she performs better in the bathtub than on parade. She's getting her piano lessons at last, practices two hours daily, takes five voice lessons a week and caterwauls—don't look at me, she said it—round the house for the pleasure it gives her. She used to sing to herself on the lot, but some kind friend told her she sounded like a conceited little jerk, so she quit.



Her ideas about make-up and clothes have changed since her "youth." "At thirteen, I'd smear it on, mascara my lashes, wear gobs of rouge. You know, I don't think mothers should worry about things like that. Every girl goes through it when she first gets her hands on the stuff. It doesn't mean a thing. Myself, I just suddenly realized what a fool I was and cut it out. Only lipstick now. Which reminds me, I've got to get a new one. My dad doesn't like this color.

"It's the same way with clothes, too. First, I couldn't get 'em fancy enough. Now I like 'em plain. Too plain, my dad thinks. Blue jeans and white sweatshirts, for choice. I bought a red formal to wear to the opera, but it sits in the closet. One thing I'm fussy about is hair. I don't care what you've got on, your hair ought to be combed and brushed and fixed right. Just because a girl wants to look casual, her hair doesn't have to hang over her eyes like a gorm's. And, oh yes—I despise sweaters with no bras."

Boys don't mean much to Susanna at the moment. She prefers to swim and play tennis with her girl friends—Dolly Loehr, the little pianist of "Magic in Music," Barbara and Julie George, who aren't professionals, and Betty Brewer, who's only fourteen but has sense. She and Betty love to motor along the ocean-front and eat at a drive-in. Suzy's so crazy about driving that she often goes alone. It's her cure for the blues. "Once when I did a rotten broadcast, messed up 'Traviata' as it's never been messed up before, I got dramatic and thought of jumping into the ocean. But my dog got into a fight, which drove suicide straight out of my head."

In her feeling about boys, Susanna reveals herself as more emotionally mature than the average sixteen-year-old. She's passed through the early phases. She's been kissed, didn't like it and sees no point in doing what she fails to enjoy. She's had a wild crush on an older man. It lasted for months without his suspecting. They never said more than hello to each other, but she trembled at sight of him, wove her dreams round him and cried herself to sleep the night he married. Then she lectured herself out of it. "Now listen here, goon, where's the percentage—?"

Being human, she says, she's interested in the opposite sex. "But when I kiss, I want it to be for keeps. Besides, there's so much else I'm interested in. Once I sat down with myself and said: 'Look, you've got just a few years on this earth. What do you want to do with them?' Well, I want to travel, I want to really see the world—Tahiti and the source of the Amazon and Italy and Siam. It makes me shiver with excitement just to say the names—

"On the other hand, I'd like to marry young. My dad's for me in that. I want about a dozen kids, and we both feel people should have their children early, not wait till they're a hundred and two and then have one. I wouldn't care what the man did as long as he wasn't conceited and wasn't dumb. I've always said I wouldn't marry an actor, so I probably will. What I mean is an actor at heart. There's a difference between a man who acts for a living, and one who can't live without acting. I don't think I could go for a jazzhound, either. He wouldn't have to love music as much as I do, but I'd like him to be able to sit and talk to me about it without getting bored—"

She chuckled. "Of course the ideal thing would be to fall in love with a fiddler who owns a tramp steamer. Then we could have music and see the world. The kids would be all right, too. They'd have to be American citizens, that's all I care about. Otherwise, I'd just as lief bring 'em up on the high seas." Her chuckle faded into earnestness. "Home," said Susanna, as one who knows, "isn't a house, but where the people live who love you."

exotic blues and greens. The latter two are most suitable for evening make-up, but if applied with skill and if you are going to a festive function, you can get away with them at high noon. We wouldn't advise your wearing blue or green mascara with business or sport costumes, but they do look charming when a hat, veil, flowers and dressy clothes are worn. For formal occasions, some girls use two shades of mascara—tinting the lashes one color and the tips another. This takes a bit of extra skill but is strikingly effective.

Whatever shade of mascara you choose, be sure to keep your lashes looking always silken and natural. Brush them after applying mascara so that each is separate from the other, and brush them free of powder after every make-up job, too. Touching them with a little lash cream will not only keep them soft and healthy but will add a nice sparkle to your eyes.

If your lashes aren't the kind that curl of their own accord, use a curler to give them a flattering upturn that makes them look longer and your eyes bigger. The curl will stay in longer if you touch them with lash cream or apply mascara before using your curlers.

Make-up will make your eyes more beautiful, but if you want to keep them healthy, bright and youthful, be sure to follow common sense rules for care of your eyes. Crow's-feet and dry, shrivelled lids will detract from their beauty, so keep your eyes young and lineless by lubricating and massaging them regularly with a special cream. Every night before you retire, tap the cream gently around your eyes, using the pads of your fingers, working from the inner corners outward, above and below the eyes. Be careful never to pull or stretch the delicate tissue around the eyes in your massage routine.

Remember there are no eyes so lovely that they can't be enhanced by the subtle use of make-up, whether it's just a touch of mascara or an accent of shadow. Experiment with all the shades and kinds recommended for your type until you find the ones that suit you best. Then take plenty of time to apply them so as to look both natural and flattering. Your reward will be well worth the effort.

If you've always longed for lovely fringes of lashes, why not let Maybelline Cream Mascara make yours look longer, darker and more luxuriant. You'll find it the ideal consistency for easy application—neither too runny nor too thick—and it comes in three lovely shades—brown, black or blue—to accent your eyes and harmonize with your coloring. Maybelline Cream Mascara doesn't require water for application and comes in a handy purse-size tube, so it's easy to carry about for emergency make-up jobs.

You fastidious girls will be delighted with Djer-Kiss Lipstick. It comes in a new-type case which has a patent lock to keep the inner cylinder spic-and-span clean. Your fingers won't get smudged when you use it, and your purse will stay neat as you like. Djer-Kiss Lipstick is available in five radiant shades, from a warm natural to a daring brilliant red. It goes on smoothly and evenly, making your lips brighter and lovelier, and it lasts for hours.

CRAZY, BUT WE LOVE 'EM

perfected, will change the color of your eyes and hair, the tone of your skin, even the shape and size of your features. So that if you get tired of your same old last year's face, all you have to do is press a button and, lo, some mystic properties will transform you!

JOHN CARROLL'S house is literally an arsenal. Guns are stacked in his kitchen, bedroom and bath. Under his two grand pianos stand two machine guns. Moreover, John, as even his best friends will tell you, is Hollywood's biggest liar. They are not talking behind his back. He knows it. He will entertain rooms full of people with the most fantastic adventures. When, breathless, they ask him, "Is that really true?" his answer is: "Well, hell, no, but it's amusing, isn't it?" Some would call this a border-line case.

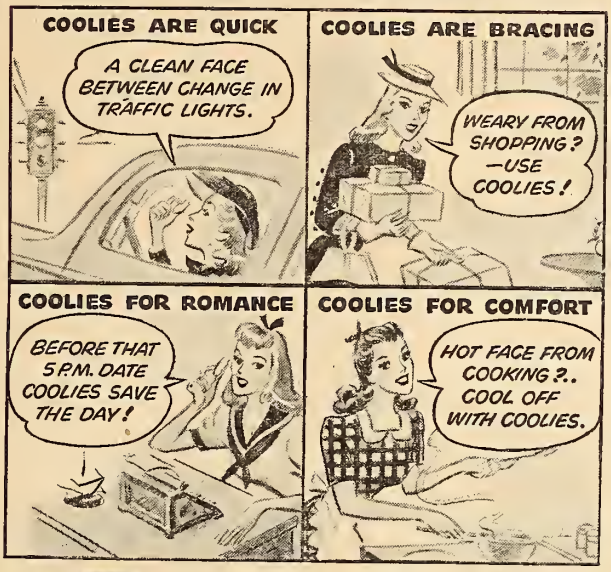
Of course, there are some among us here in Happy Hollywood who recover from their phobias, paranoias and the like and are as good as new. Joan Crawford is a notable instance:

Joan, until quite recently, suffered, really suffered from alter-phobia. Which means, the fear of height. Her earliest memory is of being hustled into a cyclone cellar in Oklahoma when she was a mere moppet. The fear of being whirled upward accounts for the neurosis. She was never really happy unless in a cellar or on a firmly laid first floor. When she stayed in New York, she was in a quandary because the places she liked to stop, the Ritz Towers, etc., have their best suites up near the angels. And poor Miss C. could not rest easy above the fourth floor. So when, two years ago, she was invited to the Critics Award Party to be given at the Rainbow Room in Radio City, that meant the 69th floor, if you know your Rainbow Room. It was so important for Miss C. to attend this function that the publicity woman in charge of the Crawford activities omitted to tell her where the party was to be held until she stepped into the elevator. Then, fearing collapse, she was told "69th Floor." "I can't possibly do it," said shaken Miss C. "You've got to," said the P.A. "Maybe, if the elevator would stop every tenth floor so I could get out and feel the floor under my feet, I might make it," quavered Joan. The entire system of an express elevator was disrupted. It stopped at the 10th floor. Miss C. got out, walked up and down the corridor, felt better, got back into the lift. At the 20th floor, the same shenanigans. At the 30th—then said Miss C., convalescence already apparent, "Tell him to make the whole slug to the 69th!" The payoff is that the next time Joan visited New York, she camped out in the 34th floor at the Ritz Towers!

Joan has been, from time to time, various bundles of fears, neuroses and complexes. Some while ago she had a hand-washing mania. She washed her hands fifty times a day. She took four to six showers a day. She wore gloves whenever she handled anything. She sent her clothes to the cleaners if she had only worn them for half an hour. She always opened a fresh package of cigarettes for herself and if, during the evening, a guest inadvertently took one from her package, she threw it away. When it was pointed out to her that she was behaving in what psychiatrists term an "excessive fashion," she got very mad. Like all victims of a true phobia, she denied it. "I'm just clean," she maintained. She has since recovered, and no one would ever know she had been so afflicted. There was also the time when she took an organ on the train with her when she went to New York. She wanted to practice. Joan, no doubt about it, has had much to overcome. And has.

BARBARA JO ALLEN, better known to us all as Vera Vague, suffers from a very curious complex. She lives in continual fear of a match famine. If she drops a match anywhere, used or unused, she will search for it until she finds it. No matter where she is or with whom. A lovely lady of the most sterling integrity of character, she is a kleptomaniac when it comes to matches. She can clean out a friend's house, a hotel lobby, leaving it matchless in a minute . . . Joan Bennett collects scrap iron in the streets. If she is motoring and hears the clang of metal, the chauffeur must get out and pick up the scrap hit by the tire. Joan once lugged home fifty pounds of scrap and found she had collected the sundry parts of an old washing machine. She explains her compulsion neurosis by saying that she thinks the hunks of metal fall out of her car. That's what she says.

Nat Pendleton may not look right bright on the screen. But he is known among his intimates as a fellow of scientific turn of mind, a great reader and a rival of Raymond Gram Swing when it comes to sound commentaries on world events. Nevertheless—between scenes on the sets, Nat conjures up screwy millinery, if you please, using any object or objects handy. For instance, he'll take a funnel-shaped spotlight shade, tie a huge dresser scarf around it, drop a prop flower in the open end. Or for a floppy brim effect, he'll arrange a script on his head, the book held intact by a hairnet borrowed from one of the feminine players on the set. Nat's latest creation, dreamed up on the set of "Terror Of The Islands" over at Universal, is a cluster of bananas whipped into the semblance of an aboriginal chief's go-to-battle headdress. He wears the bonnets he designs. It is for you to decide whether there are bees in them or not.



Irene Dunne has a compulsion neurosis about busses. The form it takes: She must ride a bus in any city she is visiting. And she must ride—alone. She says she simply makes it a point to see places from bus tops and what's crazy about that? Well, nothing. That is, unless you have a limousine from the privy precincts of which the same end can be achieved. Besides, there are penalties. She has to give fellow bus boys and girls autographs, of course. She can't very well keep her eye on Chambers of Commerce and Village Greens while signing, "Sincerely, Irene Dunne," now can she? Or maybe I'm wrong . . . and there is Myrna Loy who HAS to ride in the left side of the back seat of a car. She doesn't know why.

Dottie Lamour can't let men's neckties alone. Her escorts get a hunted look in their eyes, clutch their throat decorations when Dottie advances upon them. If she likes a man's tie, she'll ask him where he got it. Then she'll go to the shop named and buy ties to send to men whose ties she doesn't like, if you follow me—or her. The ties she doesn't like are, meanwhile, stowed away in Dottie's Old Tie files.

There are the Hollywood beds. . . . Zorina sleeps in a boat-shaped bed. Mounted on rollers, it sways gently during the nights. Zorina likes to go down to the sea in ships. Get it? . . . Geraldine Fitzgerald sleeps in an adjustable hospital bed . . . Humphrey Bogart gets his shut-eye in an ordinary garden hammock—says it is a throw-back to his Navy training . . . Dick Powell, Cary Grant and Warren William had beds made to their own design. They are of gargantuan dimensions. The headboard of each contains book cases, radio, telephone, medicine cabinet, magazine rack and a place for a midnight snack.

AND speaking of beds, when Hedy Lamarr moved out of her Benedict Canyon house after her divorce from Gene Markey, she auctioned off her furniture, was left in the house for the better part of a week with nothing but a mattress and a make-up box. One of the things we still can't believe we ever saw was Hedy squatted, tailor-fashion, on her floored mattress, her make-up box serving as her dressing-table, breakfast tray and tea table. But we did.

One Saturday night at Ciro's, Lupe Velez appeared, gowned gorgeously. Periodically she disappeared into the Powder Room and each time came forth with a new hair-do. One time the hair was pompadour, the next time in a Grecian knot, again a long bob and so on. It was Mrs. Ray Milland who, justifiably curious, investigated, found that Lupe had brought her coiffeur along with her, installed her in the Powder Room. Between numbers, they created new hair styles for the Velez.

Some stars suffer from Animal Complexes. Or enjoy them, depending on the point of view. Among these, Jean Arthur is one for the books. When she was making "Arizona" and was on location in Arizona, she worried herself sick about the poor little animals used in the picture. After each scene was shot, she would untie the dumb creatures, whereupon they would scatter over the mesa. Production was held up, and a Bring 'Em Back Alive committee had to be organized to perform a round-up. Nor was that all: Between scenes and of an evening, Jean would take the poor little dogs, cats and other quadrupeds out for a ride in her car. She also took them up to her hotel room and there attended to the creatures' creature comforts.

The following anecdote, Jean might claim, merely testifies to her thoroughgoing craftsmanship: She had a scene in "The Devil and Miss Jones" where she had to talk back to a policeman. Jean decided to make a practical experiment so as to give the scene the proper authenticity. She drove up and down Hollywood Boulevard, barging through signals, overdoing the speed limit, etc. Eventually, John Law pulled her into a curb. She sassed him good and plenty. He escorted her to the Police Station. Her husband was sent for, and Miss A.'s antic was explained as best it could be to a baffled officer. "It's an occupational neurosis," explained husband Frank Ross. Miss A. was subsequently released upon payment of a fine and with a reprimand which made frequent reference to the "psychopathic ward."

Ida Lupino and Louis Hayward's Sunday Nights At Home are Hollywood-famous. On one Sunday night we have in mind, Ida was ill in bed. At 9:30 the doctor arrived, and Ida insisted that everybody (Frances Robinson, Geraldine Fitzgerald, Olivia de Havilland, etc.) have their blood pressures taken. "Just a courtesy of the house," said the prone Ida, wanly but warmly. Indeed, students of abnormal psychology might do worse than spend a few social evenings at the Lupino-Hayward ménage. They present a fantastic study of the combustion of the social atom. There is a recording machine in one corner of the playroom where Ida will, likely as not, be making a record of "Marie Rose." Louis may be behind the bar, learning his lines for the next day. A guest or two will be on Ida's bed. On one occasion, Louis whipped out his .22 because he spied a prowler going through his clothes-press. The prowler turned out to be John Garfield, one of the guests. John explained that he owns only four suits and was so fascinated by Louis' collection of sixty that he was "just sort of fingering them." And speaking of Louis reminds us of animalophiles again. Louis picked up a stray kitten on Hollywood Boulevard recently, stopped traffic in doing so, found kitty ailing, took it to a Cat Hospital and had a special crib made for it. For three weeks, he stopped in twice a day, before and after work, to "set a spell" with it. Ida insists that he also sent flowers.

Then there is the Christmas worship of Marie Wilson. She worships the Christmas festival to such an extent that she can't bear to take down her Christmas tree, leaves it up practically the year 'round. It stands on a revolving musical stand which plays "Silent Night" as it spins. During the earthquake last July, the blankety-blank thing began to revolve, and "Silent Night" rang out incongruously in the midst of chaos. (There are eye and ear witnesses to this phenomenon.)

ORSON WELLES works all night when producing a picture because he doesn't like the way people look in the daytime here in Hollywood! . . . Paul Muni feels so akin to The People, so compassionate of them that when, for the first time in their married lives, Mrs. Muni decided to go a little elegant and hire a butler to serve dinner, Muni, in old sweat shirt and overalls, jumped up and said, "Maybe he'd better sit down while I wait on table!" And did. And when Mrs. Muni blew herself to a chauffeur-driven limousine, Muni would have none of it, tailed her around in his old roadster, making of a Muni excursion, a cavalcade. . . . And there is Laird Cregar who, when chatting with friends, apparently intent on what they are saying, suddenly gives out with some devastatingly witty and quite unprintable couplets about them, which he has been making up while seemingly with them in spirit as well as in (300 pounds of) flesh! . . . Cesar Romero, who has a charming house replete with Early Americana, fine silver and linens, persists in using a ghastly set of dishes because his Filipino house boy won them at an Ocean Park shooting gallery and proudly presented them to Cesar as a housewarming gift. In silent protest, whether he likes it or not, Cesar's friends, the George Murphys, Ray Millands, Roger Pryors and others, carefully and "accidentally" crack or chip a dish each time they dine at Romero's. But some phobias drive deep roots. Next time, dinner is served on the same dishes plus cracks and chips!

Not long ago, to strike a lighter vein, Ann Sothern sat at home one evening, playing bridge with Cesar Romero, Bob Sterling and Frank Milan, who were keeping her company while husband

Roger Pryor looked at the preview of "Ringside Maisie." Suddenly Ann remarked that she could hear "the patter of little feet" on her bedroom floor directly above where they were sitting. Cesar, with a sympathetic pat on her hand, offered to go up and investigate. Ann's bedroom door was locked, as it has been kept ever since she was robbed by a jewel thief. Cesar tried the key, and—it was red hot! He managed to open the door, and sheets of flame burst out at him! The flames crisping the rugs were "the patter of little feet" Ann had heard. Now, at times like these, Ann is wont to be as cool as an April morning. She was then. She went composedly to the telephone, dialled the fire department, said graciously, "This is Miss Ann Sothern at Number 703 —— Street. My house is on fire. Could you come over?" While waiting for the engines to arrive, Ann spent the time worrying about where she would hang the stuffed head of the 265-pound marlin she had recently caught, which arrived during that incendiary interval. A respect for fact compels us to add that, when the fire was quenched, Ann promptly and completely fainted. Indicating that all her reflexes are really perfectly normal.

If Lou Costello ever clamps down on his screen partner, Bud Abbott, for a settlement of Bud's card debt to him, the dour-faced member of the riotous team will not only be homeless but shirtless as well. Abbott owes the roly-poly Costello a cool $356,942.58 as of noon yesterday. The rummy game, which had its inception the day Lou and Bud first met backstage in a Brooklyn burlesque theatre, has been in almost continuous operation for eleven and a half years and is responsible for the sensational debt. Lou has kept a record of his daily winnings—and very occasional losses—throughout the entire period. But maybe that's just being practical. Maybe, but we have our doubts!

But then there is the true story of the Lana Turner fan who wrote and asked Lana to meet him at a certain restaurant on a certain day and hour. Lana kept the requested appointment. The fan did not. Lana learned later that he didn't get his release. The State Asylum wrote her about it. So as I say, there are two sides to every fence. And mind you, again, these are merely a few notes jotted down about case histories with which we are familiar but about which no clinical deductions are made in print.

"HONKY TONK"

from hiding Lana Turner's streamlined curves. For rowdy dancer Claire Trevor he sketched out a dilly of an ensemble almost entirely made up of vari-colored ostrich feathers . . . Lana watched Gable closely during entire shooting to get acting pointers. A Rummy fiend, she played endless games between scenes with her hairdresser for lunches, lost consistently. After one week the latter had gained six pounds, so they switched to mythical money stakes. At picture's end, Lana owed the girl $8,000,000. . . . Frank Morgan, who had promised himself a post-shooting fishing trip on his elegant "Corsair," inspected wares of sporting goods salesmen between scenes, incurred Director John Conway's ire by trying out swordfish tackle.

Though Sweater Girl Lana Turner plays a prim Boston schoolmarm who tricks Gambler Gable into marriage after succumbing to his muscular charms, Marjorie Main is more appropriately cast as a lady who conducts a mission. In private, tall, gaunt Marjorie neither smokes, drinks nor swears, says, "I come from the Middle West where people don't like women who do those things." For the first time in her life, she broke down and bought a car at beginning of this picture. She drove it twice, sold it, explained she preferred buses.

One hirsute extra did a slow burn after Dead Shot Gable had "killed" him. The camera moved off on a truck shot, and the extra lay "dead" two hours thinking it would come back. It didn't.

Tensest moment in the whole pic is a scene in which Gable and his favorite screen enemy, Albert Dekker, indulge in a "last bullet" duel. Emptying a gun of all but one shell, Gable twirls the cylinder, and they take turns snapping the trigger at their temples. When only two cylinders are left, Dekker weakens, exposes his basic cowardice. Climax of the scene is Gable's revelation that there had never been a bullet in the gun. Sleight-of-hand expert that he is, he had "palmed" the bullet before they started.

PRODUCTION

up a monster tent to house an honest saloon and dance hall, with Gold Dust Nelson, an old flame, as hostess.

The cards were with him—all the way down the line. As his power grew, Brazos' declined. And Elizabeth loved him. Knowing nothing of his past, she expected a proposal of marriage. But Gold Dust disillusioned her on that score. And the old Judge tried to warn her.

That didn't stop Elizabeth. She got Candy drunk, tricked him into marriage. And after his first anger, he began to like it. Judge Cotton's final, futile attempt to save his daughter was to make a clean breast of his own and Candy's past. But words couldn't hope to alter Elizabeth's love. She believed in Candy—even when he had Yellow Creek in the palm of his carefully manicured hand, and money poured into his pocket from gambling, vice and tax graft set-ups.

The lid was bound to blow off some day. And it did. Judge Cotton, learning that Elizabeth was going to have a baby, swore that the child should not grow up in such a corrupt environment. He exposed Candy's graft ring to indignant citizens. Brazos, now a Candy henchman, furious over the tip-off, killed the Judge. Elizabeth, shocked by her father's death, lost her baby, and Candy woke to a belated realization of what he had done to his lovely young wife. Before leaving with Sniper for new fields, he killed Brazos, broke up the gang that had formed to battle the townspeople.

Candy didn't get very far, however, before Elizabeth caught up with him. She had learned what Candy had done, why he was leaving, and to her it was a final proof that he had changed permanently for the better. Her father and her baby were dead, victims of the lawless reign that had existed for so long in Yellow Creek. Candy might protest that he had done nothing noble and that he was no sucker. But Elizabeth knew that he would never go back to his old ways. She loved him and believed they would forever after go along together.

How modern are you when it's—"that time of month?"

Without Painful Backache

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

THE BEST POLICY

If Rosalind Russell states she is not going to marry Freddie Brisson, this scribe is willing to believe her. For if there is one thing that can be said of Roz, it is that she is the absolute soul of honesty.

After all, who but a complete worshipper of the Shining Truth could confound an interviewer by remarking sweetly: "We are all overpaid in Hollywood!" Yep, that is exactly what Roz did!

And if you think that was just a slip of the tongue, swallow this one! In a recent statement to a member of the national press, Miss Russell had the following to say about herself and her Art:

"Why shouldn't I like to be an actress? Forty seconds or so in front of the old movie camera, and I'm ahead another swimming pool!"

As far as we are concerned, that is proof enough. No wedding, says Roz. No wedding, say we.

ROCKY ROAD TO GLORY

Paulette Goddard is riding for a breakdown. In the past year a burning desire to push her career has made her insist on doing a half-dozen pictures without so much as a day-long pause between them. If the taut nerves and weariness she's exhibiting on the "Reap the Wild Wind" set are any indication, she's in for a crack-up before many weeks.

At present her only relaxation is walking with Anatole Litvak (yes, that's still on) in the vicinity of the beautiful Beverly Hills home she owns and occupies—without Charlie Chaplin. Her next residence, however, will be a local hospital. She checks in for a rest cure as soon as "Wild Wind" is finished.

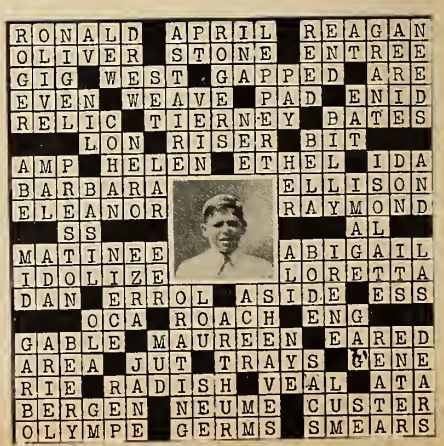
DISA AND DATA

Errol Flynn personal-appearanced when a new five-and-dime opened in the South Pasadena building he owns . . . Brawny Stirling Hayden is literally a "white-haired boy." The Bermuda sun, under which he made "Bahama Passage," did the bleaching . . . Victor McLaglen, the old toughy, has turned to poetry! His first composition is an epic poem about his own life . . .

Note to Mary Beth Hughes: Lupe Velez' new bedroom is done in black velvet and white satin. And she's also installed black and white twin beds for her pair of Chihuahuas! (Tiny Mexican canines to you). . . .

Veronica Lake's baby is cradled in an old-fashioned clothes basket, padded and covered by Veronica herself . . . Keye Luke is painting the Chinese murals to be seen in "Shanghai Gesture" . . . On the heels of the announced silk shortage, Marlene Dietrich plunked down her dollars for sixty dozen pairs of hose . . . Charles Laughton receives less fan mail than anyone in Hollywood. He regards the slight as a tribute to his talent, claiming no right-minded fan would write to the kind of characters he so realistically portrays . . . Ilona Massey wound up "International Lady" by gifting fellow set workers with $300 worth of clothes . . . Picture business can wait for Bing Crosby when the ponies are running. Bing's annual movie schedule is always figured out so it won't interfere with the racing season at his Del Mar track.

Prediction of the Month: Texas A. and M.'s Johnny Kimbrough will be the town's next escort sensation. In the few weeks he's been here, he's set all the sweet young things a-twittering. But, ladies beware! He's got a girl back in Houston . . . Mickey Rooney's admiring glances are falling on Harold Lloyd's daughter, Gloria . . . Edgar Bergen owns a ceramics factory in Pasadena . . . Because she's a word-scrambler, Martha Scott's husband, Carlton Alsop, has pet-named her "Mrs. Malaprop—1941" . . . Milton Berle owns a slice of the Hollywood Coast League Club . . . Maureen O'Hara has received over 100 proposals of marriage since her divorce proceedings were front-paged . . . After viewing the first Quiz Kid short, youngest Kid, Gerard Darrow, turned to a reporter and whispered: "If actors are hams, we ought to be kept in the smoke house!"



HOME OF THE BRAVES

The word has gone out. Any studio desiring an A Number One Indian story should contact Warner Bros. They'll shoot one over by bow and arrow and will even throw in a complete set of unused wigwams for good measure!

And all because the studio biggies forgot that G-string-and-feather-headdress redskins went out with the bustle and the shaving mug!

Here's what happened: 16 of America's choicest aborigines were hired from a nearby reservation to work in "They Died With Their Boots On." To make sure they'd be happy, the studio back lot was transformed into a regular forest preserve, with individual tepees, wild deer loping about and everything else in true James Fenimore Cooper style. When the Ugh-and-How boys were escorted to their temporary Hollywood home, they got one look at the drafty diggings with the droopy door flaps and rebelled. Ringleaders Raymond Hairy Chin, Robert Elk Voice and Frank Shooter sat right down and held a pow-wow with heap big studio chiefs. They had to have comfortable hotel rooms with modern plumbing and valet service—or else! They got 'em, all right, but the payoff is that after two weeks, the pace of studio work and night life proved to be too much for the blood brothers of Sitting Bull. Sadly they packed their peace pipes and autograph albums, hopped a fast train East and gave the town back to the Hollywood Indians!

NAVY BLUES

Claudette Colbert has Navy Blues. Ever since Husband Dr. Joel Pressman was tapped for duty at San Pedro Naval Base, he and Claudette have been unable to see each other more than two or three evenings a week.

Being a defense widow holds little charm for Claudette. Her affection for her husband is famous, and when she can't see him, she misses him. Just like that.

The other evening Claudette was particularly lonesome so she dialed the Naval Base and asked for Dr. Pressman.

"Hello, darling," she said excitedly when he came to the phone. "How are you feeling? Are you thinking of me? When will you be home again?"

Through the wires, Claudette heard her husband freeze. His answers came, curt and sharp. Finally, he interrupted her mid-sentence.

"I'm sorry, madame," he snapped. "I am unable to help you at the moment. I shall be happy to return your call when I have the information you require." And he slammed the receiver in her ear!

Claudette was stunned. Fifteen minutes later she was still wondering what had happened to change the man she married when her phone rang. It was Dr. Pressman.

"Honey," he gasped. "Why did you do it? Do you want to get me in Dutch? My superior officer was in the room! If he knew I was receiving personal calls, he'd cancel my leave!"

Claudette still doesn't like the way the Navy operates. But she's a good wife. Now when her fingers yearn to call Dr. Joel, she raises the receiver—and dials Information!

HELP THY NEIGHBOR

Movie kings and queens, who would blithely slit the throat of anyone threatening to rob them of a snitch of publicity, might do well to take a lesson from Olsen and Johnson, two of the zaniest—and swellest—guys this town has ever lamped. Olsen and Johnson like publicity themselves, but they don't writhe in torture when the other fellow gets some. On the contrary, they'll go out of their way to help a brother actor grab a few columns in a newspaper.

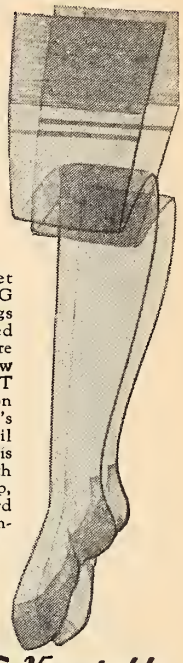
Like the time, not too long ago, when Jack Benny premièred Paramount's "Charley's Aunt." Olsen and Johnson went out and bought a block of tickets for themselves, their kids and their uncles and their cousins and their aunts—and then marched the whole gang over to a tailor where they ordered each and every one of them fitted out as little Charley's Aunts! It was their plan to roll up to the première in a bus and pour into the theatre, two by two, togged out in duplicate Benny costumes, complete with corkscrew curls and seven underskirts! It would be a great gag, they figured, and a swell send-off for Jack's new effort.

And it could have been, too, if Universal hadn't gotten wind of it first.

"Universal publicizing Paramount!" they screamed. "M'Gawd!" And nixing the stunt quicker'n a wink, they sent the boys home to dope out a way they could come as little "Hellzapoppin's"!

SHORT SHOTS

Echoes from the East have Norma Shearer and Ronald Balcom looking dreamy-eyed as they dance at the Sky Gardens of the Hotel St. Moritz . . . Lupe Velez is taking stretching exercises guaranteed to make her grow . . . It takes two dozen pairs of hose a month to keep Alice Faye's legs trimly sheathed . . . If you own a ten-year-old photo of Clark Gable, note the resemblance to Vaughn Paul. It's amazing . . . House-hunters Judy Garland and Dave Rose may settle on the late Jean Harlow's home . . . Bad break for Olivia de Havilland and Carole Landis. Their mutual escort, Gene Markey, reports soon for naval duty in the Canal Zone . . . Ginny Simms is quitting Kay Kyser's band to concentrate 100% on films . . . Cole Bros., the circus maestros, are attempting to lure Mae West into their fold. They're offering healthy compensation, but Mae hasn't yet said "aye" or "nay."



Sylvia Sidney's sister-in-law, Stella Adler, will probably be Hollywood's next feminine director . . . An enterprising citizen has whitewashed a huge "V" on a Hollywood hillside. It's visible for miles around . . . By the time you read this, Ralph Bellamy and Frank Morgan will be headed for the South Seas on Frank's boat . . . John Justin, handsome Prince of "The Thief Of Bagdad," is bedded in a London hospital. His plane was shot out of the skies by a Nazi raider . . .

Favorite New York haunt of magazine-cover gal Honeychile Wilder's the Sidewalk Cafe of Hotel St. Moritz. Says it beats anything in Hollywood!

Recommended Good Housekeeping Bureau

"If I had to choose just one item of make-up, I'm sure it would be mascara. Not only are my eyelashes light and very fine, but my eyes are small . . . so mascara does wonders for me. I like Maybelline for several reasons... It doesn't smart or get runny—it's easy to apply—and what it adds in appearance is amazing! By applying it deftly, I can even make my eyelashes curl right up over my eyelids." (Recent broadcast by Jean Abbey over Station WOR)
